

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE AUGUSTAN AGE.

No. IV.

PERHAPS no literary productions ever obtained so immediate and extensive a popularity as the Novels and Tales by the Author of Waverley. For this many causes may be assigned. At the time of their first publication Novel writing was at its lowest ebb: the world was deluged and disgusted with a succession of Romances, and other works of fiction, of which it would be hard to say whether they were most strongly marked by dullness, absurdity, or frivolity. Enchanted castles had lost their attractions; ghosts and spectres were no longer viewed with terror and amazement; and errant knights wandered forth in quest of adventures without exciting the smallest degree of sympathy or admiration. But upon the appearance of 'Waverley,' it was discovered that a novel might be written, of which the plot should be laid in our own Island, no more than 'sixty years ago,'—the characters and incidents such as experience and history tell us, have had a real existence,—which should be capable of affording amusement blended with instruction. The historical turn of 'Waverley,' and the other works of the same author, was one great cause of their success. With the desire of becoming, in some degree, acquainted with the history and manners of their ancestors, many have been induced to take up these volumes, who would turn disgusted from those highly seasoned, and unnatural productions which—as Dr. Johnson would have said,—“are fit only to amuse savages in the dawn of literature, and children in the spring of life.” Another cause of the popularity of the 'Waverley' school of novels, is their nationality. The poems of Ossian and Burns had introduced a rage for the scenery, manners and language, of Scotland; and this was abundantly satisfied in the novels of which we speak.—By the way we beg to remark, that the fondness for the barbarous idiom of Scotland's rudest peasantry, argues strongly against the good taste of the present age. Our own much-abused Lancashire dialect is in no respect its inferior; and as being, with little alteration, the language of our early poets, deserves more attention. Yet, whilst the former is carefully sought after, and introduced at every turn, the latter is never spoken of but with ridicule or contempt. We are no advocates for the use of the uncouth idiom of Lancashire, but we do think that its merits are at least equal to those of the barbarous Scotch dialect now so much admired.

The real merits of Walter Scott (we presume he is the author of Waverley) are not amongst the smallest causes of his extensive popularity. He is, without dispute, amongst the best of British Novelists. In particular he possesses, in an enviable degree, the talent of what in the vocabulary of Doctor Spurzheim, would be termed descriptiveness. With a stroke of his pen he sets before us, the human character, or the landscape from nature with equal ease and equal accuracy—he presents them too, in such glowing colours, and with such an air of nature and reality upon them, as immediately to engage our undivided attention. Other Novelists have sought to interest their readers by the uncertainty and boldness of their hero's adventures.—They have appealed to the powerful principle of sympathy, and have been mainly indebted to it for success. The author of Waverley has aimed higher:—he has appealed to the imagination and the fancy,—he has aimed at the understanding and the heart. He does not hurry us on as if fearful that his influence would cease when we can gain time to look around, and discover by what we are enthralled. He suffers us to pause and admire the beauties which he lavishly throws around. The hero and his adventures are often cast into the shade, to introduce some diversity of character to advantage, or prepare the reader to resume the regular narrative with renewed pleasure. In this there is something noble and generous: it declares that the author is not so mean as to seek to eject our reason that he may control our passions more easily.

Much as we admire these productions, we are of opinion—and this opinion is by no means an uncommon one—that their merits have been vastly overrated. Nothing can be more disgusting than the untempered panegyric which has been heaped upon them from all quarters. A comparison has been invited between Shakespeare and Sir Walter Scott.—This is the very quintessence of flattery—disgusting to every candid and impartial mind, and we should think, to none more than the individual whom it is designed to honour. Shakespeare was a mighty genius. With little of that knowledge which is derived from the experience of other men, he possessed, perhaps intuitively, a profound acquaintance with the human character. His mind was never emptied, his stock of ideas never worn out. We never discover him dressing up an old actor in new apparel to 'strut his hour once more before the world.' His masterly hand sketched a character, and when it was finished he laid aside, and never returned to the subject. He is ever new. He has but one Falstaff, one Lear, one Macbeth. On the contrary, our "second, better Shakespeare"—as he is somewhere styled—has a round of characters that serve with some little variety for every occasion. His witches, for instance, all bear a family likeness to Meg Merrilies, from whom they are lineally descended. Many other characters may be detected, differing in labilliments indeed, but wearing a concealed identity. We look in vain in these works for those bursts of sentiment which indicate the presence of genius in its purest character. There is scarcely a passage which is worth remembering for any strong, condensed sentiment it conveys. Good ideas there are in abundance, but they are spun out and hunted down until the reader is weary of them. Shakespeare knew the value of a good idea too well to waste its strength by dilation. He is therefore replete with profound remark, pure wit, and beautiful illustrations. These are easily committed to memory; they have been adopted into common life, and of themselves would preserve the remembrance of their author, though every written memorial of him perished.

The popularity of Sir Walter Scott's works, is no exact criterion of their intrinsic worth. The popular taste is generally correct upon the whole; but it often receives a bias, and for years remains highly prejudiced. This may have been—and we think has been—the case with regard to the estimate formed of the Waverley School.

It has been observed by a profound writer, that great minds, in general, go before the genius of the age in which they live, and consequently are neglected by contemporaries. In the lapse of years, when the popular mind has come up to their standard, their true worth is discovered. Shakespeare and Milton may be mentioned, amongst a multitude of others, as proving the truth of this position. Walter Scott has not been forced to share in their neglect; and will not be permitted to enjoy their lasting triumph. He is a meteor bursting into effulgence and then immersing into darkness: they are orbs of dazzling radiance gradually dispelling the mists of darkness, and still increasing in splendour as they increase in years.—But we need not carry the comparison any further. A few years will do more in deciding on the comparative merits of these writers, than volumes of controversy. Opinionum commenta delet dies, nature judicia confirmat.

REVIEWS.

THE LOVES OF THE ANGELS, a Poem. By Thomas Moore. London, 1823.

It is not direct attacks, however plausibly sustained, that will cause the Sacred Writings to be generally slighted; the blasphemous daring of a Liberal, the impious eccentricity of a Manfred, can never influence more than a very insignificant minority of intelligent readers. The seductive labyrinth is alone formidable; and this is, unhappily, the track which Mr. Moore has chosen. The apology of Mr. M shall be given in his own words;—

'As objections may be made, by persons whose opinions I respect, to the selection of a subject of this nature from the scripture, I think it right to remark that, in point of fact, the subject is not scriptural—the notion upon which it is founded (that of the love of Angels for women) having originated in an erroneous translation by the LXX. of that verse in the sixth chapter of Genesis, upon which the sole authority of the fable rests. The foundation of my story, therefore, has as little to do with Holy Writ, as have the dreams of the later Platonists, or the reveries of Jewish divines; and, in appropriating the notion thus to the uses of poetry, I have done no more than establish it in that region of fiction, to which the opinions of the most rational fathers, and of all other Christian theologians, have long ago consigned it.'

But, Mr. M. had another object in view; a doctrinal one! He wished from a figurative expression to deduce and establish an "allegorical" structure; a "medium through which might be shadowed out the fall of the soul from its original purity—the loss of light and happiness which it suffers, in the pursuit of this world's perishable pleasures—and the punishments, both from conscience and divine justice, with which impurity, pride, and presumptuous inquiry into the awful secrets of God, are sure to be visited."

It is scarcely necessary to remark that the readers of "The Loves of the Angels" will be troubled with but few impressions or feelings of the description to which Mr. M. alludes. The poem possesses much beautiful imagery, and seems, to us, to be, altogether, in the Author's best style. Our next shall contain some interesting extracts.

AN ODE ON THE USE AND ABUSE OF POETRY; suggested by the present times and recent publications. By the Rev. C. Burton, L.L.B. London, 1822.

THE mere announcement of an Ode on the Use and Abuse of Poetry, excited our curiosity; and, on procuring a copy, we read, with sweet anticipation—"The design of this ODE is to exhibit the legitimate and valuable objects of Poetry; and to expose with justly-merited severity, those recent productions, which, at the present eventful crisis, tend, in an awful degree, and by the most seductive and delusive method, to demoralize the British population." The poem was short; our expectation great; and we entered upon the perusal with infinitely more of an enthusiastic, than of a critical, spirit. But,—No; we restrain our feelings. This anomalous production shall decide its own fate!

Part of Mr. B.'s design "is to exhibit the legitimate and valuable objects of Poetry." The first eighty lines are made up of interrogatories to the "Spirit of verse," as to its exclusive attachment to "Solitude?" to "Melancholy?" to "Grief?" to "Beauty?" to "Heroism?" or, to "Comedy?" Then comes the promised exhibition of "the legitimate and valuable objects of Poetry;"—Comparatively, with the former subjects (the "Spirit-of-verse" being still invoked),—

Sublimar far, in Nature's loveliest scene
Of strange sublimity, or fairy green,
Walk with thy Bird; and sing the live-long day,
Prompt the high strain; and swell the pastoral lay!
Move with thy Phaeton as the Seasons roll,
And pierce with Osseus's Idylls to the soul!

These six lines are stripped of ambiguity in the next thirty, for in them we learn that the "HARPER's" delight should be in "Nature's sun-clad day," "the moon," "the milky-way," "the bow of promise," "the briny main," "the zephyrs," "the whirlwinds," "the heights precipitous," "the velvet lawns," "birds," "bowers," "flowers," "cascades," "lakes," "lark," and "nightingale." Such a ("Rich Panorama!" or) panoramic view of preposterous madrigal, we never before met with in a like compass!

The following ten lines are all that can justly be said "to exhibit the legitimate and valuable objects of Poetry;" and according to these, as well as to what we have above quoted, (being the entire of the exhibition) "truth," and "only TRUTH," should be the subject of the Muse:—

"Is VIRTUE then, that breathes but love in me, ALONE denied the charms of melody?"

My Muse, aggrieved, replies, It cannot be,
For Music's SELF is HEAVEN'S PURE MINSTRELSY.
Let DAVID, ASAPH, and ISAIAH tell,
From sacred themes what sounds seraphic swell!
What makes the bliss of yon celestial sphere?
Where first-born sons of morning-time appear
In highest ecstacy, if not to find
Truth, only TRUTH, with HARMONY combined?"

We are now obliged to declare that the Author has not at all entered into the first part of his "design," which should have exhibited "the legitimate and valuable objects of Poetry." However, we pass on to the second part, viz; "to expose with justly-merited severity those recent productions, which demoralize the British population." And, as this exhibition is more concise than the preceding exhibition, we give it without abridgement;—

"ETHEREAL ESSENCE! which, of all thy train,
That heard, of late, the too enchanting strain
Of thy fell rotary, would again inspire
The LORDLY BARD that sweeps the Attic lyre?
Sure, the sweet NINE, aye linkt in heavenly thrall,
Must wait the gifts they cannot now recal;
Unless he sings from influence, like their own
In harmony, but prostrate from it's throne;
Such as might prompt the dark Plutonian lay
When Tartarus gulphs his new-descended prey.

"Sad prostituted Genius! fit, alone,
In some foul planet to erect his throne,
Such as He best describes; some orb of fire,
Where all, but beams of wretchedness, expire;
The burning wreck of some demolish'd sphere,
A wand'ring hell that wheels it's high career.
His Alpine genius, towering,—varied,—bold,—
Sublime in fancy, as in virtue cold,
Like a fell Avalanche, comes wasting down
On PIETY's warm plain. Still worse, the frown
Of kindred SHELLEY on fair Mercy's reign.

"Patron of verse! thy sacred cause maintain,
Summon thy chaste, thy well-affected train,
And bid them sing of PIETY again!
In vain shall then the too-voluptuous Muse,
With syren melodies, her victims choose;
Or BYRON laud his deeds of crimson dye,
Sing meretricious love and chivalry;
Or baser SHELLEY, on the gates of hell,
With reckless vaunt impinge his sceptic shell."

In the above lines we find two VICTIMS declared; but, by what figure of speech, by what description of idea, can we even fancy that those demoralizing RECENT PRODUCTIONS are EXPOSED? Are their pernicious doctrines at all controverted? Nay, is there one, even one of them so much as named? This is begging a point indeed!

We, at present, speak not of the poetical merits or demerits of—

"What such-like bards there be, may not be said,
For he that names them makes them to be read,"— in connection with what we have above quoted, its philosophy is our object; the author tells us of one—"the LORDLY BARD"—

"Whose Alpine genius
Like a fell Avalanche comes wasting down
On Piety's warm plain."

And of another whom he describes as being more dreadful;—

"Still worse the frown
Of kindred SHELLEY on fair Mercy's reign,"

Agreeably to his own theory, by naming BYRON, and SHELLEY, he of course,—"makes them to be read;" and, taking his own description, they are surely the chief of "such-like bards."—Then why should the less significant, "not be said?" Thus does Mr. B. proclaim his guardian-care at the very moment in which HE brings us into certain contact with the greatest of literary "seductive and delusive" evils!

We have now got through Mr. B.'s exhibition and exposition; and, although our feelings would incline us to a less painful decision, yet, the duties which devolve upon us, and which we study most impartially to discharge, oblige us unequivocally to state, that his address "TO THE READER" is so fallacious, as not to be, in either part of his design, realized in any, even the least, degree.

As to the composition, it certainly is rhyme; but, in no other sense is it poetry. The tenth line is smooth and pretty, but to us inexplicable:—

"When Silence shuts the eyelids of the plain."

There is an evident affectation in lines 17 and 19:—

"When from the spheroid verge of this terrene
The sapphire barge of heav'n's resplendent queen,"

The following lines are a plagiarism;—

"The crape-enbrouded widow, mute and slow,
Wends to the grave where yet no flowrets grow,
Heedless of gossip-tales, or owlet's scream,
While twinkling Lyra sheds a feeble beam
On the cold surface of the church-yard stone,
That hides and praises all she deem'd her own!"

Patent is a monopolizing, but not a very poetical phrase;—

"To rural Beauty claim thy patent sway."

We cannot comprehend lines 99 and 100 in either a scriptural or philosophical sense;—

"The bow of promise, arch'd in mercy's hour,
To paint the globules of the genial shower."

The 106th line is defective in measure, and vulgar in its termination;—

"Or light'ning scorch'd; where, yelling loud."

There is a remarkable sterility in our author's rhymes,—lines 95 and 96 terminate "I ween," "scene," and 118 and 119 terminate "scene," "I ween." The 135th is also "scene," and the 136th shifts miserably to avoid "ween;" however, by a little affectation of ancient lore, it succeeds;—

"Raise his faint voice, when eke, with plumage sheen."

The same affectation is manifested in—"Eke there I see," "as, whilome, he" "the wight enthralled," "aye linkt;" and still further in two lines of ghostly aspect,—the repose of the grave is somewhat injudiciously disturbed;—

"Her wings, yburnish'd with celestial fire."

"With fire, grayish'd from a spotless sky."

We get very awkwardly through—

"Of Christ's tremendous agony; as, whilome, &c."

A school-boy would receive a justly-merited castigation for the couplet, already quoted, beginning "What such-like bards, &c."

The "Vision of Judgment" mania has reached Mr. B.—

"And while I terminate my humble ODE,
I cast my ravish'd eye to thine abode,
—there I see

Thy Herbert, Cowper, Watts, MONTGOMERY;"

Our author will oblige us by stating whether the latter gentleman got there by death or translation, either will be new to us?

The inquisitorial spirit of this Ode is not equivocal;—

"What fate more suited to such miscreant bard,
Than on some kindred rock, as cold as hard,
To gnaw, unheard, an adamant chain,
While Hell's keen vultures multiply the pain.

All-gracious Monarch of earth's brightest crown!
With high discerning majesty, look down
And scatter far beyond thy halcyon smile,
The recreant bards that desecrate our isle!"

Of the following six lines, the first couplet is false and presumptuous; the next, offensive and impertinent; and the last, contemptibly ludicrous;—

"Ye gifted Scribes! who guide the general views,
Undaunted, crush each base apostate Muse!
Ye hireling Critics! never dare to praise,
What, in your hearts, ye know deserves to blaze!
No, tho' the reckless, venal Bibliopole,
Holds to your view the too seductive drole!"

Now we deny that there is a tribe of "gifted Scribes, who guide the general views;" and we affirm that those to whom Mr. B. alludes, are, at best, "hirelings" of the public; and that they work (probably to a man) purely for emolument! The second two lines are grossly insulting, as they upbraid men of talent with a necessity which our author would make appear disreputable; but, a Christian minister who can thus deliberately stigmatize men with the epithet "hireling," must surely have himself descended from an illustrious, and independent ancestry! However, when we consider that the "gifted Scribes" only differ from the "hireling Critics" by having a little proprietorship, or paper credit; and that they are as much dependent upon the intensity of prejudice, as the latter are upon individual discernment, we feel inclined to reverse the judgment, and to award the superior distinction to the Critic.

The "Ode on the use and abuse of Poetry" consists of 242 lines, and our review should have been comprised in ten or a dozen; but that we desire to convince Mr. B. that our estimate of his Poem is the result of a just, and not illiberal, examination.

The author concludes his address "to the Reader" with the following sentence;—"Whatever may be his claim as a Poet, he hopes, by endeavouring to subordinate his efforts to the excitement of suitable feelings in a matter of ineffable concern, he will, at least, be acknowledged as a zealous friend of Religion and Virtue." Whilst truth obliges us to say that Mr. B. has no claims whatever as a poet, we are happy at having it in our power to close our review with the declaration, that we respect and sincerely acknowledge him "as a zealous friend of Religion and Virtue!"

BEAUTIES OF ENGLISH POETRY.

No. III.

CHAUCER continued.

'What's Geoffrey unto us? or we to him?

'That we should read his crabbed, old, ugly verses?'

There are, I scarce can think it, but am told there are, who exclaim against poor old Geoffrey somewhat in the style of my motto. Here have I been harassing myself half to death with the view of modernizing, the, what I call, beautiful verses of the venerable father of English Poetry; and all the thanks I receive amount to this.

One pretty little gentleman called upon me at my lodgings in Lower Byrom-street, the day before yesterday. 'Pray, Mr. St. Clere,' said he, 'why don't you give us Chaucer in plain English?' 'Plain English, my dear Sir,' replied I, 'why, Sir, that is my object. I have modernized the passages I have selected as most interesting, for the ease and comfort of those who have never read any poetry of a more antique date than what appears in Enfield's Speaker, or Murray's Reader; unless they have percase look'd into Dodd's Beauties of Shakespeare.' 'Oh! but,' retorted my little friend, 'it is plain that you have not given us it in plain English; for you yourself have thought it necessary to add explanatory, or, as my brother the clergyman expressed it to me, glossarial notes.'—'Well, Sir,' said I, 'and what are those notes?'—'Merely to explain to you, and such as you who set up for critics before you have studied the English language, that Holt signifies a wood, Soothly truly, Eyen eyes, Steep deep, and Forpined witherd. I was even simple enough to think it might be deemed a charitable office to make the 'fine gentlemen' of the present day, a little acquainted with antique literature at so easy a rate.'—'That's all very true,' replied he, 'but then at the best, Chaucer is so heavy, so dull, so stupid, so uninteresting, compared to Lord Byron, and the general run of modern poets.' 'Oh! your most obedient!' said I, 'you have got your palate spoiled by the cayenne-pepper of my Lord Byron, and have no relish for the beautiful, and, to an unsophisticated taste, enchanting simplicity of the old writers. I am sorry for you.'

With regard to myself, all I undertook was, to endeavour to preserve the spirit of the original, to put away every word and phrase that was likely to frighten an ordinary reader, but to retain as many of them as seemed to possess a more than usual force;—and, for the purpose of removing every objection against those antique words and phrases so retained, the glossarial notes were added:—and I strongly suspect, Sir, you will excuse me for speaking plainly, that had you not seen those notes, you would never have suspected there was any thing particularly difficult in the text. The human mind, Sir, is a strange, mysterious machine, and is strangely and mysteriously acted upon by things which it not often suspects to have any power over it. They who have not the advantage of possessing a knowledge of Latin, Greek, French, or any other but their native language, take every opportunity of crying out against the utility of such knowledge, and are vastly witty upon those who had the misfortune of being sent to school in their younger days.—So, they who are too lazy to delve in the rich mines of ancient English literature, profess that they cannot bear any thing antique. Be it known to you, Sir,—that we have never had any poet of real eminence, who did not delight in the study of those who went before him. Spenser studied Chaucer, and stole much from him; Milton studied them both; Dryden studied all three, including Milton; Pope studied them all including Dryden;—and that my Lord Byron, whom you so much, and I allow justly, admire, had deeply studied Chaucer, Spenser, Crashaw, Milton, Dryden, Pope, and Chatterton, which last, in point of fact, may be classed with Chaucer, as far as the antiquity of his phraseology is concerned, I could prove from many passages in his writings. Oh! Sir, but poets are queer animals, take my word for it. Byron, with all his exaltation of mind, studied Wordsworth, stole from him, and to hide his thefts, abused him, in order to persuade people not to read him. I do not allude to any such 'prodigious' plagiarism as was ingeniously discovered in the character of Dominic Sampson, by a very erudite gentleman of this town, a few weeks ago,—but I allude to real, downright, and complete thefts of thought and expression. You yourself, Sir, for aught I know, may be a poet; or at least you may tag rhymes to the ends of measured lines, and therefore style and think yourself so. But allow me to say, Sir, that there is about Chaucer, a closeness of observation, a distinctness of delineation, a glowing richness of character, a delightful, good-natured humour of description, a witty in-offensive satire, which every candid reader must admire, but which few can hope ever to equal. In reading his description of the Canterbury pilgrims, they rise ideally to our view, and pass before us, with almost the same distinctness, as if we saw them actually represented on the stage. Modern poetry is altogether different. It despises minute descriptions either of nature, or art. And why? Because they require study; they require experience; they require time;—they require age; they require sense. Modern poetry consists for the most part of morceaux of rhapsodical bombast, technically, or rather in the slang of the day, styled 'bursts';—a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, but—signifying nothing!—They, that is the authors of such poetry, will tell you that they stood on a mountain,—that they watched the sun,—that they wished themselves this, and that, and the other,—any thing but what they were and ought to be. Then their souls swell within them; leave the brain which they were intended to inhabit, and take a flight above the clouds;—the following is not a bad specimen:—

'I stood upon a mountain, and I gazed
Upon the wide-spread earth beneath;—the sun
Was setting in the sea, and dimly blazed;
For he from east to west that day had run;—
I stood and looked around me, till the dun
And sober twilight gave me a broad hint
That night was coming on, and day was done:
So slowly down the hill I went.'

Pish!—I wish you had remained on the hill till now, without either pens, ink, or paper. Therefore, Sir, for all these reasons, though I feel myself infinitely obliged by the candid expression of your opinion, you must allow me to say, with all the politeness I am master of, that I am exceedingly sorry, and even very much distressed, that it is not such as I can have the very great pleasure, and very high honour of coinciding with.'

The little gentleman very civilly bade me 'good morning';—I turned from him to my delightful old Geoffrey, and modernized to the best of my poor ability, the following very picturesque description of a Friar of the fourteenth century:—

A Friar there was, a wanton and a merry,
A limitour,¹ and a full solemn² man:
In all the orders four is none that can³
So much of dalliance and fair language.
He had ymade full many a marriage
Of young women, at his proper cost;
Unto his order he was a noble post.⁴
Familiar and full well beloved was he
With franklins⁵ over all in his countrie,
And eke with worthy women of the town,
For he had power of confession,
As he himself said, more than a curate,
For of his order he was licentiate.⁶
Full sweetly did he hear confession
And pleasant was his absolution.
He was an easy man to give penance
There where he thought to have a good pittance:
For unto a poor order what is given
Is a sign that a man is well yshriven.⁷

His tippet was aye⁸ stuff'd quite full of knives,
And pins, which he might give unto fair wives.

1 Limitour, a friar licensed to beg within a certain district.
2 Solemn, reverential.
3 Can, knows. This word is related to Con and Ken.
4 Post, a prop or support.
5 Franklin, a freeholder of considerable property.
6 Licentiate. One licensed by the pope to hear confessions in all places, independently of the local ordinaries.
7 Yshriven, confessed.
8 Aye, always.

And certainly he had a merry note.
Well could he sing and play upon a rote.⁹
At story-tellings far the best was he;
His neck was white as is the fleur-de-lis;¹⁰
And he was strong as is a champion,
And well the taverns knew in every town,
And every merry host and gay tapster,
Better than a poor lazar or beggar,

And over all, where profit might arise
Courteous he was, and lowly of service;
There was no where a man more virtuous;
He was the best beggar in all his house,
And gave a certain sum to have such grant,
None of his brethren might come in his haunt:
For though a widow had but one poor shoe,
(So pleasant was his In principio)
Yet would he have a farthing ere he went;
So his receipt was far more than his rent:
And rage he could as it had been a whelp;
And in love-days¹ he was of mickle² help;
For there was he, not like a cloisterer,
With threadbare cloak, as is a poor scholar;
But he was like a master or a pope;
Of double worsted was his semicope.³
That round was as a bell out of the press.
Somewhat he lip'd out of his wantonness
To make his English sweet upon his tongue;
And in his harping, when that he bath sung,
His eyes they twinkled in his head aright,
As do the stars upon a frosty night.
This worthy limitour was call'd Huberd.

POETRY.

MR. EDITOR.—Now, Sir, you may hold up your head, and show your silvery locks to the gazing throng which surrounds you, shouting glad congratulations on the completion of your first volume. Yes, Sir, now will I join with the multitude in wishing you (in the old fashioned manner) "a merry Christmas and a happy New Year." I am not one of your stiff starched and prim fashionists, who only lip out "the compliments of the season," as if each word froze to the tongue, and died in a breath rustling through the crevices of a shrivelled lip. I like the good old style, when on Christmas eve the wassail bowl smoked upon the board, and the kissing bush graced the centre of the hall. Then the cup went merrily round, and was as quickly replenished with the kind and generous liquid, so preferable to its substitutes, which now stand as if frozen into the narrow compass of a few black bottles. The joys of this season are nearly forgotten, its customs almost exploded; few are the carols which I well remember, used once to gratify my youthful ear as I sat with my pockets full of halfpence to reward the singers, and those how degenerated!

Poor Tom! how many times have we met in the old hall, round thy favourite oak table to enjoy the festivities of this week! but thou art gone; no more will the voice of mirth and laughter glad thine ear; the favourite song, which once made thy face smile, is banished from thy house; and thy pretty grand-daughter, writes sonnets on the months and seasons in its stead; she is now in her beauty, but has not forgotten thee and thy last Christmas-box, she has this year placed the bush on the old hook!

Mr. Editor, forgive these dotings of an old man who must soon leave all this mirth and gaiety to others, and follow his friend to the grave. My little chirper whom I mentioned above, has just given me the following lines, which I hope you will insert for my sake, I am vain enough to think you will admire them!

MUSINGS ON JANUARY FIRES

Another year is dead, and Nature seems
To weep its loss, no more the limpid streams
Their music babble to the beechen shade,
But in a firm, an icy bond are laid
Their curling waters; leafless are the trees
Which lately seem'd so gay, the cooling breeze
Of genial summer's gone, the wintry blast,
And howling tempest reign, Autumn is past,
And all its joys; but there to us remains
Of social comforts, when the beating rains,
And falling hail-stones drive the wand'rer home;
Yet there are some, whose lot it is to roam,
Unknown, unshelter'd from the tempest's rage,
Save by the blighted hawthorn, dreadful wage

No covering, and their bed the frozen snow:
Still these meet not our pity, can it be
That man should overlook this misery
In man? and shut his door upon the child
Of penury, whilst o'er the distant wild
No hut, no hamlet, no kind home is near
To shelter it? and must the falling tear,
And the heart-rending sigh, in vain appeal
To fellow mortals? are there hearts of steel
So obdurate as this? Ye flaunting gay,
Whom nought but joy surrounds, turn not away
From such distress: your winter will arrive
When all the foolish lessons pleasures give
Will nought avail you, then, unfriended, then Remember years and days long past; and when,
The desolate in you found no relief,
The poor no comfort, all the rising grief
They pour'd into your ears; they told in vain
That day may come to you, a lengthen'd train
Of penury, disease, and care, your tears
Will flow on furrow'd cheeks 'till hapless years
Shall close the scene, thy end and certain lot,—
By man detested till by man forgot.

EMILY T.

Nor does my vanity end here; as I perambulated the Old Church yard this day, the merry peal of the bells drew from me the accompanying Sonnet.

How sweet yon sounds, that once pleas'd many a seer
Of old, come floating 'long the river's side,
Pealing harmonious on the list'ning ear—
How lightly on the curling winds they ride;
But time shall pass, and each succeeding year
These notes shall flow across the Mersey's tide
When other feet shall tread yon jutting Pier,
And we, in the cold sepulchre, lay side by side—
For soon shall other people rise and tread
The steps in which we've trod, another race
Shall trample under foot the mouldering head;
The very one that fill'd his vacant place,
Till time revolves, and in their turn they lay
Their bodies with their fathers in the moisten'd clay.

Welcome readers, and ye fair ones who smile benignantly upon the strains of one, who once knew no greater pleasure than that arising from the company of the brightest ornament of creation, Woman; a merry Christmas and a happy new year to you all; may ten thousand joys be showered upon your head, and may the current of life glide as smoothly with you all, as it has with

SONG.

Tune.—"In my Cottage near a wood."

See, stern Winter comes apace!
Nature wears a sullen face;
Now yon row of leafless trees,
Bend beneath the western breeze;
From the rude tempestuous wind,
Oft they've screen'd the cot behind,
Where in beauty-bright array'd,
Dwells my bonny blue-ey'd Maid.
When the bright refulgent sun
His diurnal course has run;
While the linnet pours his lay
Sweetly from the hawthorn spray;
List'ning to his warbling strain,
Oft I trip across the plain,
And beneath yon poplar's shade,
Court my bonny blue-ey'd Maid!

Midst Lancastria's beauteous race
Deck'd with each bewitching grace;
Had I now a choice to make,
I my blue ey'd Maid would take!
So enchanting is her air,
She's the fairest of the fair!—
Nature's beauties are pourtray'd,
In my bonny blue-ey'd Maid!

O ye guardian powers of love!—
Smile propitious from above;
Listen to your votary's pray'r,
Deign to bless a loving pair;—
Grant that it may be my lot,
In a little rural cot,
Happily my life to lead,
With my bonny blue-ey'd Maid!

All ye shining orbs of light,
Rulers of the day and night!—
That in spacious circles roll,
'Twixt th' Equator and the Pole:
In your orbits quicker turn,
Usher in th' auspicious morn,
When I shall be happy made,
With my bonny blue-ey'd Maid!

LINES

Addressed to a young Lady, on her sickness, and a hope of her speedy restoration to health.

Where late, the roseate hue of joyous health,
Ting'd thy fair cheek, now, sickness has, by stealth,
Robb'd thee, of that bright jewel, yet hope awhile;
The rose, re-blooming, on thy cheek shall smile.

And when thou dost again the gem possess,
Let purest habits, virgin meekness, press
Upon thy heart, and leave no sickening trace
Of lingering sorrow, on thy beaming face.

So shall my Anna's tide of youthful blood,
Roll rapidly along, in eddying flood
Of innocent delight, and heaven shall bless,
And sever from her bosom deep distress.

Then,—let thy lips breathe gratitude to heav'n,
In fervent strains, for such rich blessings giv'n;
And let the pious pray'r, e'en now,—burst forth;—
And patience crown thee with superior worth.

So shalt thou live below'd, thy circling days,
Glide smoothly on, embalm'd with love and praise;
Perennial sweets, shall fill thy peaceful bow'r,
And heav'n's own manna softly on thee show'r.

And when thy tender heart shall cease to beat,
And death's cold touch absorb the vital heat;
Then shall thy happy soul with speedy flight,
Wing its glad course to realms of glorious light.

ON WINTER.

Clad in silvery array,
Holding high her magic wand,
Ruling with despotic sway,
Earth bows 'neath her with'ring hand:
Goddess of the stormy blast,
And the dark and dreary night;
Bound within thy fetters fast,
Verdure dying owns thy might—

When by thee fair Autumn fell,
O'er her flow'rs she dropp'd a tear;
Rud'd by thee—she knew full well
Soon the fiend her form would rear,
Desolation whose vile breath,
Striketh pestilence around;
Doometh loveliness to death;
Poisoneth the verdant ground.

All that once my heart delighted,
All that once in beauty rose;
Hath by thee fell fiend been blighted;
But destruction's reign shall close.
Soon o'erthrown shall be thy pow'r,
By the thrice celestial maid;
Soon shall come the blissful hour,
When thy fierce hand shall be stay'd,

Lovely daughter of delight,
Come in all thy fairy wiles,
Come, and charm us with thy sight,
Win each bosom with thy smiles:—
The remorseless fiend has fled,
Flow'rs once more bedeck the plain,
Loveliness hath rais'd her head,
Blooming nature lives again!

So in life's precarious round,
Care and sorrow oft appear;
And by these our hearts are bound,
Wringing forth the bitter tear:
Vain we strive 'gainst misery,
All our force too quickly dies;
Till Hope, beauteous Spring like thee,
Smiles—and ev'ry sorrow flies!

VARIETIES.

Origin of Gas Illumination.—In the year 1627, John Hacket and Octavo Strada obtained a patent for rendering coals and wood useful without smoke. There is no evidence to establish in positive terms that illumination by gas was here meant, though the language used seems scarcely open to any other interference; but in a work published at Frankfort in the year 1688, entitled, "Foolish Wisdom, or Wise Folly," we have the conversion of coal and wood into gas and coke, most distinctly claimed as the discovery of a preceding period.

"In Holland there is turf, and in England there are coals, neither of which are good for burning in apartments or in melting houses; I have, however, discovered a method of burning both these into good coals, so that they not only produce no smoke or bad smell; but yield as strong a heat for melting materials as that of wood, and throw out such flames, that a foot of coal shall make a flame ten feet long. This I have demonstrated at the Hague with turf, and proved in England with coal, in the presence of Mr. Boyle, by experiments at Windsor, on a large scale. It deserves also to be remarked, that the Swedes procure their tar from fire wood. I have procured tar from coal, which is in every respect equal to Swedish, and even superior for some purposes. I have tried it both on timber and ropes, and found it very excellent. The King himself ordered a proof of it to be made in his presence.

"This is a thing of very great importance to the English, and the coals, after the tar is extracted, are better for use than before."

Flying in the air.—Though the science of aerostation is of very modern date, yet there is strong reason to believe it was not altogether unknown to the ancients; and of their poets, speaking on the subject, says,

"Thus did of old the adventurous Cretan dare,
With wings not given to man, attempt the air."

Milton, in his History of Britain, speaks of one Elmer, a monk of Malmesbury, who foretold the invasion of William of Normandy, but "who could not foresee when time was the breaking of his own legs, for soaring too high. He, in his youth, strangely aspiring, had made and fitted wings to his hands and feet; with these, on the top of a tower, spread out to gather air, he flew more than a furlong; but the wind being too high, he came fluttering down, to the maiming of his limbs; yet so conceited was he of his art, that he attributed the cause of his fall to the want of a tail, as birds have, which he forgot to make and fix behind him."

In an old book, entitled, "An Account of a Voyage performed by two Monks in the suite of a French Ambassador, to the Kingdom of Siam," we read as follows:

"One day the people at Siam entertained the French ambassador with the display of an excellent fire-work; and towards the conclusion thereof, they informed him they would perform the best piece, which was to blow up the engineer of the fire-work, on a cask, high into the air. As the ambassador thought that the engineer would be killed, he requested they would not perform this best masterpiece, and that he was already well entertained with what he had seen; but they told him he need not be under any apprehension for the engineer's life, as he would suffer no injury; on this, their assurance, the ambassador gave his consent.

"Accordingly, a cask was brought, on the head of which the engineer seated himself, having in his hand a machine, which proved afterwards to be a large umbrella; some gunpowder was placed under the cask, and, on a signal given, it was set on fire, and the cask, with the engineer thereon, rose high in the air; and when at the highest elevation, the engineer opened his umbrella, and descended without any injury."

As every one knows that no such explosion of gunpowder could actually have taken place, without blowing the engineer to atoms, it has been very plausibly conjectured, that in the inside of the cask there must have been an air balloon, by which it was raised so high; that the firing of the gunpowder was but an artificial trick to veil the real means of ascent; and that the umbrella was nothing else but our modern parachute! If so, what becomes of our boasted inventions in aerostatics? for this exhibition at Siam must have taken place nearly a hundred and fifty years ago. The embassy to which the two monks who give this narration were attached, is the same as that which M. Voltaire has described in his works, and which took place in the year 1684.

Bed-ridden Mechanic.—James Sandy, of Alyth in Scotland, was entirely deprived, at an early age, of the use of his limbs; and during a long life, may be said to have been constantly bed-ridden. He contrived, notwithstanding, by dint of great ingenuity, not only to pass his time agreeably, but to render himself a useful member of society. He soon displayed a taste for mechanical pursuits, and contrived, as a work-shop for his operations, a sort of circular bed, the sides of which being raised about eighteen inches above the clothes, were employed as a platform for turning lathes, table vices, and cases for tools of all kinds. His genius for practical mechanics was universal. He was skilled in all sorts of turning; and constructed several very curious lathes, as well as clocks and musical instruments of every description, no less admired for the sweetness of their tone than the elegance of their execution. He excelled, too, in the construction of optical instruments; and made some reflecting telescopes, the specula of which were not inferior to those finished by the most eminent London artists. He suggested some important improvements in the machinery for spinning flax; and we believe he was the first who made the wooden-jointed snuff-boxes, generally called Laureatekirk boxes, some of which, fabricated by this self-taught artist, were purchased, and sent as presents to the royal family. To his other endowments, he added an accurate knowledge of drawing and engraving, and in both these arts, produced specimens of the highest excellence. For upwards of fifty years, he quitted his bed only three times; and on these occasions his house was either inundated with water, or threatened with danger from fire. His curiosity, which was unbounded, prompted him to hatch different kinds of bird's eggs, by the natural warmth of his body, and he afterwards reared the motley broods with all the tenderness of a parent; so that on visiting him, it was no unusual thing to see various singing birds, to which he may be said to have given birth, perched on his head, and warbling the artificial notes he had taught them. Naturally possessed of a good constitution, and an active cheerful turn of mind, his house was the general coffee-room of the village, where the affairs both of church and state, were discussed with the utmost freedom. In consequence of long confinement, his countenance had rather a sickly cast, but it was remarkably expressive, particularly when he was surrounded by his country friends. This singular man had acquired, by his ingenuity and industry, an honourable independence, and died possessed of considerable property. In short, his history holds out this very instructive lesson, that no difficulties are too great to be overcome by industry and perseverance; and that genius, though it should sometimes miss the distinction it deserves, will seldom fail, unless by its own fault, to secure competence and respectability.

SCIENCE, ETC.

Sir Humphrey Davy's Electrical Discoveries.—The electrical researches of Sir Humphrey Davy, begin to assume a very interesting aspect. They have already produced important results; and have given rise to the expectation that we are upon the eve of some very brilliant discovery, which is to change the face of Science.

He has ascertained, by means of a very ingenious apparatus, which he has contrived for the purpose, that even a perfect vacuum is permeable to electricity, and is rendered luminous by either the common spark, or the shock from a Leyden jar. The intensity of the phenomena depends upon the temperature. This fact is curious. When the tube was very hot, the electrical light appeared of a bright green colour, and of great density. It lost its vividness by a diminution of temperature. When the tube was cooled to 20° below zero, the electrical light was so faint, as to require considerable darkness to be perceptible.

Air seems to affect very much the colour of the electric fluid. When air was gradually introduced, the electrical light changed from green, to sea green, then to blue, and afterwards to purple.—The quantity of the electrical fluid was, in every case, found to be the same.

At all temperatures below 200°, the mercurial vacuum was a much worse conductor, than highly rarefied air.

Sir Humphrey concludes that, "it is evident from the general results of my investigation, that the light, and probably the heat, generated in electrical discharges, depends principally on some properties or substances belonging to the ponderable matter through which it passes; but they prove likewise, that space, where there is no appreciable quantity of this matter, is capable of exhibiting electrical phenomena; and, under this point of view, they are favourable to the ideas of the phenomena of electricity being produced by a highly subtle fluid or fluids, of which the particles are repulsive, with respect to each other, and attractive of the particles of other matter."

In the same communication, Sir Humphrey offers some additional proofs in favour of a law discovered by Newton. Experimenting with water, chloride of phosphorus, and sulphuret of carbon, he "had no doubt," that the decrements of temperature in vapours being in arithmetical progression, the diminution of density is in geometrical progression.—This law is of much importance. It has been often disputed, or received with suspicion.

Crayon Pencils.—"The finest grained charcoal that can be procured is sawed into slips of the size and form required, and put into a pipkin of melted bees' wax, where they are permitted to remain near a slow fire for half an hour or more, in proportion to the thickness of the charcoal: they are then taken out, and when perfectly cool, are fit for use. By adding a small quantity of rosin to the wax, they may be made considerably harder; and on the contrary, they are made softer by a little butter or tallow. Drawings with them are as permanent as with ink, and not liable to injury by being rubbed or remaining in the damp."

ORIGINAL CHARADE.

BY A LADY.

My First, when present, you may call your own,
Improve the passing vagrant as it flies;
Thus will a wise regard be truly shewn
To that immortal part which never dies.

From a rude mass, my Second claims its birth,
Yet rises beautiful and fair to see;
O! let your consciences, ye sons of earth,
In my best property resemble Me.

My Whole's a peaceful, unobtrusive friend,
Whose silent admonitions, well regarded,
May help you to pursue your being's end,
And gain that place where virtue is rewarded.

A REBUS.

BY THE SAME.

A wretch that robs by night, and cheats by day,
And loves to make the honest man his prey;
A passion that deforms the fairest face,
And robs the brightest beauty of its grace;
Another, that o'erwhelms the heart with grief,
And often flies to death to seek relief;
A quality that on its owner's face
Writes its own name in characters of brass;
An animal both treacherous and sly,
That in its benefactor's face will fly;
A state of things where order is reversed,
And knaves and fools with liberty are cursed;
A most notorious enemy to truth,
Instilling poison in the ear of youth.
The seven initials join'd will bring to sight
A whole, where all these different parts unite;
With mischief fraught, and to complete the group,
A boasting coward, and a silly dupe.

REMARKABLE DAYS.

MONDAY 6—Epiphany, or Twelfth Day.

The rites of this day, the name of which signifies an appearance of light, or a manifestation, are different in various places, but all in honour of the Eastern Magi. There is a very antient and singular custom, in various parts of the continent, which takes place on the eve of the Epiphany, and is performed in the following manner:—A cake, made of flour, butter, and eggs, and of a size proportionable to the number of the guests, is brought in and divided into as many shares as "convives" are going to sit down to supper. These pieces, one of which conceals a bean lodged in the outer part of the cake, are tossed up in a napkin. The youngest person in the company comes forward, and having said grace, takes hold of a slice without looking at it, and then addresses the master of the house by these words:—'Faber Domine (lord of the bean), who is this for?' An answer is given, and when all the shares are drawn, the guest who finds the bean in his or her possession is declared king or queen of the feast, and becomes possessed of all the right belonging to the president for the night. When either drinks, if any one in the company omits to say aloud "the king" or "the queen drinks," a fine is lawfully exacted, which consists in a pledge deposited in the hands of some one, to be redeemed after supper by a kiss, or a song. This sort of amusement was well known at Rome, with this difference, that the king of the feast was not chosen by means of a bean, but by the cast of small bones called tali. They are the ankle-bones of sheep, which schoolboys in France still use for a game called osselets; having been previously smoothed upon a stone, and reduced to four sides. The tesseræ, dice, have six. Horace says, Carm. lib. 1, od. 4:—

But when you sink to Pluto's hall,
No little rattling bones shall fall
To choose you Monarch of the wine.

WEDNESDAY, 8.—Saint Lucian.

Lucian, a native of Syria, was celebrated in his youth for his eloquence, and intimate acquaintance with polite literature. After the death of his parents, he gave all his fortune to the poor, and confined himself to the study of the scriptures. He was a proficient in the Hebrew, and revised the Septuagint version of the Bible. He wrote an apology for the Christians, and presented it to Maximinus II. After having undergone various torments at the instigation of this emperor, he was martyred in the year 312.

PROVERBS.

The following very interesting article is abridged from Mr. D'Israeli's chapter of "THE PHILOSOPHY OF PROVERBS."

Proverbs must be distinguished from proverbial phrases, and from sententious maxims; but as proverbs have many faces, from their miscellaneous nature, the class itself scarcely admits of any definition. When Johnson defined a proverb to be "a short sentence frequently repeated by the people," this definition would not include the most curious ones, which have not always circulated among the populace, nor even belong to them; nor does it designate the vital qualities of a proverb. The pithy quaintness of old Howell has admirably described the ingredients of an exquisite proverb to be sense, shortness, and salt. A proverb is distinguished from a maxim or an apophthegm, by that brevery which condenses a thought or a metaphor, where one thing is said and another is to be applied which often produces wit; and that quick pungency which excites surprise, but strikes with conviction; which gives it an epigrammatic turn. George Herbert entitled the small collection which he formed "Jacula Prudentum," Darts or Javelins! something hurled and striking deeply; a characteristic of a proverb which possibly Herbert may have borrowed from a remarkable passage in Plato's dialogue of "Protagoras, or the Sophists."

It is evident, however, that the earliest writings of every people are marked by their most homely, or domestic proverbs; for these were more directly addressed to their wants. Franklin, who may be considered as the founder of a people, who were suddenly placed in that stage of civil society which as yet could afford no literature, discovered the philosophical cast of his genius, when he filled his almanacks with proverbs, by the ingenious contrivance of framing them into a connected discourse, delivered by an old man attending an auction. "These proverbs," he tells us, "which contained the wisdom of many ages and nations, when their scattered counsels were brought together, made a great impression. They were reprinted in Britain, in a large sheet of paper, and stuck up in houses; and were twice translated in France, and distributed among their poor parishioners." The same occurrence had happened with us ere we became a reading people. Much later even than the reign of Elizabeth our ancestors had proverbs always before them, on every thing which had room for a piece of advice on it; they had them painted in their tapestries, stamped on the most ordinary utensils, on the blades of their knives, the borders of their plates, and "conned them out of goldsmith's rings." The usurer, in Robert Greene's "Groat's worth of Wit," compressed all his philosophy into the circle of his ring, having learnt sufficient Latin to understand the proverbial motto of "Tu tibi cura!" The husband was reminded of his lordly authority when he only looked into his trencher, one of its learned aphorisms having descended to us,—

"The calmest husbands make the stormiest wives."

The English proverbs of the populace, most of which are still in circulation, were collected by old JOHN HEYWOOD. They are arranged by TOSSEY for "the parlour—the guest's chamber—the hall—table-lessons," &c. Not a small portion of our ancient proverbs were adapted to rural life, when our ancestors lived more than ourselves amidst the works of God, and less among those of men. At this time, one of our old statesmen, in commending the art of compressing a tedious discourse into a few significant phrases, suggests the use of proverbs in diplomatic intercourse, convinced of the great benefit which would result to the negotiators themselves, as well as to others! I give a literary curiosity of this kind. A member of the house of commons, in the reign of Elizabeth, made a speech entirely composed of the most homely proverbs. The subject was a bill against double-payments of book-debts. Knavish tradesmen were then in the habit of swelling out their book-debts with those who took credit, particularly to their younger customers. One of the members who began to speak "for very fear shoo," and stood silent. This nervous orator was followed by a blunt and true representative of the famous governor of Barataria, delivering himself thus—"It is now my chance to speak something, and that without humming or hawing. I think this law is a good law. Even reckoning makes long friends. As far goes the penny as the penny's master. Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt. Pay the reckoning over-night, and you shall not be troubled in the morning. If ready money be mensura publica, let every one cut his coat according to his cloth. When his old suit is in the wane, let him stay till that his money bring a new suit in the increase."

Among the middle classes of society to this day, we may observe that certain family proverbs are traditionally preserved: the favourite saying of a father is repeated by the sons; and frequently the conduct of a whole generation has been influenced by such domestic proverbs. This may be perceived in many of the mottoes of our old nobility, which seem to have originated in some habitual proverb of the founder of the family. In ages when proverbs were most prevalent, such pithy sentences would admirably serve in the ordinary business of life, and lead on to decision, even in its greater exigencies.

Proverbs were at length consigned to the people, when books were addressed to scholars; but the people did not find themselves so destitute of practical wisdom, by preserving their national proverbs, as some of those closet students who had ceased to repeat them. The various humours of mankind, in the mutability of human affairs, had given birth to every species; and men were wise, or merry, or satirical, and mourned or rejoiced in proverbs. Nations held an universal intercourse of proverbs, from the eastern to the western world; for we discover among these which appear strictly national many which are common to them all. Of our own familiar ones several may be tracked among the snows of the Latins and the Greeks, and have sometimes been drawn from "The Mimes of the East." Like decayed families which remain in obscurity, they may boast of a high lineal descent whenever they recover their lost time-debts. The vulgar proverb "To carry coals to Newcastle," local and idiomatic as it appears, however, has been borrowed and applied by ourselves; it may be found among the Persians: in the "Bustan of Sadi" we have Infers piper in Hindustan; "To carry pepper to Hindustan;" among the Hebrews, "To carry oil to a city of olives;" a similar proverb occurs in Greek; and in Galland's "Maxims of the East" we may discover how many of the most common proverbs among us, as well as some of Joe Miller's jests, are of oriental origin.

The interest we may derive from the study of proverbs is not confined to their universal truths, nor to their poignant pleasantry; a philosophical mind will discover in proverbs a great variety of the most curious knowledge. The manners of a people are painted after life in their domestic proverbs; and it would not be advancing too much to assert, that the genius of the age might be often detected in its prevalent ones. The learned Selden tells us, that the proverbs of several nations were much studied by Bishop Andrews; the reason assigned was, because "by them he knew the minds of several nations, which," said he, "is a brave thing, as we count him wise who knows the minds and the insides of men, which is done by knowing what is habitual to them." Lord Bacon condensed a wide circuit of philosophical thought, when he observed that "the genius, wit, and spirit of a nation are discovered by their proverbs."

The ancient, perhaps, the extinct spirit of Englishmen, was once expressed by our proverb, "Better be the head of a dog than the tail of a lion;" i. e. the first of the yeomanry rather than the last of the gentry. A foreign philosopher might have discovered our own ancient skill in archery among our proverbs; for none but true toxophilotes could have had such a proverb as, "I will either make a shaft or a bolt of it!" signifying, says the author of Ivanhoe, a determination to make one use or other of the thing spoken of. The bolt was the arrow peculiarly fitted to the cross-bow, as that of the long-bow was called a shaft. These instances sufficiently demonstrate that the characteristic circumstances and feelings of a people are discovered in their popular notions, are stamped on their familiar proverbs.

It is also evident that the peculiar, and often idiomatic, humour of a people is best preserved in their proverbs. There is a shrewdness, although deficient in delicacy, in the Scottish proverbs; they are idiomatic, facetious, and strike home. Kelly, who has collected three thousand, informs us, that, in 1735, the Scotch were a great proverbial nation; for that few among the better sort will converse any considerable time, but will confirm every assertion and observation with a Scottish proverb. The speculative spirit of our own times have probably degenerated in accidental lore, and deem themselves much wiser in their proverbs. They may reply by a Scotch proverb on proverbs, made by a great man in Scotland, having given a splendid entertainment, "He told that 'Fools make feasts, and fools eat them'; but he readily answered, 'Wise men make proverbs, and fools repeat them!'"

National humour, frequently local, depends on the artificial habits of society, and is site to each other; but there is a national

the populace, always true to nature, preserve, even among the gravest people. The Arabian proverb, "The barber leaves his art on the orphan's face;" the Chinese, "In a field of melons do not pull up your shoe; under a plum-tree do not adjust your cap;"—to impress caution in our conduct under circumstances of suspicion;—and the Hebrew one, "He that hath had one of his family hanged may not say to his neighbour, hang up this fish!" are all instances of this sort of humour.

There is another source of national characteristics, frequently producing strange or whimsical combinations; a people, from a very natural circumstance, have drawn their proverbs from local objects, or from allusions to peculiar customs. The influence of manners and customs over the ideas and language of a people would form a subject of extensive and curious research. There is a Japanese proverb, that "A fog cannot be dispelled with a fan!" Had we not known the origin of this proverb, it would be evident that it could only have occurred to a people who had constantly before them fogs and fans; and the fact appears that fogs are frequent on the coast of Japan; and that from the age of five years both sexes carry fans. The Spaniards have an odd proverb to describe those who tease and vex a person before they do him the very benefit which they are about to confer—acting kindly, but speaking roughly; Mostrar primero la horca que el lugar, "To show the gallows before they show the town;" a circumstance alluding to their small towns, which have a gallows placed on an eminence, so that the gallows breaks on the eye of the traveller before he gets a view of the town itself.

The Cheshire proverb on marriage, "Better wed over the mixon than over the moor," that is, at home or in its vicinity; mixon alludes to the dung, &c. in the farm-yard, while the road from Chester to London is over the moorland in Staffordshire; this local proverb is a curious instance of provincial pride, perhaps of wisdom, to induce the gentry of that county to form intermarriages; to prolong their own ancient families, and perpetuate ancient friendships between them.

In the Isle of Man a proverbial expression forcibly indicates the object constantly occupying the minds of the inhabitants. The two Deemsters or judges, when appointed to the chair of judgment, declare they will render justice between man and man "as equally as the herring bone lies between the two sides;" an image which could not have occurred to any people unaccustomed to the herring-fishery. There is a Cornish proverb, "Those who will not be ruled by the rudder must be ruled by the rock"—the strands of Cornwall, so often covered with wrecks, could not fail to impress on the imaginations of its inhabitants the two objects from whence they drew this salutary proverb, against obstinate wrong-heads.

The Italians apply a proverb to a person who, while he is beaten, takes the blows quietly:—

Per beato ch' elle non furon peche!
"Luckily they were not peaches!"

And to threaten to give a man—

Una pecca in un occhio,
"A peach in the eye,"

means to give him a thrashing. This proverb, it is said, originated in the close of a certain droll adventure. The community of the Castle Poggibonsi, probably from some jocular tenure observed on St. Bernard's day, pay a tribute of peaches to the court of Tuscany, which are usually shared among the ladies in waiting, and the pages of the court. It happened one season, in a great scarcity of peaches, that the good people of Poggibonsi, finding them rather dear, sent, instead of the customary tribute, a quantity of fine juicy figs, which was so much disapproved of by the pages, that as soon as they got hold of them, they began in rage to empty the baskets on the heads of the ambassadors of the Poggibonsi, who, in attempting to fly as well as they could from the pulpy shower, half-blinded, and recollecting that peaches would have had stones in them, cried out—

Per beato ch' elle non furon peche!
"Luckily they were not peaches!"

The Scotch proverb, "He that invented the maiden first hanged it," that is, got the first of it! The maiden is that well-known beheading engine, revived by the French surgeon Guillotine. This proverb may be applied to one who falls a victim to his own ingenuity; the artificer of his own destruction! The inventor was James, Earl of Morton, who for some years governed Scotland, and afterwards, it is said, very unjustly suffered by his own invention. It is a striking coincidence, that the same fate was shared by the French reviver; both alike sad examples of disturbed times? Among our own proverbs a remarkable incident has been commemorated; Hand over head, as men took the Covenant! This preserves the manner in which the Scotch covenant, so famous in our history, was violently taken by above sixty thousand persons about Edinburgh, in 1638; a circumstance at that time novel in our own revolutionary history, and afterwards paralleled by the French in voting by "acclamation."

Among these historical proverbs none are more interesting than those which perpetuate national events, connected with those of another people. When a Frenchman would let us understand that he has settled with his creditors, the proverb is, J'ai payé tous mes Anglois: "I have paid all my English." This proverb originated when John, the French king, was taken prisoner by our Black Prince. Levies of money were made for the king's ransom, and for many French lords; and the French people have thus perpetuated the military glory of our nation, and their own idea of it, by making the English and their creditors synonymous terms. Another relates to the same event—Ore le Pape est devenu François, et Jesu Christ Anglois: "Now the Pope is become French and Jesus Christ English;" a proverb which arose when the Pope, exiled from Rome, held his court at Avignon in France; and the English prospered so well, that they possessed more than half the kingdom. The Spanish proverb concerning England is well known—

Con todo el mundo guerra,
Y paz con Inglaterra!
"War with the world,
And peace with England!"

Whether this proverb was one of the results of their memorable armada, and was only coined after their conviction of the splendid folly which they had committed, I cannot ascertain. England must always have been a desirable ally to Spain against her potent rival and neighbour. The Italians have a proverb, which formerly, at least, was strongly indicative of the travelled Englishman in their country, Inghilterra è un diavolo incarnato: "The Italianized Englishman is a devil incarnate." Formerly there existed a closer intercourse between our country and Italy, than with France. Before and during the reigns of Elizabeth and James the First, that land of the elegant arts modelled our taste and manners; and more Italians travelled into England, and were more constant residents, from commercial concerns, than afterwards when France assumed a higher rank in Europe by her political superiority. This cause will sufficiently account for the number of Italian proverbs relating to England, which show an intimacy with our manners which could not else have occurred. It was probably some sarcastic Italian, and, perhaps, horologist, who, to describe the disagreement of persons, proverbized our nation—"They agree like the clocks of London!" We were once better famed for merry Christmas and their pies; and it must have been Italians, who had been domiciliated with us who gave currency to the proverb—Ha più da fare che i forni di natale in Inghilterra: "He has more business than English ovens at Christmas." Our pie-loving gentry were notorious, and Shakespeare's folio was usually laid open in the great halls of our nobility to entertain their attendants, who devoured at once Shakespeare and their pasty. Some of these volumes have come down to us, not only with the stains, but enclosing even the identical pie-crusts of the Elizabethan age.

Proverbs have ceased to be studied, or employed in conversation, since the time we have derived our knowledge from books; but in a philosophical age they appear to offer infinite subjects for speculative curiosity: originating in various eras, these memorials of manners, of events, and of modes of thinking, for historical as well as for moral purposes, still retain a strong hold on our attention. The collected knowledge of successive ages, and of different people, must always enter into some part of our own! Truth and nature never can be obsolete.

Proverbs embrace the wide sphere of human existence, they take all the colours of life, they are often exquisite strokes of genius, they delight by their airy sarcasm or their caustic satire, the luxuriance of their humour, the playfulness of their turn, and even by the elegance of their imagery, and the tenderness of their sentiment. They give a deep insight into domestic life, and open for us the heart of man, in all the various states which he may occupy—a frequent review of Proverbs should enter into our readings; and although they are no longer the ornaments of conversation, they have not ceased to be the treasures of Thought!

REJOICINGS UPON THE NEW YEAR'S COMING OF AGE.

FROM THE LONDON MAGAZINE.

The Old Year being dead, and the New Year coming of age, which he does, by Calendar Law, as soon as the breath is out of the old gentleman's body, nothing would serve the young spark but he must give a dinner upon the occasion, to which all the Days in the year were invited. The Festivals, whom he deputed as his Stewards, were mightily taken with the notion. They had been engaged time out of mind, they said, in providing mirth and good cheer for mortals below; and it was time they should have a taste of their own bounty. It was stiffly debated among them, whether the Fasts should be admitted. Some said, the appearance of such lean, starved guests, with their mortified faces, would pervert the ends of the meeting. But the objection was overruled by Christmas Day, who had a design upon Ash Wednesday (as you shall hear), and a mighty desire to see how the old Domine would behave himself in his cups. Only the Vigils were requested to come with their lanterns, to light the gentlefolks home at night.

All the Days came to their day. Covers were provided for three hundred and sixty-five guests at the principal table; with an occasional knife and fork at the side-board for the Twenty-Ninth of February.

I should have told you, that cards of invitation had been issued. The carriers were the Hours; twelve little, merry, whirligig foot-pages, as you should desire to see, that went all round, and found out the persons invited well enough, with the exception of Easter Day, Shrove Tuesday, and a few such Moveables, who had lately shifted their quarters.

Well, they all met at last, foul Days, fine Days, all sorts of Days, and a rare din they made of it. There was nothing but, Hail! fellow Day, well met—brother Day—sister Day,—only Lady Day kept a little on the aloof, and seemed somewhat scornful. Yet some said, Twelfth Day cut her out and out, for she came in a tiffany suit, white and gold, like a Queen on a frost-oak, all royal, glittering, and Epiphanous. The rest came, some in green, some in white—but old Lent and his family were not yet out of mourning. Rainy Days came in, dripping, and sunshiny Days helped them to change their stockings. Wedding Day was there in his marriage finery, a little the worse for wear; Pay Day came late, as he always does; and Doomsday sent word—he might be expected.

April Fool (as my young lord's jester) took upon himself to marshal the guests, and wild work he made with it. It would have posed old Era-Pater to have found out any given Day in the year, to erect a scheme upon—good Days, bad Days, were so shuffled together, to the confounding of all sober horoscopy.

He had stuck the Twenty First of June next to the Twenty Second of December, and the former looked like a Maypole siding a marrow-bone. Ash Wednesday got wedged in (as was concerted) betwixt Christmas and Lord Mayor's Days. Lord! how he laid about him! Nothing but harons of beef and turkeys would go down with him—to the great greasing and detriment of his new sackcloth bib and tucker. And still Christmas Day was at his elbow, plying him with the wasail-bowl, till he roared, and hiccup'd, and protested there was no faith in dried ling, but commended it to the devil for a sour, windy, acrimonious, censorious, hypo-crit-crit-critical mess, and no dish for a gentleman. Then he dipt his fist into the middle of the great cartard that stood before his left-hand neighbour, and dandied his hungry beard all over with it, till you would have taken him for the Last Day in December, it so hung in iocules.

At another part of the table, Shrove Tuesday was helping the Second of September to some cock broth,—which courtesy the latter returned with the delicate thigh of a hen pheasant—so there was no love lost for that matter. The Last of Lent was spunging upon Shrovetide's pancakes; which April Fool perceiving, told him he did well, for pancakes were proper to a good fry-day.

In another part, a hubbub arose about the Thirtieth of January, who, it seems, being a sour puritanic character, that thought nobody's meat good or sanctified enough for him, had smuggled into the room a calf's head, which he had had cooked at home for that purpose, thinking to feast thereon incontinently; but as it lay in the dish, March Manyweathers, who is a very fine lady, and subject to the megrims, suddenly screamed out there was a "human head in the platter," and raved about Herodias' daughter to that degree, that the obnoxious viand was obliged to be removed; nor did she recover her stomach till she had gulped down a Restorative, concocted of Oak Apple, which the merry Twenty Ninth of May always carries about with him for that purpose.

The King's health being called for after this, a notable dispute arose between the Twelfth of August (a zealous old Whig gentlewoman), and the Twenty Third of April (a new-fangled lady of the Tory stamp), as to which of them should have the honour to propose it. August grew hot upon the matter, affirming time out of mind the prescriptive right to have lain with her, till her rival had basely supplanted her; whom she represented as little better than a kept mistress, who went about in fine clothes, while she (the legitimate BIRTHDAY) had scarcely a rag, &c.

April Fool, being made mediator, confirmed the right in the strongest form of words to the appellant, but decided for peace's sake that the exercise of it should remain with the present possessor. At the same time, he slyly rounded the first lady in the ear, that an action might lie against the Crown for bi-geny.

It beginning to grow a little duskish, Crumdelemas lustily bawled out for lights, which was opposed by all the Days, who protested against burning day-light. Then fair water was handed round in silver ewers, and the same lady was observed to take an unusual time in washing herself.

May Day, with that sweetness which is peculiar to her, in a neat speech proposing the health of the founder, crowned her goblet (and by her example the rest of the company) with garlands. This being done, the lordly New Year from the upper end of the table, in a cordial but somewhat lofty tone, returned thanks. He felt proud on an occasion of meeting so many of his worthy father's late tenants, promised to improve their farms, and at the same time to abate (if any thing was found unreasonable) in their rents.

At the mention of this, the four Quarter Days involuntarily looked at each other, and smiled; April Fool whistled to an old tune of "New Brooms;" and a surly old rebel at the further end of the table (who was discovered to be no other than the Fifth of November), muttered out distinctly enough to be heard by the whole company, words to this effect, that, "when the old one is gone, he is a fool that looks for a better." Which rudeness of his the guests resenting unanimously voted his expulsion; and the male-content was thrust out neck and heels into the cellar, as the proper place for such a boute-fus and firebrand as he had shown himself.

Order being restored—the young lord (who, to say truth, had been a little ruffled, and put beside his oratory) in as few, and yet as obliging words as possible, assured them of entire welcome; and, with a graceful turn, singling out poor Twenty Ninth of February, that had sate all this while mum-chance at the side board, begged to couple his health with that of the good company before him—which he drank accordingly; observing, that he had not seen his honest face any time these four years, with a number of endearing expressions besides. At the same time, removing the solitary Day from the forlorn seat which had been assigned him, he stationed him at his own board, somewhere between the Greek Calends and Latter Lammas.

Ash Wednesday, being now called upon for a song, with his eyes fast stuck in his head, and as well as the Canary he had swallowed would give him leave, stuck up a Carol, which Christmas Day had taught him for the nonce; and was followed by the latter, who gave "Miserere" in fine style, hitting off the mumping tones and lengthened drawl of Old Mortification with infinite humour. April Fool swore they had exchanged conditions: but Good Friday was observed to look extremely grave; and Sunday held her fan before her face, that she might not be seen to smile.

Shrove-tide, Lord Mayor's Day, and April Fool, next joined in a glee—

Which is the properest day to drink?

In which all the Days chiming in, made a merry burden.

They next fell to quibbles and conundrums. The question being proposed, who had the greatest number of followers—the Quarter Days said, there could be no question as to that; for they had all the creditors in the world dogging their heels. But April Fool gave it in favour of the Forty Days before Easter; because the debtors in all cases out-numbered the creditors, and they kept lent all the year.

All this while, Valentine's Day kept courting pretty May, who sate next him, slipping amorous billets-doux under the table, till the Dog Days (who are naturally of a warm constitution) began to be jealous, and to bark and rage exceedingly. April Fool, who likes a bit of sport above measure, and had some pretensions to the lady besides, as being but a cousin once removed,—clapped and halloo'd them on; and as fast as their indignation cooled, those mad wags, the Ember Days, were at it with their bellows, to blow it into a flame; and all was in a ferment: till old Madam Septuagesima (who boasts herself the Mother of the Days) wisely diverted the conversation with a tedious tale of the lovers which she could reckon when she was young; and of one Master Rogation Day in particular, who was for ever putting the question to her, but she kept him at a distance, as the chronicle would tell—by which I apprehend she meant the Almanack. Then she rambled on to the Days that were gone, the good old Days, and so to the Days before the flood—which plainly showed her old head to be little better than crazed and dolted.

Day being ended, the Days called for their cloaks and great coats, and took their leaves. Lord Mayor's Day went off in a Mist, as usual; Shortest Day in a deep black Fog, that wrapt the little gentleman all round like a hedge-hog. Two Vigils—so watchmen are called in heaven—saw Christmas Day safe home—they had been used to the business before. Another Vigil—a stout, sturdy patrol, called the Eve of St. Christopher—seeing Ash Wednesday in a condition little better than he should be, e'en whipt him over his shoulders, pick-a-back fashion, and Old Mortification went floating home, singing—and a number of old snatches besides, between drunk and sober, but very few Aves or Penitentiaries (you may believe me) were among them. Longest Day set off westward in beautiful crimson and gold—the rest, some in one fashion, some in another;—but Valentine and pretty May took their departure together in one of the prettiest silvery twilights a Lover's Day would wish to set in.

On the bat's back do I fly,

Thursday, 2nd.—The Stranger: with the Libertine.

Friday, 3rd.—Wild Oats: with the Libertine.

On Monday night Mr. Clason appeared as Jaffier, in the Tragedy of Venice Preserved. However correctly this gentleman may conceive of the spirit of the character, his voice has not that scope which is necessary to mark the several shades of emphasis, and to swell into impassioned eloquence. Neither does his countenance exhibit the conflicting passions which distract the soul and give expression and energy to each tone and fibre; we perceive a lightness, and, in his most tragic moments, an unaccountable coldness in almost every feature. His action is sometimes, but not generally, appropriate; however, this objection might be removed by practice; but the former are impediments which appear, to us, insuperable.

The Painting in the Opera of the LIBERTINE is beautiful; particularly the Garden, Moonlight, Piazza, and Banquet-Hall Scenery. But we think there is a manifest impropriety in presuming to introduce a representation of the 'Infernal Regions'; indeed, the Scene accords as little with taste as with sound judgment.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The author of the Confessions of an English Opium Eater, announces the speedy appearance of his Prolegomena to all future Systems of Political Economy, the publication of which has been so long delayed by his illness.

The new novel of the Great Unknown is not to appear, we understand, till the middle of January. The story, we believe, belongs to the reign of our Second Charles, at the particular period of the Popish Plot. The picture of those times of courtly folly and vice—the character of Charles himself, and the extraordinary features of the favourite Buckingham—afford fine grounds for our unequalled Novel-historian.

The new Poem from the pen of Mr. Barry Cornwall, will appear very early this season.

The Works of Shakespeare are about to be printed in Miniature volumes, uniformly with the Spenser Classics.

Letters from the Caucasus and Georgia. With a map and views.

Mr. James Malcolm purposes publishing by Subscription, in 2 vols. 8vo. The Past and Present State of the Agriculture of the County of Surrey.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The "Review" by "Dramaticus" cannot be inserted.—Should D. really intend what he professes, we see no reason why he should hesitate to cast off a disguise, which in the most favourable view, must be considered suspicious and unfair.—With much of D.'s criticism we agree, and his knowledge and general competency we admit; but is he not hyper-critical? We do not profess to eulogise where censure is due; neither would we conceal a defect which, by being exhibited, might be corrected; but, where improvement is impracticable, and "our patience" not likely to be again "exhausted," why indulge in the keenest invective? The "Epic Sentimentation" of our Liverpool "Juvenis" is received, and shall appear in due course.

A press of interesting matter precludes us from acknowledging several articles received this week.—Our esteemed correspondents shall be duly noticed in our next.

Our Liverpool readers are assured that the irregular delivery of the Iris of last Saturday, is not at all attributable to us. At the Coach Office the parcel was put into a North Coach, and the mistake not discovered until its arrival at Preston.

POPE.

ON the subject of style there exists in the Club a difference of opinion similar to that which, in the time of Cicero, divided the Roman orators into two parties, one of which admired the Asiatic, the other, the Attic manner of writing. Some of our members, and the president and antiquary in particular, are the advocates of stately and dignified composition, and consider Dr. Johnson, and the writers who resemble him, as the best exemplars of eloquent English. The secretary and some others are professed admirers of simplicity in writing, and look upon Mr. Addison as having produced the finest specimens of elegant composition which have appeared in our language. It is a natural consequence of this difference of opinion that, whenever a paper is read at our meeting, one part of the members are desirous of giving to the language a more sonorous and magniloquent expression, while the others are contriving to substitute, for the lengthy and uncommon words of their opponents, some phrase which, without being mean or vulgar, may express with more simplicity, the meaning of the author. The contests, on these occasions, are often warm; and it is amusing to hear the charges of turgidity or tameness, bombast or vulgarity, which are alternately brought by the contending parties against the emendations proposed by their antagonists. As is the case in all controversies, it is not uncommon for the original subject of dispute to be forgotten in the course of the discussion; and it frequently happens that a difference of opinion with respect to two modes of expression leads to an extended debate on the subject of English style in general.

The President, a little moved perhaps by some remark from the advocates of an easy and simple style, is usually the first to quit the immediate subject of dispute, and enter upon a wider field of discussion. At such times he collects all the dignity and importance of his manner, and looking round with that air of authority which is in him becoming, because it appears to be natural, delivers himself slowly, and with a measured cadence, to the following effect.

"So long as it shall be the end of composition to adorn and dignify a subject, so long will that mode of communicating his sentiments by which this end is most completely obtained be preferred by a judicious and skilful writer. Such a writer will not derive his modes of expression from the loose phraseology of conversation; or employ words of hackneyed and common occurrence. He will be aware that the language of ordinary life is debased by its association with mean and vulgar objects, and that it is, from that circumstance, unfit for the purposes of elevated or elegant composition. Leaving, therefore, that language to its only legitimate and allowable use, to be the medium of communicating the common sentiments of mankind, in their ordinary colloquial intercourse, he will seek for the words which he employs, and for the phrases by which his thoughts are to be advantageously communicated to the public, in the writings of those authors who have, at different periods, enlarged the meaning, and increased the dignity of the English language. He will derive his modes of expression from the sacred remains of those writers, whose works have been so justly and emphatically characterised as the well-springs of English undefiled. From works deeply imbued with the spirit of classic lore, and rich in words and phrases at once noble and expressive; ample in their meaning, as they are dignified and sonorous in pronunciation. He will, I admit, judiciously avoid those inaccuracies, into which the great, but early masters of our tongue have sometimes fallen. He will correct, by the rules of modern criticism, the license which was not only allowable, but appears graceful and admirable in their imperishable works. In making these corrections, and in the general formation of his style, he will, I conceive, find a peculiar advantage in taking for his model the invaluable productions of Dr. Johnson. From them certainly he may best acquire such a command of the English language as should be possessed by every one who aspires to the attainment of an eloquent style. No other writer has, in my opinion, so fully exemplified the dignity and richness of which our language is capable, or so variously exhibited the power of style to give elevation to common subjects, and to add to the importance of those which are in themselves noble. In short, when I consider the uncommon excellence of this great writer, I do not hesitate to pronounce that the student of composition who shall form himself upon the model of Dr. Johnson's prose writings will acquire a style, as far superior to that of Mr. Addison, as a magnificent palace, the finished work of some great architect, is superior to a cottage however simply elegant the latter may appear."

The Secretary, who possesses one qualification which, in the opinion of Bayle, is essential to a good disputant—that of patiently hearing his adversary; always listens with attention, and with an air of deference, to the remarks of the President, and generally, after a little pause, replies somewhat as follows.

"I think it will be allowed that the first requisite of composition is to convey the meaning of the writer with clearness and precision. I do not mean that these qualities are of themselves sufficient to constitute a good style, but I think that no style can be good in which they do not appear. Now clearness and precision appear to me most effectually to be attained by the use of such words as are of common occurrence, but which are at the same time free from any taint of vulgarity. The meaning of such words is more fully understood by all classes of readers than the meaning of antique expressions, or of those sounding words which are derived from the learned languages. With respect to the construction of sentences, that mode of arranging words which is the least artificial will, I think, generally be most perspicuous. It is therefore my opinion, that a writer who desires to please the community, and to obtain general popularity, should avoid unusual and learned words; and endeavour to make choice of such as are familiar but not mean; and that he should aim rather at an elegant simplicity of style, than at a magniloquent and stately manner of expression. I am aware that a composition which is destitute of uncommon words; and in which the thoughts are expressed in an easy and unaffected manner, is not so likely to strike the imagination of common readers, as a piece which is more inflated and artificial. The difficulty which is experienced by those who endeavour to write in a natural and simple manner is not apparent to the reader; and although he is always more pleased with authors who have succeeded in this kind of writing, he usually reserves his admiration for those who appear to be more profound because they are less capable of being understood. It is indeed necessary to be a tolerable judge of composition, and even to have had some practice in composition, in order to be able to judge of the merit of a pure, natural, and simple, style. I am not surprised when I hear the style of Dr. Johnson extolled by injudicious readers. I am sensible that such a mode of composition must appear to them admirable from its very defects; and that his numerous uncommon words, and sounding periods, must fall upon their ears with something like the effect of a spell or incantation. The admirers of the Doctor must excuse me if I cannot estimate his compositions so highly as I do those of Mr. Addison. It is to the writings of that gentleman that I would always refer those who seek for a model of elegant composition. They will find in them that beautiful simplicity of expression which engages the attention of the reader by a secret charm; and which causes him again and again to recur to the page with invariable delight. Allowance must of course be made for some inaccuracies, and for the use of a few words which, in the lapse of a century have become unfit for polished composition. But making these allowances we shall no where find a style more purely English, or better adapted to express with clearness, and in an unaffected and graceful manner, the sentiments of the author. Style has been termed the dress of thought; and if I might borrow this metaphor for the purpose of contrasting the styles of Addison and Johnson, I would say that the first resembled the vesture of a Grecian nymph, shading, but not concealing, the beautiful form which it enveloped; while the latter might be likened to the hoop petticoat and towering head-dress, by the assistance of which our grandmothers appeared taller and filled a greater space, but not without losing at the same time much of the natural comeliness of the female figure.

"A good deal has been said of the dignity and splendor of the Johnsonian style, and said too, in such a manner, as would almost lead us to suppose that nothing dignified or elevated could be expressed in a natural and simple manner. The advocates of this opinion seem to me to resemble those dramatic poets who make a hero by the help of a plume of feathers, and a flourish of trumpets. They appear to forget that trifling sentiments may be delivered with great pomp of expression, as, on the other hand, the noblest thoughts may be expressed with great simplicity. I believe, indeed, that the most sublime, as well as the most pathetic passages, in the best writers are those in which the simplicity of the language is most conspicuous. I may instance that celebrated passage in the sacred writings which Longinus has quoted as an instance of the true sublime, 'And God said, Let there be light, and there was light.' Nothing can be more removed from stateliness than the language of this passage, nothing more elevated than the sentiment which it contains.

"With respect to the pathetic, if we look into those writers who have most powerfully moved the feelings of their readers, we shall find that they have generally succeeded, not by laboured and rhetorical descriptions of affecting incidents, but by the short, natural, and simple, exhibition of human passions and feelings. In Shakespear's Macbeth, for example, when Macduff is made acquainted with the slaughter of his whole family by the tyrant, and when, to rouse him from the grief which this intelligence produces, he is exhorted by his friends to exert himself for revenge, what can be more pathetic, or have less of rhetorical stateliness than his reply?

'He has no children,—All my pretty ones?

Did you say, all?—O, hell kite!—All!'

"As I have not heard it contended that the measured and declamatory style is best adapted for delineations of life and manners, or for the exhibition of those foibles which are the proper objects of good-humoured satire; I shall only observe that the silence, on this point, of those who are so much disposed to admire the style of Dr. Johnson, is a proof that even they are compelled to admit the superiority of a natural and unaffected mode of writing on all topics which give occasion for the exercise of wit and humour."

Such is the difference of opinion on the subject of style which exists in the Club at the Green Dragon; and such are some of the arguments by which the two parties support their opinions. The difference has now continued for some years, and has given rise to several discussions, which have hitherto served no other purpose but to confirm the disputants in the opinions which they had previously entertained. I must not omit to add that our friend the Physician is the only person in the Club who remains neuter on these occasions. This gentleman has considered the subject of style on more general principles, and without reference to any particular model. He has in this manner formed a style at once original and felicitous, the merit of which will be appreciated by the publick, whenever he shall be prevailed upon to give to the world those compositions which, to the regret of his friends, he has hitherto withheld from the press.

REVIEWS.

MEMORIAL DE SAINTE HELENE.—Journal of the Private Life and Conversations of the Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena. By the Count de Las Cases. London, 1823.

Las Cases has published a work bearing the above title. His statements must be received with a degree of caution; for he gives a Memoir of himself which very justly excites suspicion. Count Las Cases was twenty-one years of age, and Lieutenant-de-Vaisseau when the Revolution broke out, and having emigrated and lost his "patrimony in the King's cause," he did not return to France till the peace of Amiens; when, he "freely and spontaneously transferred the zeal, loyalty, and attachment which" he "had constantly cherished for" his "old masters, to the new Sovereign." However, the Bourbons no sooner re-ascended the throne, than he wrote to the Chancellor of France to acquaint him that he had been Master of Requests to the last Council of State; and that if that circumstance were not sufficient to exclude him from becoming a member of the new assembly, he "begged him to recommend" him "to the King as a Councillor of State." But not obtaining "even the honour of a reply," he determined upon going for a short time to London, there, amongst "old friends who might afford him consolation," to obliterate feelings which "were more than he could endure."

He afterwards again joined Bonaparte, who, it appears, gave him indubitable "proofs of confidence." Such is the most favourable outline of this author's character, and we consider it as only fair that our readers should be in possession of it. Without further remark or animadversion, we proceed to make such selections as may appear curious or interesting.

"The name of Bonaparte may be spelt either Bonaparte, or Buonaparte; as all Italians know. Napoleon's father always introduced the u; and his uncle, the Archdeacon Lucien (who survived Napoleon's father, and was a parent to Napoleon and his brothers,) at the same time, and under the same roof, wrote it Bonaparte. During his youth Napoleon followed the example of his father. On attaining the command of the Army of Italy, he took good care not to alter the orthography, which agreed with the spirit of the language; but at a later period, and when amongst the French, he wished to adopt their orthography, and thenceforth wrote his name Bonaparte."

"Napoleon was born about noon on the 15th of August (the Assumption-Day) in the year 1769. His mother, who was possessed of great bodily as well as mental vigour, and who had braved the dangers of war during her pregnancy, wished to attend mass on account of the solemnity of the day; she was, however, taken ill at church, and on her return home was delivered before she could be conveyed to her chamber. The child as soon as it was born was laid on the carpet, which was an old-fashioned one, representing at full length the heroes of fable, or, perhaps, of the Iliad:—this child was Napoleon."

"In his boyhood Napoleon was turbulent, adroit, lively and agile in the extreme. He had gained, he used to say, the most complete ascendancy over his elder brother Joseph. The latter was beaten and ill-treated; complaints were carried to the mother, and she would begin to scold before poor Joseph had even time to open his mouth."

"At the age of ten, Napoleon was sent to the military school at Brienne."

"In September 1793, Napoleon Bonaparte, then in his twenty-fourth year, was yet unknown to the world which was destined to resound with his name. He was a lieutenant-colonel of artillery, and had been only a few weeks in Paris; having left Corsica, where political events had forced him to yield to the faction of Paoli. The English had taken possession of Toulon; an experienced artillery-officer was wanting to direct the operations of the siege, and Napoleon was fixed on. There will history take him up, never more to leave him;—there commences his immortality."

We notice, with great pleasure, the following observations on a "Work of stupendous industry," the production of an ingenious and most indefatigable townsman of ours, Mr. James Pigot, which have lately appeared in the Literary Chronicle.

PIGOT AND CO.'S LONDON AND PROVINCIAL NEW COMMERCIAL DIRECTORY, for 1823, 3; Containing a Classification of the Merchants and Traders of London and Two Hundred and Eighty of the principal Cities, Towns, and Sea-Ports. Manchester and London.

A DIRECTORY is one of the very last books we should expect to be called upon to notice, but really this work is one of such stupendous industry, so excellent in its plan, so extensively useful, and so carefully and admirably executed, that we feel we cannot do a better service to our mercantile friends and readers, than by recommending it to their notice. This work contains a complete London Directory, in which, the names are first classed into trades; these are printed in three columns. Then follows a list of all their names alphabetically arranged, in six columns, with references to their occupation and places of residence. Complete lists of the learned professions, such as physicians, surgeons, attorneys, &c., are given distinctly. Lists of all the streets, alleys, courts, &c., of London; the taverns, coffee-houses, coaches, waggon, water conveyances,—in short, every thing that a resident of London, or a visitor to it, can want to know, respecting the capital. The same plan is observed with the two hundred and eighty of the principal cities and towns in the counties; and, looking to such places as are known to us, we are really astonished at the extensive and correct information that has been thus accumulated. The directory to each town is prefaced with a brief, but well-written historical description. There are several other excellencies in this work, "too numerous to mention;" we must not, however, forget a table of the current coin of twenty-eight countries or states. From our brief notice of this work it will be readily perceived, that it is such as no mercantile man ought to be without; and we may add, that considering the quantity of letter-press, and the immense expense of collecting materials for such a work, it is published very cheap.

POETRY.

THE ROMAUNT OF LLEWELLYN,

A POEM,

By Eugene Austin, A. M.

'Squire, come here, if it youre wille be,
And saye somewhat of Love; for certes ye Connen theon as moche as any man.'

CHAUCER.

'Pangs are there not enough in hopeless love,—
And, in requited passion, all too much
Of turbulence, anxiety, and fear,—
But that the minstrel of the rural shade
Must tune his pipe, insidiously to nurse
The perturbation in the suffering breast,
And propagate its kind, where'er he may!'

WORDSWORTH.

'Ipse suos gemitus foliis inscribit:—et ad ei
Flos habet inscriptionem.'

NOTICE.—It is well known in this neighbourhood, that, at an auction which lately took place for the disposal of the library of a clergyman not long before deceased, there were offered for sale, netilly, if not quite, forty volumes of old, dirty-looking, worm-eaten MSS. They were all purchased by one gentleman, a virtuoso, for the insignificant sum of thirty-nine shillings and sixpence. This gentleman, whom I have the honour of calling my friend, has had the goodness to inform me, that, upon looking over his purchase, he was agreeably surprised to discover among the MSS. some very curious reliques of the olden time. Among the rest, one volume of a remarkably antique appearance, which has somewhat suffered from the insatiate teeth of that 'edax vetustas', whom old NASO was bold enough to set at defiance.

The MS. just mentioned, the gentleman, (my friend the virtuoso), has been kind enough to lend me, with the view that I should not only give the public a short account of it,—but be at liberty to publish the contents, if they appeared likely to meet with a welcome reception from the readers of the Iris.

I have been at some pains to examine the musty old volume. It is not, like Dr. Percy's celebrated MS. 'a long narrow folio, with the half of every leaf of 54 pages torn away, and the top or bottom line' of the remainder 'cut off in the binding';—neither are 'the first and last leaves wanting'; nor are 'several others injured towards the end'. No;—the MS. of which I speak, is a square and spare-looking quarto, containing exactly 211 pages,—some of which, however, have been rather injured by time;—it is half-bound in an old parchment deed;—and on this parchment are distinctly perceptible, through the soil with which it is covered, the figures 1529.

This circumstance, however, speaks nothing decisive:—because the parchment might have been merely an old lease which had been long out of date. But there is another circumstance of rather more importance. On the inside of the left hand cover are the following lines in manuscript Old English character, technically called Black Letter.

*'OLIVER SHINERSON his boke;—
Christe gebe þu miht theregane to lake;—
And whanne he lokes, the graunt thatte he þage wouhte to Goddes dyspounour see.'*

Cobentriaz. 17. Calendas Februarij.

This was, however, in all probability a kind of schoolboy formula, which the tyros of that time might be in the habit of writing in their books, exactly as we see them do in the present day. Its excessively antique spelling may be explained by the supposition that it was copied from some book which was then very old.

Upon examining the contents of this volume, I found, to my surprise, that it contained a poem written in the Spenserian stanza, and comprising a curious and melancholy love-story;—indeed I may say two love-stories,—for there are the hero's and the author's, blended throughout; the denouement of each being carefully concealed till the close of the poem. At one part the late possessor of this MS. or some other person, appears to have pasted in a few leaves, and on them to have inserted some stanzas of his own. These, as they relate to persons and things of a time subsequent to the date of the manuscript, the reader will easily detect. That the leaves to which I allude are pasted in, and that the stanzas are an interpolation, is evident:—for the paper and ink are of a different colour from the paper and ink of the other leaves, and the hand-writing is quite modern.

Candour requires me to avow that I have myself done nothing at this poem, except, here and there, modernize in a slight degree the phraseology and orthography, and insert a few mottoes which I conceived to be appropriate. The first motto, however, from Chaucer, and the last from the ballad of 'The Bailiff's daughter of Islington,' are in the MS.

Whether the public will agree with me in my opinion that this poem deserved to see the light, I know not;—all I know is, that in determining to put it forth, I was actuated solely by a desire to contribute to their amusement.

I may be allowed to observe that the lines, beginning—

"My brand I'll bear in myrtle-branches dress," are evidently a translation of the celebrated Greek Ode

'Εν μύρτου κλαδί τὸ ξίφος φορήσω.

The song beginning

'On seeming smiles and gentle guise relying,'
seems to be a kind of paraphrase or imitation of Horace's

'Quis multa gracilis te puer in rosa.'

The two or three stanzas beginning

'Precious the lore of high philosophy.

are obviously an imitation of Lucretius,

*'Sæve, mari magno turbantibus æquora ventis,
E terra magnum alterius spectare laborem!'*

The stanza in praise of sensibility

'Beats there beneath the sky that heart of steel,'

bears a strong resemblance to a beautiful passage in the 'Nouvelle Heloise,' Tome 3. 'O sentiment, sentiment! douce vie de l'ame! quel est le cœur de fer que tu n'as jamais touché? quel est l'infortuné mortel à qui tu n'arrachas jamais de larmes?'

Other coincidences may strike other readers. I have mentioned a few of what have struck me;—and I may probably yet discover others, and point them out in a note at the end of the poem.

TO LOUISA.

Faire conain mine, sith you have craved that I
A tale mote tell of love and tender time,
A pleasure 'tis, and dutie to compile;—
So here you have this poor assaie of mine:—
Howbe I wote not if a single line
Of what I've writ may cordial greeting finde;—
For, well I ween, witte shoulde with sense combine
To yield content to youre discerning minde:—
Yet, sith it is well meant, please you accept it kind!

CANTO I.

"Hush'd are the winds, while soft the vessel sailing
With gentle motion ploughs the auruffled main!"

THE MONK.

"he, as I guess,
Had gazed on Nature's naked loveliness,
Aëdon-like,—and now he fled away,
With feeble steps, o'er the world's wilderness:—
And his own thoughts along that rugged way
Pursued, like raging hounds, their father and their prey."
SHILLBY.

PART I.

I.

Sweetly, oh! sweetly abeneath the broad ocean,
As o'er the deepe the gallant vessel glides;—
Around the billows heave with gentle motion,
And the light bubbles dance along her sides:
Cheerily sing the watch,—the helmsman guides
The prove that veers obedient to his wheel,
And fearlessly the foamie flood divides,
His watchful ee upon the wondrous steel
That can to connyge mindes the hiltren way reveale.

II.

The golden sun was setting radiantl'ye;—
And, as adown the occident he drave,
A flood of glory mote ye round him see,
That to the dying day a lustre gave Sweeter than all his noontide splendours have!
He sinks,—and now one brilliant spot of light
Looks like a star just peering o'er the wave;—
'Tis less, and less,—'tis seen, 'tis vanish quite,—
And ocean spreads herself beneath descending night.

III.

Sweet twilight now, and gentle gloom prevail;
A sacred silence over all presides;—
All, save the creaking mast and flapping sail,
And light wave's dash against the vessel's sides,—
(As proudly o'er the dark-blue sea she rides,)—
And the rude, untought melody of men,
In whom for aye a careless moodie abides,—
In danger ever prompt and fearless,—then
Turning to thoughtless din and merrimakes agen!

IV.

Upon the bosom of the deepe reclining,
A few pale, crimson clouds i' the west appear:—
O'er the eastern verge the full orb'd moon is shining,
Lovely as when she wooed Endymion dear.—

Along the darkening waters is a glare
Of silver rays, that like a pathway show.—
Soon doth the night put forth her diamonds rare,
In which so richly dight she wont to go;—
Like sparkling gems upon a sable suit they glow.

V.

Following the sunken sun as days departes,
Venus her car of sweetest sheene doth guide,
At evening's hour so deare to love-struck hearts:—
High in the welkin royal Jove doth ride;
Below him sombre Saturn is descried;
Red Mars is from the east his course devising;
Around the pole the Bears in silence glide;—
And now the cluster'd Pleiades are rising,
Early to weet,—thereby of the year's advance apprising.

VI.

For now Dan Sol in Libra 'gan to sheene,
And they had sunk together in the west;
So, shortly afterward, the Bull is seen
Rearing his shining forehead in the east,
Whereon the watery Hyades are placed:—
While of old Atlas the seven daughters faire
Highte Pleiades, do occupy the breast.
So was I taught to scan the varying year,
As on high heaven's vast vault the rolling stars appear.

VII.

O glorious vault;—O ever-rolling scene
Of silent majesty;—so still, so grand,
So vast, so beautiful, and so serene!—
Who may imagine thee?—who understand
By what great unknown being thou wert plann'd?
Or hast thou roll'd for evermore as now,—
Great in thyself alone,—not to be scann'd
By mortal or immortal mind,—although
To gods and men thou art an ever-glorious show?*

VIII.

Soft as a lover's murmurings blows the breeze;
Bravely the bark bears o'er the briny deep;—
Above, around,—the starry skies, the seas,
And balmy air, a gentle stillness keep,— Hush'd like an infant into peaceful sleep!—
Sweeter meseems such night than brightest day!
Sweet night!—when guileless hearts a rapture reap
More than the world may give or take away,—
The sunshine of the soul,—virtue's internal ray!

IX.

But who is he that silent treads the deck,
Nor joins the watch's song, nor heeds the scene
Of glory spread around, nor seems to rock
If fair or foul it blow, but still serene
Communes with his own mind?—Howbe, I ween,
Within is not the calm that outward shows!—
For many a tear upon that cheek hath been,
Which did a tale of inward teen disclose;—
And sighs and sngults sad have spoke of secret throes!

X.

No carle, no losel he, that deck who trode,
But one of gentle birth, in honour dight,
True-hearted, plain, sincere,—his soul the abode
Of virtuous thoughts,—Llewellyn was he hight.—
Ask ye for what fair cause now sail'd the wight?—
Wait but a space, and it shall all be told.—
A tale, to weet, of solace and delight,
Albeit meint with dole, I will unfold:—
Wait yet a little space, and all shall be unroll'd!

XI.

This gentle wight somehow had absent been
From his paternal hearth and native land,—
Full many a distant sea and shore had seen,
And sought a home on many a foreign strand;—
When as returning at his sire's command,
Derne thoughts of teen athwart his bosom roll,
The future now with anxious heart is scann'd,
And now the past and present sink his soul:—
So, hope, fear, memory, all exert their strong control;—

* Whatever the author might intend by the queries contained in this stanza, I feel confident he meant to convey nothing that could be considered objectionable in any point of view;—for, in a subsequent part of the poem, he very justly refers the explanation of the heavenly phenomena to the 'great first cause' alone. On this subject, I beg to refer the reader to Archbishop Fenelon's very eloquent 'Demonstration of the existence of God,'—which has been translated by Mr. Boyse.

XII.

As thus,—‘Thou gallant bark that bearest me
So bravely o’er this moonlight main, I would
I were a thing insensible like thee ;—
For then ‘tis like, whate’er my fate, I should Take mine allotted dole of evil or good
Patient as thou :—for it besemeth ill
The bootless struggle against the rushing flood
Of fortune’s sea, which drives us as it will !
Betide or weal or woe, patience is blessed still !

XIII.

‘Ah me, mine is the breast bath never known
The quiet yielding to a hopeless lot !—
Better it were had I a heart of stone,
A bosom fenced with iron, that would not
Or take, or keep impressions !—Then I wote,
Gay might I float adown the stream of life,—
Reckless of all,—or having soon forgot
All that it skill’d not to remember,—strife,
And love, and joy, and hate, and cares that are so rife !

XIV.

‘For happiness I’ve sigh’d,—but ever found,
By sad experience from my very birth,
‘Tis but a dream, a word, an idle sound
That nought availeth the poor sons of earth,—
Much spoken of, but of no real worth,—
A meteor flitting o’er night’s mirky face,—
A distant, cold aurora of the north,—
A treacherous fenfire, leading us a chase,
Whence all our gain shall be a long and bootless race !

XV.

‘Friendship I’ve sought ; ‘tis not !—Love is a name ;
As I too well have proved !—But yet with me
Dwelleth and evermore shall dwell the flame
That first awoke my bosom’s agonie !
Though like some silly stricken deer I flee,
Still sticks the shaft in this love-wounded heart !
Some cure for outward maladies may be,—
But there’s no unguent for the bosom’s smart !—
No craft of leech bath power to draw love’s barbed dart !

XVI.

‘There may be friends ! There may be love that’s true !
There may be troth in man’s or woman’s breast !—
Hearts there may be that falsehood never knew,
And sympathy devoid of interest.—
There may be visages that be not drest
In most deceitful guise,—scorning to wear
Fair-seeming smiles, while, close below compest,
Lie dark designs time only may declare ;—
There may be such for aught I either ken or care !

XVII.

‘Enough for me that I have found them not !
Notless for aught I know there may be such !
Some twain,—or three percase,—mayn’t have forgot
Even such a wretch as I !—Yet ‘twere too much
To deem my fate could many moments touch
Hearts that adown the stream of joyance glide !—
The bosom’s troth time only may avouch !—
Meanwhile not one I find to turn aside
From pleasure’s path, and with misfortune’s thrall abide !

XVIII.

‘O ye bright stars, that shine in the vast space
I now behold, and evermore have shone ;—
Thou moon, that, with the same meek, quiet face,
A thousand years ago didst look upon
The same broad waters ;—bath there ever gone
Beneath your sheene one more a wretch than I ?
Here pace I this still deok as one alone,— Unheeded, friendless who may live,—or die
Unpitied and unknown,—ne cause one tear, one sigh !—

XIX.

‘Whither me hearest thou, my gallant bark ?
Unto a home,—no home I ween to me !
Unto a hearth, where I was wont to mark
Myself the only stranger,—there to see
Around it a usurping progenie,—
A mother so miscall’d,—a father there
That never loved his son,—although he be
The pledge of his first love, but born to share
A stepdame’s cruelty, the hardest thing to bear !

XX.

‘Childe of the house,—to weet, the childe and heir,—
There have I never been a welcome guest !—
Neglect, and scorn, and tyranny to bear
Hath been mine only portion ;—at the best,

To sit, even at the board, below the rest,—
In silence bade to sit, and thankful eat ;—
To mark with indignation ill repress
Her darling younglings how she aye did treat,
The while she thrust the heir down to the lowest seat !

XXI.

‘So, from my very infancy, have I
Of teen and trouble been the ceaseless thrall,—
Had scant one lightning-flash of soul-felt joy,
Or quaff’d one cup unmeint with drops of gall !
‘Tis not that pleasure ‘gins with me to pall,—
For, sooth to say, of such I’ve little known !
Well do I wis dole is the lot of all,—
But yet meseems on me, and me alone,
Hath fortune ever lower’d with long, unchanging frown !

XXII.

‘But patience is a blessed balm, I ween ;—
And even perforce I fain its power would try !
The only medicine for all my teen,
Save death,—and I am not as yet to die
Belike ;—so, down, ye rebel thoughts, and lie
Silent within your cell !—A night like this,
So bright, so calm, ill matcheth the sad sigh,
And trickling tear !—When all so peaceful is Around, may I not snatch one short-slept dream of bliss ?

LINES ON THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR 1822.

Farewell thou dull year, in thy dimness departing,
Regret at thy close is not mine to bestow ;
Afflicted thou found’st me, and left me still smarting
The victim of care, disappointment and woe.

So few were the joys in thy progress I tasted,
So transient the pleasures that came in my way
Like the breath of a rose in a wilderness wasted,
They scarcely redeem the distress of a day.

But yet, stern recorder ! had sorrow and anguish
Shot their arrows so grievous alone against me ;
Though doomed in despondency longer to languish,
Alike I had scorned both the future and thee.

But hearts have been broken, affections divided,
And bosoms distracted, more tender than mine ;
And friends in each other that once had confided,
Have seen ere thy close their affections decline.

Pass on then ! I leave to the records of ages,
To tell of thy crimes, of thy deeds of renown—
In vain does the heart, which fresh sorrows oppressages,
In the troubles of nations seek balm for its own.

FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

MORNING DRESS.—Roman dress, or blouse, of fine cambric muslin : the body and skirt are in one, and of nearly equal fulness, which is principally collected in the front and in the middle of the back, and confined round the waist with a red narrow band, fastened by a steel buckle ; it is made high, nearly to the throat, and is gaged with four rows of pink braiding. The sleeve is easy, and has an epaulette with full trimming, braided at the edge, and a double ruffle at the wrist : round the bottom of the skirt are five narrow flounces, edged with pink braiding. Cap of sprigged net, with border of British Lisle lace : cottage front ; the caul rather full, and separated half-way into eight divisions, edged with a rouleau of satin : four, alternately, are fastened to the head piece ; the others are trimmed with lace, and rather elevated, forming a light and elegant crown : a wreath of delicate flowers, the forget-me-not and the heliotrope, decorate the front. Coral ear-rings, rose-coloured gloves, and corded silk shoes.

WALKING DRESS.—The braided pelisses, which were but partially patronised on their first appearance, are now in high favour with those ladies of rank who may be said to lead the fashions. Over a round dress of milk-white bombasin, or Norwich crape, is a close pelisse of puce-coloured cachemire, ornamented down the front and round the border with a peculiarly rich braiding in silk, the flowers of which represent the Caledonian thistle ; two beautiful branches of the same braiding rise from the points that terminate the bottom of the facings, and form a superb ornament in front, on each side of the border. The ornament across the bust consists of a braiding in foliage only ; but it has a very rich appearance, being composed of several rows reaching across the front to the forepart of each shoulder. The mancheros are plain, and are almost close to the sleeve ; these are finished with one row of leaves in braiding. A belt of black velvet, fastened in front with a polished steel buckle, confines the pelisse round the waist. The bonnet is of puce-coloured velvet, lined with white satin, and crowned with a plume of white ostrich feathers ; a veil of Chantilly lace is thrown carelessly across the brim of the bonnet, but this is not always adopted. A single frill of the finest Mechlin lace is worn round the throat ; and a muff of the white Siberian fox, with half-boots of puce-coloured kid, and light doe-skin gloves, finish this promenade dress.

BALL DRESS.—White crepe lisse dress, worn over a bright pink satin slip ; the corsage of white satin, cut bias, and fits the shape ; it is ornamented with simple elegance, being separated into narrow straps, nearly two inches deep, and edged with two small folds of pink crepe lisse set in a narrow band of folded white satin, finished with a tucker of the finest blond lace. The sleeve is short, of very full white crepe lisse, partly concealed by two rows of white satin diamonds, edged with pink crepe lisse, and united by half a dozen minute folds of white satin : at the bottom of the dress is one row of large full puffs, or bouffantes, of white crepe lisse ; between each are eight white satin loops, attached to the bouffantes, and surrounding a cluster of half-blown China roses. The hair, without ornament, a la Grecque. Ear-rings, necklace, armlets, and bracelets, of dead gold, with pink topaz and emeralds interspersed, and fastened by padlock-snaps studded with emeralds. Long white kid gloves. Pink satin shoes.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON FASHION AND DRESS.—Promenade costume continues nearly as it was last month ; the only alterations that we perceive are, that for rippets are still more in favour, and plain black velvet bonnets, with the same material disposed in large knots, are very generally adopted. Velvet pelisses are fashionable in carriage costume ; but they are not so much worn as pelisses made of that very rich silk called velours simile, of which there are a great many different kinds. Trimmings of silk plush intermixed with velvet are very general ; the trimming usually corresponds in colour with the pelisse ; but some elegantes have lately appeared in black velvet or gros de Naples pelisses, with scarlet trimmings, and vice versa. We have noticed among these pelisses, one made in black velours simile : the trimming was a cording of scarlet satin, which went all round ; the pelisse fastened underneath, and was ornamented up the front with scarlet bands, placed crosswise, with buttons at each end : these bands formed lozenges of different breadths ; the largest being placed at the bottom, and the others being progressively smaller to the waist : there are three upon the corsage, of which the largest is at the top, and the smallest at the bottom. Fashionable colours remain the same as last month.

VARIETIES.

Battle of the Dishes.—If we may give credit to some old authorities, the pastry-cooks of former times, possessed more ingenuity than they do at the present day. At great entertainments, it was formerly not unusual to exhibit a castle made of pastry, with gates, draw-bridges, battlements, and port-cullises ; on the battlements of the castle, were planted guns, made of the kex or hemlock, gilt ; these cannons were charged with gunpowder, and regular trains laid, so that as many of them might be discharged at once as was wished. The castle was placed at one end of the table, and at the other end was a ship, made also of pastry, with masts, sails, flags, and streamers ; and guns charged with gunpowder, with a train, the same as in the castle. In the middle of the table was placed a stag made of paste, but hollow, and filled with red wine. A broad arrow was stuck in the side of the stag. Near it were placed two pies, made of coarse paste ; one was filled with live frogs, and the other with live birds.

All being thus prepared, and placed in order on the table, a lady was first persuaded to draw the arrow out of the body of the stag, on which the red wine issued like blood out of a wound. The guns on one side of the castle were next, by lighting the train, discharged against the ship, which was quickly returned by a broadside from the vessel; the salvos on which the castle and ship were placed, were then turned round, and the remaining guns of both discharged. The two great pies still remained untouched, when curiosity or intreaty inducing some person to raise the lid of one, the frogs jumped out, to the amusement of some, and the dismay of the others; on raising the lid of the other pie, out flew the birds, which naturally flying to the light, soon put out all the candles; and while all was thus rendered hurly-burly and confusion, a banquet in an adjoining room was announced as ready, and upon the table.

EXTRAORDINARY PEAR.—A pear of an unusual size was this season gathered from a tree in Mr. Mead's garden, at Cannimere, near Warminster. It measured in circumference 13 inches, from top to tail 9 inches, and weighs nearly a pound and a half.

Negro Machinist.—In the year 1819, a negro of the state of New York, exhibited the model of a machine which he had constructed, for cutting, threshing, and winnowing wheat, rye, &c., all at once operation. The machine is constructed to be moved by one horse; it enters a field of wheat, or rye, &c., and taking a whole ridge at once, cuts, threshes, and winnows the grain, fit for the mill or market, and that without waste, or leaving any thing behind to be cleaned. This operation can be performed as fast as the usual pace at which a horse walks.

This machine may be divided, and that part which cuts and gathers the grain, only used; when it is calculated that two horses, and one man to attend on them, will cut and gather the grain of twenty-five acres of land in one day.

CATS.—The first couple of cats which were carried to Cayaba sold for a pound of gold. There was a plague of rats in the settlement, and they were purchased as a speculation, which proved an excellent one. The first kittens produced thirty oitavas each; the next generation were worth twenty; the price gradually fell as the inhabitants became stocked with these beautiful and useful creatures. Montenegro presented to the elder Almagro the first cat which was brought to South America, and was rewarded for it with six hundred pesos.

MERMAIDS AND MERMEN.—Another of these manufactured monsters, a Mermaid, (supposed to be of the male species) is now exhibiting in the Strand, and rivals, in its infamous ingenuity of construction, the Ward in Chancery in St. James's-street. It was brought by a Captain Forster to England, and sold to Frith and Bradley, Pawnbrokers in St. Catherine's, and was publicly exhibited 29 years ago in Broad-court. It differs from its rival, not in beauty, but in a lateral fin. Are not the exhibitions of notorious impostures liable to immediate investigation by the Police? and if so, ought not this to have been examined by dissection, and if fabricated, which cannot be doubted, the parties interested in it punished? The society for the suppression of Vice attack less impious appeals to the public than the declaration of those vagabonds, that it is a natural production, and one of the wonderful works of God.—LIT. GAZ.

PHEASANT.—On Friday, the 27th ult a gentleman of Worcester shot a most singular and beautiful young cock pheasant. On the head are horns resembling those of the horned owl, between which is a complete mass of gold, and the plumage altogether is exceedingly fine.

GREYNA GREEN.—There have been married, at the far-famed shrine of Hymen, at Gretna, by Robert Elliot, one of the officiating ministers of his godship, one hundred and sixty-two couple, since new year's day, 1822. We are informed, by several of the neighbouring clergy of the Church of England, that the absurd new marriage act has reduced marriages in their parishes, on an average, about four-fifths.

WINDOWS.—A patent has recently been obtained for making sashes to revolve on an axis, so as to enable a person to clean the outside of the sashes in the inside of the room, or to repair the glazing; thus doing away the necessity of that dangerous practice of standing on the sills, or the glazier's machine, to clean and repair the outside, and which has been the cause of so many accidents. We understand, that the patent may be applied to old sashes with the same facility as new.

Exquisite Compliment.—Mademoiselle Lecouvreur, a celebrated French actress, who died in 1730, possessed a peculiar dignity of manner. A foreigner who had seen her performance of Elizabeth, in the Earl of Essex, enquired, if the Royal Family usually indulged themselves in theatricals?

Strabo relates, that the Spaniards had such an aversion to walking, that they could not conceive that any one should voluntarily undergo the fatigue of it. When therefore they saw some Romans walking under shady trees, they supposed these strangers had lost their way, and civilly offered to show it them.

A wit asked a countryman at what time he most enjoyed himself? 'In winter,' replied he, 'when I sleep in the chimney-corner after supper.' 'then you are of swinish descent,' said the wit, 'for they sleep after meals.' 'Pray,' said the fellow, 'what time do you wags enjoy most?' 'May,' replied the other: 'very well,' cried the fellow, 'your kin is clear enough, for my ass likes that part of the year the best.'

Interesting Discovery of Roman Antiquities in France.—A countryman in the vicinity of Avalon, with the intention of improving a field which he possesses in the environs of that town, on a pretty high hill called Montmartre, thought of removing the large stones which abounded in it. After laboring incessantly for several days, he discovered some tiles much larger than those in use at Avalon; this surprised him, particularly when he considered the elevation of the spot. He pursues his work with continued ardor; his pick-axe strikes against a hard round body; it proves to be a head, which appears to him to be of so large a size, that he imagines it must be that of the devil.

The countryman, frightened, hastens to the village, where he relates his adventure; his neighbors believe him, and no one has a mind to return with him to see the head of the devil.

M. Malot, a well-informed man, who formerly held a public office, but is now retired to the village, where he cultivates a farm of his own, was soon informed of this event; he encouraged the peasant, and with some difficulty persuaded him to conduct him to the place where he made the discovery; when they reached it the peasant, keeping a few steps distant, shows him the monstrous head which he had raised with his pick-axe. M. Malot takes it, removes the earth which covers the greatest part, and finds it to be of white marble of exquisite workmanship.

M. Malot was transported with joy; the peasant, cured of his fears, began to dig farther; they found other heads, beautiful statues almost entire, and other extremely curious antiquities.

A friend of the Arts, who resides at Avalon, has bought the field containing the curious remains of antiquity, giving the peasant his own price. He immediately set several laborers to work. They have found not only the area of an antique Temple, perfectly marked out by walls which are 2 or 3 feet high, but also a great quantity of mutilated statues of white marble of extraordinary beauty, and many copper and silver coins of the Roman Emperors.

Cambridge, Jan. 3.—The prize for the Hulsean Essay for 1822, has been adjudged to Mr. Charles Austin, of Jesus College. Subject—The Argument for the Genuineness of the Sacred Volume as generally received by Christians.

The subject of the Hulsean Essay for the present year is—The Nature and Advantage of the Influence of the Holy Spirit.

Brussels, 15 Dec.—A farmer of the village of Villiers en Cauchie, situated on the ancient Roman Causeway, in the district of Cambrai, has lately found an antique vase containing about 200 Roman silver medals, among which there are many of Diocletian.

Rome, Nov. 27th.—Count Moroni has commenced a new search of antiquities in his Vigna on the Appian way, which has abundantly rewarded the labor employed; since we see statues, bas-reliefs, and coins, highly interesting to Archaeology, obtained by these operations.

Gottingen, December.—The number of students in our University amounts at present to 1419; among them are 4 Princes: viz. the Prince of Brunswick, the Prince of Linanges, and the 2 Princes of Salm; also 17 Counts. Notwithstanding this great number, the students are distinguished by exemplary diligence, good manners, and order; 270 study divinity, 730 law, 224 medicine, and 195 Philosophy.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR,—I am sorry to have put an end to the analysis of Mr. Cobbett's Grammar, with a view to set forth its excellence over other English Grammars, having objected to the two examples for this purpose adduced by your correspondent "S. X." (whose pardon I beg for the freedom I took) only because I consider that in those instances Mr. Cobbett's is inferior. But with the exception of those examples, and the substituting some obsolete words, such as thrown instead of thrown, drunked for drank, and the like, I allow that his grammar comprises simplicity and perspicuity, and upon the whole is an excellent one.

I have waited a few weeks in order to see some one renew the subject, but having been disappointed, though I am not prepared to canvas its merits, it being some time since I read the principal part of the work, yet, as an act of justice in the new year, I am desirous, with your leave, Mr. Editor, just to say, that omitting the instances above-quoted, I consider Mr. Cobbett inferior to none I am acquainted with, who have written on the subject; and my opinion is, that the time spent in reading his work, by the student in English Grammar, will be well repaid by the use that may be derived from his rational observations.

WEEKLY DIARY.

JANUARY.

REMARKABLE DAYS.

Some curious ceremonies are observed on this day, in the northern counties, particularly in Yorkshire: they are thus described in 'The Rev. G. Young's History and Antiquities of Whitby':

On Plough Monday, the first Monday after Twelfth-day and some days following (observes our author) there is a procession of rustic youths dragging a plough, who, as they officiate for oxen, are called plough stots. They are dressed with their shirts on the outside of their jackets, with rashes of ribbons fixed across their breasts and backs, and knots or roses of ribbons fastened on their shirts and on their hats. Besides the Plough-draggers there is a band of six in the same dress, furnished with swords, who perform the sword dance, while one or more musicians play on the violin or flute. The sword dance, probably introduced by the Danes, displays considerable ingenuity, not without gracefulness. The dancers arrange themselves in a ring with their swords elevated; and their motions and evolutions are at first slow and simple, but become gradually more rapid and complicated. Towards the close each one catches the point of his neighbour's sword, and various movements take place in consequence: one of which consists in joining or plaiting the swords into the form of an elegant heaven or rose, in the centre of the ring, which rose is so firmly made that one of them holds it up above their heads without undoing it. The dance closes with taking it to pieces, each man laying hold of his own sword. During the dance, two or three of the company, called Toms or Clowns, dressed up as harlequins, in most fantastic modes, having their faces painted or masked, are making antic gestures to amuse the spectators; while another set called Madgies or Madgy Pegs, clumsily dressed, in women's clothes, and also masked or painted, go from door to door rattling old canisters, in which they receive money. Where they are well paid they raise a huzza; where they get nothing, they shout 'hunger and starvation.' When the party do not exceed forty, they seldom encumber themselves with a plough. Sometimes a kind of farce, into which songs are introduced, is acted along with the sword dance: the principal characters in this are, the King, the Miller, the Clown, and the Doctor. Egton Bridge has long been the chief rendezvous for sword dancers in the vicinity of Whitby.

FRIDAY, 17.—Saint Anthony.

The 'Benediction of Beasts' is annually performed at Rome, on the above day, in a little church dedicated to him near Santa Maria Maggiore. It lasts for some days; for not only every Roman from the Pope to the Peasant, who has a horse, a mule, or an ass, sends his cattle to be blessed at St. Anthony's shrine, but all the English go with their job horses and favourite dogs; and for the small offering of a couple of paoli, get them sprinkled, sanctified, and placed under the protection of this saint. Coach after coach draws up, strings of mules mix with carts and barouches, horses kick, mules are restive, and dogs snarl, while the officiating priest comes forward from his little chapel, dips a brush into a vase of holy water, sprinkles and prays over the beasts, pockets the fee, and retires.

BEAUTIES OF ENGLISH POETRY.

No. IV.

CHAUCER continued.

'I had rather be a kitten, and cry—Mew!
Than one of these same metre ballad-mongers :—
I had rather bear a braban canstick turn'd,
Or a dry wheel grate on an axle-tree ;—
And that would set my teeth nothing on edge,
Nothing so much as micing poetry.'

Miss Seward informs us that Darwin,—the author of 'The Temple of Nature,' and 'The Botanic Garden,' two poems which made much noise in their day,—used to boast he had never studied poetry until the time he began to write it; which, we all know, was when he was somewhat advanced in life. This foolish boast of Darwin's, if there were any thing in it, would only prove what, unfortunately for him, is sufficiently proved by the perusal of his works;—that, if deemed worthy of being styled a poet at all, he must be considered as one of very inferior pretensions.

But, it is ever thus with self-imagined geniuses.—They neglect study; it is too laborious. They affect to despise detail; for it requires study. They despise and neglect the old writers;—for, in them, the most enchanting effects are merely the result of well-chosen and well-combined detail. So, in painting, we all know that Reynolds and Gainsborough, and many others among the moderns, would not condescend to the labour of detail, pretending that the most beautiful effects may, by the aid of genius, be produced without it:—on the other hand, the Dutch painters excelled in detail, but, having neither taste nor judgment in the selection, they produced comparatively no effect. In real nature, however, all is detail; yet all is effect; and he who peruses her works with a learned eye, will perceive and allow, that the most exact detail, and the most minute subdivisions, are not incompatible with all that breadth, and mass, and grandeur of style, which we are accustomed to admire in a beautiful landscape, a magnificent temple, a fine statue, or a masterly picture.

Thus, then, we must admit that the triumph of art is to produce effect by means of detail; and this applies not only to landscape-gardening, to architecture, to sculpture, and to painting, but also in its fullest extent to poetry. If we then examine the works of Chaucer on the principles just stated, we shall find that he stands almost unrivalled. No other poet of any age or country, with whose writings I am acquainted, has (with the single exception of Homer,) the slightest pretension to be compared to him. And it is in this that his excellence may be emphatically said to consist;—that is, in descriptive detail, so tastefully selected, and so judiciously combined, as to produce an effect that may be said to rival the happiest efforts of the most successful painters. He is not like the artists of the Dutch school, who delineate a broom-stick with as much exactness as 'the human face divine'; nor like those of the school of Gainsborough, Barry, Reynolds, Fuseli, and others, 'who scorn nature, and are scorned by her'; but he is the successful rival, in a sister art, of such men as Raphael, and Rembrandt, and Titian, and Poussin, and Claude Lorraine. He was one who had looked upon nature, till his mind was, as it were, a mirror reflecting back her thousand diversities of light and shade, and form, and hue;—her divine, her unspeakable grace of manner;—her sweet repose, bold contrasts, and distinct grouping;—her matchless conceptions, and vigorous hand;—her infinitely minute details, combined with her inimitable freedom, breadth, and grandeur of effect.—These Chaucer had studied from his youth up;—for the education of a poet commences with his earliest perceptions; ay, as early as the time when he is first lifted up by his nurse and stretches forth his little hands, to grasp the silver moon, which he is afterwards to celebrate in his deathless song.

It were, in good sooth, a precious contrivance to set up a doctrine that should save genius from the hard necessity of that 'impræbus labor,' to which we are all, geniuses or no geniuses, alike doomed, if we would raise ourselves, but a little even; above the common herd of mankind. 'Omnes homines, qui sese student præstare ceteris animalibus, summæ opem niti decet.' The only advantage, in this regard, that genius hath, ever had, or ever will have, is, that it studies with infinitely more rapidity, taste, and judgment. Would genius, I pray ye, without study, have enabled Keats to perform his Lear, or his Othello, in so masterly a manner? Think ye that genius without study enabled Farren to perform his Lord Ogleby so as to make the representation a perfect picture, an immaculate performance? It is the completeness of their study which has hidden the very appearance of study: Artem magna est celare: and since I have gotten into the humour of quotation, I may add,

— 'Nil sine magno,
Vita labore dedit mortalibus.'

But it is not thus with the poetasters of the present day. They resemble a child at the piano-forte; having got into the key and cadence of some capital performance, they, simple ones, look round and think that we are admiring their successful rivalry. They catch the key-note of Byron, endeavour to imitate his lofty, sweeping style, cram in as many as they can of his favourite phrases, seek to be dim, and dark, and shadowy like him, try to drop a few touches of tenderness upon a ground-work of general and utter recklessness, talk of what they are, and have been, and long to be, and then present the public with what, heaven save the mark, they call a poem. A poem!—Why, formerly a poem was the work of years;—now it is the amusement of a week. Get you gone, old Horace;—if we are not better workmen than those of your day, we at least turn out our wares more rapidly. Your maxim is now out of date;

— Carmen reprehendite, quod non
Multa dies et multa litura coercuit, atque
Perfectum decies non castigavit ad unguem.

Now, the cause of the occasional success of the chirpers just alluded to, is sufficiently obvious. We have all of us occasionally had certain agreeable or elevated emotions excited by the perusal of the better class of poets; and, by the laws of association in the human mind, those words and phrases which in the works of a real poet had excited an agreeable or an elevated feeling in our bosoms, do also excite something of a similar feeling when we meet with them in the lines of a poetaster. Hence it is that we are so easily imposed upon by such words and phrases as 'the wide-spread earth,' 'the over-arching heavens,' 'the waving woods,' the silver stream. The would-be performer has got the key-note and somewhat of the cadence, but—for the tune, and the mysteriously woven web of harmony, for the melody and the concord of sweet sounds,—for that which can enchain the ear, and entrance the soul,—for that which maketh us awhile forget all care, and live only for the present, bidding the past to begone, and the future to wait our leisure,—for that which can raise a new world to our view, a fairy-land for us to inhabit, a sweet, green spot in the desert of life,—for that which can bid the wells of delight to spring from the barren rocks of existence, and cheer our thirsty, fainting souls,—for those magic touches which can change the face of the world to the mind's eye, and bid an Eden bloom around us,—for all these, and much more than my feeble pen is able to express, we should indeed, if we expected to find them, be doomed to a long and bootless search. Hard indeed is our fate!—We are treated with the chirp of a hedge-sparrow for the note of the nightingale;—we are desired to take the cackling of a goose for the warbling of the lyre, and the braying of an ass for the sound of the trumpet. But,—revenons à nos moutons.

Chaucer, I have said, excels in description. His characters appear, when we read his delineations, as if they had merely slept through the five hundred years that have intervened, and were passing before us in their genuine costume, and with the very air and manner of the 14th century. Let us now raise the curtain, and shew what an English Merchant of those times resembled. I have no room this week for more than one character.

'A Merchant was there with a forked beard,
In motley, and high on his horse he sat:
On his head he had a Flanders beaver-hat.
His boots were clasped fair and handsomely.
His reasons spake he very solemnly;
Sounding away th' increase of his winning.
He wish'd the sea kept clear for any thing
From Middleburgh¹ as far as to Orewell.²
Well could he crowns in his exchanges sell.
This worthy man full well his wit beset;³
There wist⁴ no person that he was in debt,
So steadfastly all his affairs did go,
Both in his bargains, and his borrowings too.
Forsooth he was a worthy man withal,
But, faith, I wote⁵ not how men do him call.

1 A town in Flanders.

2 A sea-port in Essex.

3 Beset, (anciently) to order.

4 Wist, past time of Wits, to know.

5 Wote, know.

ANNUS MIRABILIS!

OR, A PARTHIAN GLANCE AT 1822.

JANUARY.—"Cain, a Mystery," published by Lord Byron: preface states his lordship's difficulty in making Lucifer talk like a clergyman. A country vicar proceeded against in the Ecclesiastical Court, for swearing that he had a horse that would gallop to hell: not equally difficult, therefore, to make a clergyman talk like Lucifer. Miss Stephens nearly lost in the Trafalgar packet. If she be, as the newspapers say, the Syren of the stage, surely she might laugh at "All the rude dangers of crossing the ocean." Colonel Thornton proved himself alive, by asserting that he was in the daily practice of swallowing six muffins at breakfast and three pounds of roast or boiled at dinner: this would prove the death of any other man. Tom and Jerry, or Life in London, still acting at the Adelphi Theatre, teaching the rising male generation "that great moral lesson," how to patter slang, mill a lamp-lighter, or box a Charley. A great outcry from Mr. Loveday, who had placed his three daughters for education in a French convent, all the academies in England being full, and who expressed his surprise, on the Boulevard de Parnasse, that one of them should have turned Catholic. His subsequent appeal to the Chamber of Deputies unequalled by any production since Macpherson's Ossian. Mr. Southey published a reply to Lord Byron, wherein he assailed that eccentric nobleman with "whip and branding iron:" the cause alleged to be the following paragraph in an opposition newspaper, under the head of "Births:—" "At his bookseller's, Mr. Robert Southey, of a still-born Vision of Judgment." The offence lent: poetical parturitions ought to be commemorated. Constitutional Society kept at bay by Mr. Carlile by means of an apparatus in the Temple of Reason: like that of a cheque-taker in a playhouse: red whiskers kept at bay by Rowland's Macassar oil. Country Gentlemen "combining and confederating" like so many defendants in a suit in Chancery. The Great King of Prussia sung by Signor Carloni at the Opera-House. Nothing outré during the present month on the part of Mr. Ex-sheriff Parkins; and not a single duel fought in the Phoenix Park by any gentleman with a name commencing with an O or a Mac!

February.—Cobbett patted on the back by some country gentlemen, as much as to say, "Bite the fund-holders." Olive, Princess of Cumberland, ejected from her lodgings on Ludgate-hill. New tragedy at Drury-lane, called "Owen, Prince of Powys, or Welsh Feuds." Army of English critics overran the principality, and extinguished his Highness and his feuds. "The Pirate" bottled in theatrical spirits by Mr. Thomas Dibdin: too volatile: went to sea after a few nights' confinement. God save the King proved to be the private property of James the First. Insurgent meeting of White Boys at Doneraile, where the following resolution was passed:—"Resolved, that every thing coming from England be burnt, except their coats, which we have occasion for." Speech from Mr. Thelwall at an agricultural meeting at Epsom; challenged to show where his landed estate lay; whereupon he quoted the two how-pots outside his window in Blackfriars-road. Carlile's Temple of Janus closed. Orator Hunt's wife permitted to visit him at Ilchester, on bringing her marriage-certificate in her pocket. Vaccine Inoculation Report; small-pox on the increase, owing to careless vaccination, and the Rev. Rowland Hill admonished to grasp the pulpit-cushion and lay down the lancet. Mozart's modulation much shaken by Rossini's rattle. Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey off the roll of attorneys and not on that of Barristers. Between two bundles of hay: but for ass read fox. Injunction dissolved in Murray v. Benbow: Cain a mystery no longer. One John Tye executed at the Old Bailey, for uttering forged notes, and one Simon Shake applauded at Covent-garden for a similar offence. Grand chorus of "High Prices" sung by the country gentlemen at York. The Rev. H. H. Milman produced the Martyr of Antioch, and the wife of a labouring man, at Enfield Chase, produced three male infants: the latter are doing well. Cobbett proved to have changed his opinion of Sir Francis Burdett. A still and a quantity of whisky carried off by a revenue party at Derry, with a mob of Irish peasantry clinging to them, like Aboulfaouris, the Persian, to the Load-stone Mountain. No child killed by a Paddington coach.

March.—King of Spain lectured by the Cortes. He promises to do so no more. A fire broke out on the premises of a bookseller in Paternoster-row, and overboiled some beefsteaks at Dolly's Chophouse. Mr. Hume's "total of the whole" much distressed: Cobbett sends him his new Grammar. Symptom of down-fall in the Navy 5 per cents. A collection of penny-wisdom at the Paul's Head, Cateaton-street, to reimburse Carlile for his pound-foolishness in Fleet-street. Death of Coates the banker: his will opened in Stratton-street: only £300,000 bequeathed to his poor widow: divers dandies observed to glance a look upward to the drawing-room window in their progress towards the Park. Two silver cups voted to Mr. Kean by the inhabitants of New York, and a lighter laden with coals despatched at the same time to Newcastle. A man unknown arraigned at the bar of the Old Bailey, and a woman unknown observed to tiddle liquid at the bar of Hodges's prime proof repository in Fleet-market. Lafitte, the Paris banker, much amazed by an application from the executors of one Napoleon Bonaparte. Navy 5 per cents. slain by Mr. Vansittart, and a joint Post-master cut in two by Lord Normanby. Agricultural meeting at the Mermaid, Hackney: toleration of opinion recommended, and Sir J. Gibbons booted out for acting under the recommendation.

Mr. Wyatt charged with attempting to crush a marble monument of George the Third down the throat of the puffin: John Bull has a capacious swallow, and the artist was tempted to put it to the proof. Murder of Mrs. Donatt by persons unknown much talked of, and murder of Sir Archy Macmurchein by Kean not talked of at all. Comp de grâce to the Navy 5 per cents. given by Mr. Henry Hase: many Jews who attended the funeral seen the next day upon the Royal Exchange with beards half an inch long. The King's Civil List treated uncivilly by Lord Kings. Cinderella, at the Opera-house, exchanged her glass slipper for a bracelet, the former being too slippery to dance in. Only twelve persons poisoned during the month from mistaking oxalic acid for Epsom salts.

April.—Easter week: all the city at Brighton, to the great annoyance of people of fashion who went there to avoid them: poney-chaises and the Reverend Doctor Pearson. English in Paris estimated at 20,184: marshalled by the Prefect in four divisions, viz: the idle, the sick, the needy, and the disaffected. Appeal to the Court of Cassation: Prefect's decree affirmed. Nineteen labourers out of work at Stockbury ordered by overseers to play at marbles from nine in the morning to seven in the evening. Fear of them, being widowers went through the ring a second time, and were asked in church the Sunday following. Constitutional Society, being indicted at the Old Bailey, held up their hands and down their heads: Miss Foote much admired in Cherry and Fair Star. The Tom and Jerry fever extending to all the minor theatres: nineteen watchmen prostrate with their boxes on their backs. Preparations in Hyde Park for the reception of the Achilles of Phidias, on his elopement from the Quirinal Hill at Rome. Planet Venus at the same time visible to the naked eye. City Recorder elected quintidie se bene gesserit. New Tread-Mill erected at Brixton prison, and business at Union-hall consequently on the decline: prisoners in Newgate comforted by Mrs. Fry, and business at the Old Bailey consequently on the increase. Literary Fund Committee called upon to interdict Mr. Fitzgerald from spouting at their ensuing anniversary: event doubtful, according to Cobbett, who holds that when a man is smitten with the sound of his own voice, nothing short of a sledge-hammer applied to his head will silence him. Martin, the artist, descended into Herculaneum, and recommended not quite so plump as when he supped with Belshazzar. Young Watson takes to new rum, and commits a burglary at Balmora: Grand steeple-chase near Blackwater, and a considerable running down of parsons in the columns of the Morning Chronicle. A countryman at Cloamary, county of Donegal, discovered a bottle, and, to his infinite chagrin, in lieu of whisky, found it to contain a mere memorandum relative to the Arctic expedition. Man unknown once more arraigned, and again sported Junius. Mr. Owen of Llanwrthol's proposal to clothe the poor in one uniform, and no religion. Harlequin at the Opera-house. Moses in Egypt changed into Peter the Hermit: many pilgrims from Paddington attended the Crusade: all's fair in love and music. Simile in the Irishman in London, "No more brains than a fiddler," gave great offence to the leader of the band. Monsieur Pault vaulted from the Academy of Music in Paris, and descended on one foot in the Haymarket. Mr. Kean played Osmyo, in the Castle Spectre, and nearly "made a ghost" of his theatric reputation. Private theatricals at the Lyceum: young Mathews in Le Comédie d'Etampes dubbed a chip of the old block: an old block, indeed, if he allow the experiment to be repeated. Nobody killed by drawing the trigger of a loaded fowling-piece, not knowing it to be charged.

May.—Horse-Bazaar at King-street Barracks: impossible to say nay to any proffered filly, mocking being rude. Good beer began to trickle into the cellars of public-houses, owing to a stir at St. Stephen's. Agricultural report: patience and water-gruel recommended to country gentlemen. Song, "I love high Rents," sung by Sir F. Burdett. Piece of plate presented to Alderman Wood: family arms sought for in vain: surrendered on his assumption of the gown: "cedunt arma togæ." The Lord Chancellor gave judgment on the Doge of Venice, who had, in the mean time, wedded the Waters of Oblivion. One hundred acres of land, in Venezuela, sold by Bolivar at a penny an acre: Mr. Birkbeck outbitten. Othello stabbed and smothered his wife to a fiddlestick accompaniment at the Opera-house. Mr. Yates in the Law of Java mistaken for Ramo Samee the Indian Juggler. Marriage Act Amendment Bill much canvassed: clause proposed by Lord Erskine, contract determinable every seven years on six months' previous notice. Anniversary dinner of the Literary Fund: Chairman's hammer not a sledge one: Mr. Fitzgerald's consequent recitation. Mr. Horatio Orton's dog snatched a hasty repast from the calf of Mr. Ex-sheriff Parkins's leg. No women run over in Oxford-street, in consequence of crossing the coachway without looking to the right or to the left.

June.—Expansion of Mr. Baring's new mansion in Piccadilly to the utter extermination of the Western side of Bolton-row. Sparring-match at St. Stephen's between Mr. Pascoe Grenfell and the Bank of England. Exhibition at Somerset-House: irruption of one-shilling critics: many a "man unknown" from being designated in the Catalogue "portrait of a gentleman." Hercules in the hall looked gloomy, in apparent envy of the more airy elevation of his naked friend in Hyde Park. Affray of wild Irish in Peter-street, Westminster: Polito rebuked by the magistrates for not keeping his cages better bolted. Opening of Vauxhall Gardens, after being for the ninety-ninth time consigned to the woodman's axe: gardens alleged to unite the varieties of Vauxhall with the elegancies of Ranelagh, like the boy's pennyworth of cheese, which he required to have very long and very thick: new rotatory piece of mechanism, entitled Hep-tap-las-ies-opton: and a dentist's man in waiting to pick up the broken teeth of the pronouncers. Dinner at the Horns, Kennington; Sir Robert Wilson in the chair: all general reflections consequently avoided. Wanstead House advertised for sale. All the world on the Whitechapel-road: Epping-forest strewn with gigs, unharnessed hacknies, and remnants of cold veal and pigeon-pie. Sale of the Fortunes of Nigel checked by that of Robins's Catalogue. Little Waddington elevated from a blanket in Newgate, and discounts in Threadneedle-street depressed to 4 per cent. Mrs. Olivia Serres swore an affidavit with a documental appendix in the Prerogative Court, Doctors' Commons. Plague reported to have broken out in London: two runners despatched by the Lord Mayor to St. Thomas's and St. Bartholomew's to ascertain the fact; but, their names being Fogg and Leadbetter, they brought back but a confused and heavy story. Don Antonio Francisco Zea arrived in London from the Republic of Colombia: Spanish bonds at a consequent premium, and the Royal Exchange swarmed with foreign brokers. Seven shopkeepers on Ludgate-hill, who had recently taken advantage of the Insolvent Act, were poisoned by drinking seven glasses of noyeau double the usual strength. End of Trinity Term, attended by a great diminution of black coats and white buckles in the purlieus of Chancery-lane. Beautiful hill and dale in the Piccadilly pavement.

CRITICISM.

ORTHOGRAPHY.—(No. IV.)

BY S. X.

"It is something strange that a uniform propriety in spelling English words should not have kept pace with other improvements in our language, especially in cases where the true orthography might be ascertained by sure and approved rules." GENT. MAG. July, 1810.

Wrong.

Right.

37. Acme—

Acmé—

"Its acmé of human prosperity and greatness." BURKE.

The acute accent ' , and the grave ` , are made upon particular syllables to regulate their pronunciation, the former raising the voice to a higher or more acute pitch, and the latter depressing it to a lower or more grave tone. Some writers of Dictionaries have placed the grave accent on long syllables, and the acute accent, on short syllables. The proper marks, however, for distinguishing long and short syllables are these — , and ~ ; the latter of which is sometimes called a breve.—When words, usually printed with the accent on a particular letter, are given in capitals, the accent is omitted, the capital letters being cast without the accents.

38. Alas!—

Alas!—

In Wakefield's pamphlet, entitled "The spirit of Christianity compared with the Spirit of these Times," this word is repeatedly misspelled with double s!

39. Briar—

Brier—

It is remarkable that our great lexicographical luminary, Dr. Johnson, spells this word with an e, and, of course, rejects the vowel a, as erroneous; and yet, in the compound word, sweet-briar, he introduces the discarded vowel a, and does not even notice, or in any way refer to, his quondam favourite e. Walker follows Johnson of course, and Todd has done the same, without noticing the inconsistency of writing the simple word briar, with an a, and the compound, with an e. Sweet-briar is sometimes pronounced as if it were written sweet-breer; but this is, doubtless, a provincialism.

40. Cantoes—

Cantos; also Folios, Quartos, Octavos, and Duodecimos.

"The World before the Flood, a Poem, in Ten Cantos. By James Montgomery." This word Cantos, it must be allowed, has a more classical appearance without the e; whilst other words, in more common use, such as cargoes, negroes, mottoes, custom and general practice has made familiar to the eye; and the eye is certainly not without its influence, even in the regulation and adjustment of certain moot points in Orthography.

41. Cotemporary—

Contemporary—

We frequently meet with the word cotemporary in the writings of some men; whilst others, of better information, write contemporary. The word should always be spelled contemporary. Cotemporary is a downright barbarism; for the Latins never use co for con, except before a vowel, as coequal, coexistent, coefficient; but before a consonant, they either retain the n, as constitution, or melt it into another letter, as collection, composition, not coposition; also congratulate, not cogratulate.

42. Croud—

Crowd—

43. Desart—

Désert, désert, desèrt—

It is a clear case that, under every circumstance, that is, whatever meaning the word has, and whether the accent be on the first or last syllable, this word is uniformly spelled with an e, in the latter syllable. It is, nevertheless, sometimes, I might say often, printed with an a; as in the following stanza in one of Mrs. Dorset's Poems, annexed to the enlarged edition of her justly admired "Peacock at Home!"

"It chanced with the forest's ample range,
A Bear, sole monarch of the desert dwelt;
Satiate of power, and longing for a change,
He too the weariness of life had felt."

As Mrs. Dorset has written professedly for the use of young persons, and as her Poems, in particular, will be very generally read by the rising generation, any errors in orthography, which may occur in her writings, should be particularly guarded against; since that which we often see in print, we are very apt to think is right.

44. Farewel—

Farewell—

45. It's—

Its—

46. Scite—

Site—local position or situation.

This word is often printed, particularly in newspapers, with a c; though its derivation from the Latin, situs, manifestly shows the absurdity of inserting a letter which forms no part of the word from which it is derived.

* Whilst is an adverb of time, and means at the same time, or during a certain portion of time. On the contrary, while is properly a noun substantive, and means a portion of time; as, "pausing a while, thus to herself she mused."—(Milton.) Whiles and whilst were formerly used indiscriminately, but the former is now become obsolete.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO EUSTACE ST. CLERE, ESQ.

DEAR SIR,—Having referred agreeably to the subjoined letter, I find that the doctrine, stated therein, is advanced by you. On the elucidation of the difficulty, you will oblige the readers of the Iris generally, by requesting "A Machine-Maker" to explain how "IN THE WAY OF TRADE" he intends to benefit by the information.

Your's obediently,
EDITOR.

MR. EDITOR,—Mechanics have been my principal study for about 30 years. During this period I have assisted in the completion of several pieces of Mechanism; many of which were curious, and to persons less acquainted with the business, appeared really strange and mysterious. Yet, though strange, complex, and mysterious, they were all regulated by the "theory of motion," and produced certain, determinate effects.

In the "Manchester Iris" of Saturday last, page 3, col. 2, Mr. ST. CLERE affirms that "the HUMAN MIND is a strange, mysterious MACHINE;" This I have considered in almost every possible view, but cannot in any one obtain the same conclusion. However, seeing that that gentleman is learned, ingenious, and studious of the "ease and comfort" of the ignorant, I take the liberty of soliciting that he will favour me with the solution of a point which may prove not only generally interesting, but of infinite importance in the way of Trade to,
Your's &c.
A MACHINE-MAKER.

The SUBSCRIBERS to the MANCHESTER IRIS are respectfully informed that the TITLE PAGE and INDEX, for the year 1822, will be delivered GRATIS, on Saturday next.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A lengthy conversational introduction to the "Beauties of English Poetry" appeared in our last.—The condescension of Mr. St. Clere in giving instruction to sincere inquirers, naturally involves him in frequent argument.—Nor can we lament that disquisition arises from this gentleman's gratuitous labours, seeing that we derive such material benefit from his extensive knowledge and critical acumen.—"Poetry" and the "true sources of Poetry" are well defined in his paper No. II.; in No. III. we observe a course of study marked out which cannot but prove interesting to all who would court the Muse to advantage; and in No. IV. (contained in our present number) will be found illustrative dissertation which we consider as being nothing inferior to our best and most popular lectures on the same subject.—Our poetical correspondents will, we are sure, confirm our remarks; and not feel in the least dissatisfied with us for deferring their communications whilst the valuable papers of Mr. St. C. are on hand.

The "Roman of Llewellyn" is likely to be rescued from oblivion by the ability and spirit of our correspondent E.—With this charming poem, which is of very considerable length, the Iris will be enriched and its readers entertained for some time.

'Singular Biography'—the communication by 'Georgius'—The Sketch by 'Horace'—'S. W.' To a Young Lady—'Myself', on the Author of Waverley—and 'Ajax Flaggellifer' on the Essay of Britannicus, shall appear in course.

The Solution (of a "Jeuille Circle's" Puzzle) by our Red-Cross-Street correspondent is incorrect.—And T. T. is informed that it is "practicable."

The first communication of "A Subscriber" was forwarded to the author of the "Secret Writing" for the purpose of ascertaining the accuracy or inaccuracy of the words pointed out; we hope to receive it in time for our next.

The Stanzas by W. I. have not sufficient claims to originality for insertion.

TRAGIC! Who? and Whence? are equally irrelevant.—We have nothing to do with either connexion or country; the man in character alone concerns us.—The pleasure which would arise from a compliance with T.'s request, could hardly counterbalance the certain uneasiness and dissatisfaction.

THE AUGUSTAN AGE.

No. V.

BETWEEN the mere narrator of past events and the philosophical historian, there is an evident line of distinction. Whilst the former presents us with a meagre outline, the latter gives a finished picture. The value of the one must be estimated by the importance of the subject on which he treats: with the other this is a thing of little consideration. He throws a verdant tinge over the most barren; clothes the most unpromising with attractive graces; and gives to the most uninteresting a deep and lasting interest. He combines, in an eminent degree, amusement with serious study: when the historian can no longer amuse, the philosopher steps in to instruct us: wearied with the speculations of philosophy, we return with renewed delight to the unfatiguing narrative of the historian. Thus the mind is equally removed from constant and severe exertion on the one hand, and idle indifference on the other.

The present age abounds in well told narrative; but it has produced little that deserves the dignified title of history. Content with a simple relation of facts and occurrences, our modern historians have seldom attempted the arduous task of tracing up effects to their distant and unseen causes. If they have ever aspired at any thing more than simple narrative, it has been to deck in gorgeous colours the events they record; to paint realities in the overheated style of fiction; to give to history all the glow and fervour of poetic inspiration. And in this it must be acknowledged they have abundantly succeeded.

Amongst the few living historians whose names are likely to descend to future ages, we notice the author of the "History of the Crusades." MR. MILLS seems to possess a correct idea of the true nature of historical excellence. He has succeeded in uniting the unsociable characteristics of the imaginative and the philosophical style. Whenever his subject will admit them, he lavishly scatters the flowers of rhetoric; and paints with elegance and beauty, rather than minute correctness. His sentences are well turned and harmonious; and this, in works designed as much for amusement as instruction, is no small advantage. But it is not for its outward appearance and elegant attire alone, that the "History of the Crusades" deserves attention. It contains much deep reasoning and sound philosophy. Its author has taken up the subject in a bold and masterly manner; and has made the historical narration subservient to the profound remarks which it almost appears to illustrate rather than to occasion.—We rejoice to see that a history of the Roman empire, from its foundation to its final overthrow, is announced by Mr. Mills. If equal to his other productions, it will be no contemptible rival to the history of Gibbon. In Gibbon there is much to condemn. He has but few of those remarks which are the evidence of a profound and enlightened mind; and these few are buried amidst the gorgeous furniture of his elaborated sentences. His periods follow each other with an undulating kind of motion; and even in his variety (if we may so speak) there is monotony. Upon the whole, Gibbon is wanting in energy and muscular strength. He reminds us of the enervating luxuriance of an Eastern climate: all around looks gay and flourishing; but the inhabitants are totally unfit for great and harrassing exertions.

In divinity the present age can boast of many able writers. DOCTOR CHALMERS is the most popular. The work upon which his future fame will probably be grounded, is the Lectures on Astronomy. These are throughout highly ingenious, and not unfrequently they rise into true sublimity. The ideas are—to us at least—perfectly novel: they show an amazing power of conception, and bear the impress of exalted genius: but they are not very numerous. Throughout each sermon, one grand idea presents itself under a great variety of circumstances. It is offered to the reader's notice again and again, couched under a new figure, or concealed under a different phraseology. The style of Doctor Chalmers is faulty in the extreme. Words are heaped upon one another without regard to the rules of grammar, and even without the slightest meaning. The sentences are involved and obscure, sometimes absolutely unintelligible. The language can scarcely be called English: it abounds in new-fangled and high-sounding expressions, which never yet have found a place in the language of our country, and, it is to be hoped, never will. These seem to have been adopted either to render the style lofty and imposing; or to save the writer from the trouble of seeking for correct and elegant expressions.—But Doctor Chalmers is no less peculiar in his mode of writing than of thinking. In both he is without a model—in the former may he long remain without an imitator!

The politicians of the day are innumerable: in general they do not evince any extraordinary talent or extensive knowledge. Cobbett, however, is an exception. To a mind of extensive grasp he joins great acquisitions in general literature. Indeed, he seems to imagine that no knowledge beyond his own sphere is worth possessing: and consequently speaks with contempt of classical literature. His style is bold, nervous, simple, yet not destitute of ornament. He is often coarse and vulgar; addressing himself to the most uneducated he assimilates his style to their taste and capacity; and therefore is unfit to be viewed as a model for imitation. Between Cobbett and Dean Swift there is a striking analogy. It extends not only to their methods of thought and expression, but also to their private characters. But we cannot here enter at length upon the subject; and are the more inclined to put a stop to our remarks, as we do not feel anxious to be numbered amongst the disciples, and are equally unwilling to be thought the enemies of one whose style and talents are no less the subject of debate, than the principles of which he has long been the powerful advocate.

REVIEW.

NOTES DURING A VISIT TO EGYPT, NUBIA, THE OASIS, MOUNT SINAI, AND JERUSALEM. By Sir Frederick Henneker, Bart. London 1823.

This volume is just suited to our taste,—it contains much in a moderate compass! Sir Frederick never tires us by spinning out his remarks and descriptions to an almost imperceptible tenuity. His candour is equally singular; and we scarcely hesitate to affirm, that, with inferior talent, and less information, the pretensions of other travellers are infinitely higher. Sir F. says:—

‘With respect to the scene of my travels, I did not advance beyond the neighbourhood of the second cataract, and I made but a short visit to the Oasis, Mount Sinai, and Jerusalem. As to the subject, I may observe, that my delight was rather in nature than in works of art: of the latter, indeed, I have not omitted the name of any object, and have particularly mentioned such features as sufficiently interested me while on the spot to take drawings of. In speaking of the people, I am, perhaps, in some few instances, deceived, either by vulgar errors or by wantonness: but, in general, I have related only such anecdotes as appeared to me to be characteristic, and such as I practically learnt.’

Our author's description of Jerusalem is so perspicuous, concise, and interesting, that we cannot, in justice to our readers, omit it;—

‘Jerusalem is called, even by Mohammedans, “The Blessed City”—the streets of it are narrow and deserted—the houses dirty and ragged—the shops few and forsaken—and throughout the whole there is not one symptom of either commerce, comfort, or happiness.—“Is this the city that men call the Perfection of Beauty, the Joy of the whole earth!”

‘The town, which appears to me not worth possession, even without the trouble of conquest, is walled entirely round; it is about a mile in length, and half a mile in width, so that its circumference may be estimated at three miles; in three quarters of an hour I performed the circuit. It would be difficult to conceive how it could ever have been larger than it now is; for, independent of the ravines, the four outsides of the city are marked by the brook of Siloa, by a burial place, at either end, and by the hill of Calvary; and the hill of Calvary is now within the town, so that it was formerly smaller than it is at present. The best view of it is from the the Mount of Olives; it commands the exact shape, and nearly every particular, viz. the church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Armenian Convent, the mosque of Omar, St. Stephen's Gate, the round topped houses, and the barren vacancies of the city. Without the walls are a Turkish burial-ground, the tomb of David, a small grove near the tombs of the kings, and all the rest is a surface of rock, on which are a few numbered trees. The mosque of Omar is the Saint Peter's of Turkey, and the respective saints are held respectively by their own faithful, in equal veneration. The building itself has a light pagoda appearance; the garden in which it stands occupies a considerable part of the city; and, contrasted with the surrounding desert, is beautiful; but it is forbidden ground, and Jew or Christian entering within its precinct, must, if discovered, forfeit either his religion or his life. Lately, as a traveller was entering the city, a man snatched part of his luggage from the camel, and fled here for shelter. A few days since a Greek Christian entered the mosque; he was a Turkish subject, and servant to a Turk; he was invited to change his religion, but refused, and was immediately murdered by the mob. His body remained exposed in the street, and a passing Mussulman, kicking up the head, exclaimed—"That is the way I would serve all Christians." One of the methods of justifying an assault, and of extorting money, is by swearing to have seen a Christian in the mosque, or to have heard him blaspheme the Prophet; and false witnesses to the fact are very readily found. In my ascent up the Mount of Olives, a slave amused himself by pelting me with stones, and, on proceeding to punish him, my attendant called me off from the pursuit, and told me that Blackee would probably swear to have heard me blaspheme the Prophet; and slaves are doubly protected—by the laws, and by their masters.

"The fountain of Siloa is so inconsiderable, and water altogether so scarce, that when my friend, Mr. Grey, inquired the way to it, the person refused to tell him, giving him as a reason—"You will write it in your book, and I vow to God that we shall have no water next year."

"The tomb of David is held in great respect by the Turks, and to swear by it is one of their most sacred oaths. The tomb of the Kings is an inconsiderable excavation in the rock: three small chambers, in which are receptacles for the coffins; the lid of a sarcophagus, of tolerable workmanship, remains yet unbroken, as also a stone door. In the Aeldama, or field of blood, is a square building, into which are thrown the bones of strangers who may happen to die there. This side of the mountain is pock-marked with sepulchral caves, like the hills at Thebes: concerning these Dr. Clarke has made mention. The burial-place of the Jews is over the valley of Kedron, and the fees for breaking the soil afford a considerable revenue to the governor. The tomb of Jehosaphat is respected; but at the tomb of Absalom every Jew, as he passes, throws a stone, not like the Arab custom in so doing to perpetuate a memory, but to overwhelm it with reproach: among the tombs is one having an Egyptian torus and cornice, and another surmounted by a pyramid on a Grecian base, as if the geniuses of the two countries had met half way. There is, however, nothing so disagreeable in these combinations, as in the deviations from architecture by Mr. N. The burial-place of the Turks is under the walls, near St. Stephen's Gate: from the opposite side of the valley, I was witness to the ceremony of parading a corpse round the mosque of Omar, and then bringing it forth for burial. I hastened to the grave, but was soon driven away; as far as my 'on dit' tells me, it would have been worth seeing: the grave is strawn with red earth, supposed to be of the Ager Damascenus, of which Adam was made; by the side of the corpse is placed a stick, and the priest tells him that the Devil will tempt him to become a Christian, but that he must make good use of his stick, &c.

"The church of the Holy Sepulchre is a small unworthy building: it is held in respect by the Turks, inasmuch as they allow that our Saviour was a holy man, and it is guarded by them, as they derive great benefit by a poll-tax levied upon pilgrims at admission. It is the scene of hypocrisy, brutalization, and contention. The miracle of calling fire from heaven is more palpable, and is more unpardonable, than the melting of the blood of St. Januarius: the orgies that take place upon the occasion, are worse than Bacchanalian, and the hatred existing between the Greek and Latin Christians is diabolical: there was lately an attempt to massacre the latter in the very church. The Greeks, having most money to pay the governor, have the greatest possessions in the building, and they have at present immured the tomb of Geoffroi: every stone is contended for by rival parties, and becomes a source of wealth to Mohammedans. The Jew may not presume to enter even the court-yard of the temple; I saw one unfortunate wretch dragged in, and, before he was kicked out, he was severely beaten by both Christians and Turks. These outcasts are so thoroughly despised, that an angry Arab will sometimes curse a man by calling him, "you Jew of a Christian."

"The on dit that conducted me through the regular routine, pointed out first the Via Dolorosa, by which our Saviour carried the cross; and here was the house of Pilate; and here was the prison of Peter; and, among various identical places, were those, where Stephen was stoned, where Judas betrayed his master with a kiss, where our Saviour composed the Lord's Prayer, and whence he ascended into heaven. But there is no box of sweetmeats, no museum of relics; no Virgin's garment, as at Aix-la-Chapelle; no part of the crown of thorns, as in the church of St. Cecilia at Rome; no vessel full of the Virgin's milk, as in the Basilica di S. Croce. There is scarcely one visible object, excepting part of the pillar to which our Saviour was bound, and even this is rather to be felt than seen; you are allowed to touch it with a stick, and to see if you can by a rushlight. I wished, but in vain, to discover if it were of the same materials as that shown at Rome, and to which is attached the same account.

"As in Greece there is not a remarkable hill without a fable, so in Palestine there is not a cave nor a stone without some historical anecdote from the New Testament. The generality of pilgrims to Jerusalem are Greeks; they bring acceptable offerings, and are probably unable to read: and, therefore, the method of the cicerone to make them acquainted with the life of our Saviour is commendable; even the Old Testament is not forgotten, though Titus is: the pool of Beersheba and David's Tower are still pointed out to believing pilgrims. There has been but little variation in enumerating the objects of curiosity for the last two hundred years, whether in Latin, Italian, French, or English: Quaresmus is the most copious and correct, old Maundrell the most unaffected, and Chateaubriand the most enthusiastic. The best description of the town is by Jeremiah.

"A cave on the Mount of Olives is pointed out as having been the abode of the Apostles, and from this spot I took a drawing of Jerusalem.

CRITICISM.

COCK ROBIN.

[The following Jeu d'esprit is extracted from that interesting Metropolitan Periodical—"The Museum." The Editor very appropriately reminds us of Addison's elaborate critique on the lyric ballad of Chevy-Chase, and the analysis of the Knave of Hearts in the Microcosm.]

Ploratus, mortis comites, et funeris atril!—Lucret, lib. 2.

The lovers of poetry, who feel that they cannot aspire to the rewards of fame, will best testify their zeal for the interests of literature by the endeavour to do justice to the merits of neglected authors. Impressed with these sentiments, it was with considerable pleasure I first discovered the beauty of a poem, of which, till lately, I had but a slight acquaintance.

In criticising a poetical composition, the attention is directed, first, to the subject. Of all subjects, the most interesting to man, as a reasonable being, are the incidents which mark the effects of the various passions.* Of these, the best adapted for the display of striking and sublime events, of noble sentiments, of poetical excellence, are the sympathies of generous friendship; and there is no occasion where that virtue can be more successfully depicted, than when premature death in vain endeavours to sever the sacred tie. The episode of Nisus and Euryalus in the Æneid, and the verse where Homer bids the stubborn soul of Achilles dissolve in torrents over the lifeless Patroclus, speak volumes on this subject.

The poem under consideration presents to us a murdered corse, surrounded by friends whom the virtues of the deceased had conciliated. Thirsting for revenge, they cry aloud for the assassin; with the liveliest solicitude they enquire the circumstance of the catastrophe, and contend in generous emulation to pay the last honours to the loved remains. The group is deeply affecting. The sympathising reader is borne along in the tumult of conflicting passions; and I envy not the feelings of that man who, without sharing in the emotion of the speaker, can read, in the opening of the poem, that impassioned interrogation,—

Who killed Cock Robin?

The exordium deserves particular notice. It is sublimely abrupt. A truly poetical spirit rushes at once into the subject. It is left to minor poets to describe the time and place with a certainty sufficient for the precision of judicial proceedings. The greater bard stops not, as it were, to knock at the door, and formally demand admittance, but throws himself alertly through the window, and presents himself sans cérémonie, before his astonished audience. It appears that the groans of the feathered hero have hurried his alarmed companions to witness the melancholy confirmation of their apprehensions. The vile assassin, too much absorbed in the gratification of his diabolical vengeance to consult the means of safety, is found near the fatal spot, feasting his eyes with the sufferings of his victim. The poet here takes occasion to display the force of contrast. The murderer—surrounded—desperate—avows the deed with a degree of horrible exultation, that serves admirably to heighten the effect produced by the sympathy of the spectators:—

Who killed Cock Robin?

I—says the Sparrow.

Not content with this callous confession, he dwells with delight on the act, and triumphantly shows the instruments of vengeance:—

I (says the Sparrow)

With my bow and arrow,
And I killed Cock Robin!

The purposes of contrast being thus attained, we are not hurt by any further exhibition of the monster, and imagination hurries him away to ignominy and tortures.

But did Robin fall alone, unheeded?—Was no friend present to compose his ruffling plumes, to restrain the convulsive outstretching of his claws, or to catch the breath which quivered on his beak? These are the next tender inquiries, expressed with an admirable brevity:—

Who saw him die?

I, says the Fly,
With my little eye,
And I saw him die!

Such is the reply given by little Musea, (with a simplicity peculiar to his nature) and eagerly vouching that he was an actual eye-witness of the afflicting scene. The judgment of the bard is conspicuous in having made Musea and Picris the only spectators of the catastrophe. Since these were unable, the one from his diminutive stature, and the other from his local situation, to arrest the fatal stroke.—The poem proceeds:—

Who caught his blood?

I, says the Fish,
With my little dish,
And I caught his blood!

Nothing can be more natural than this description of the endeavour to preserve by some relic the memory of one so dear. The revenues of whole provinces have cheaply purchased the parings of saintly nails; and what could, to the companions of Robin, be a more valuable memorial than his blood—or a plume dipped in the precious stream?

The unhappy circle now hasten to prepare the rites of sepulture. Soberness, little model of industry, will furnish the sad robe of death; gifted by nature with acutely-feeling horns, to what so commendable office could she apply:—

Who'll make the shroud?

I, says the Beetle,
With my thread and needle,
And I'll make the shroud.

The sagacious emblem of science, Minerva's bird, becomes the architect of the narrow house of mortality. How fit an agent; With what decorous gravity—in what impressive silence would he not discharge his duties!—One Corvus volunteers to be priest, whose solemn voice and sable vestments accorded with the sacerdotal office:—

* Vide Aristotle's Poetics.

† See Horace—De Arte Poet. 'Multaque tolles, &c.

Who'll be the Parson?
I, says the Rook,
With my little book,
And I'll be the parson.

The tuneful Aloude also offers her assistance:

Who'll be the clerk?
I, says the Lark,
Though it is in the dark.

In no instance, perhaps, is the judgment of the poet more happily evinced, than in the reply of the Lark. It marks most forcibly the strength of her attachment. To no inhabitant of the air is the bright day more delightful, or the night more abhorrent. But midnight being selected as the fit hour for the observance of the mournful rites, the feelings of the friend overcome the antipathies of nature, and the melody of the Lark with an earth-born angel's voice, comes to swell the mournful hymn of death.

The noble example is eagerly followed; to bear the pall, to bring the torch, to sound the knell, are objects of generous competition.

And let it not be supposed that so perfect a poet as the author of the Cocco-Robiniad could overlook any portion of the solemn pomp and circumstance calculated to deepen the melancholy scene. How imperfect had been the effect of the bard's description, if the funeral had taken place in the gaudy glare of day, where the laughing sunshine would seem but to mock the sorrowing group; and how beautifully is the hour of midnight selected, when the torch may fling its red and pitchy smoke on the gloomy scene:—

Who'll carry the link?
I, says the Linnet.

The same impatient solicitude to testify the last mark of respect to the defunct hero, which characterises the other personages in the poem, is evinced by the Linnet. Without a moment's delay she offers her services:—

I, says the Linnet,
I'll fetch it in a minute,
And I'll carry the link.

After such an affecting scene, it is imperiously necessary that the mind of the reader be prepared and tranquillised for the succeeding verse. He has been horror-struck in the commencement of the poem by atrocity and blood, he has then been carried along by the tumultuous exertion of anxious officiousness; and the attention is now, as it should be, relieved by some soft and amiable object on which it can dwell with tender pleasure. How then has the poet met the expectation of the reader by passages beyond the puny carplings of Zoilus:—

Who'll be chief mourner?
I, says the Dove,
For I mourn for my Love,
And I'll be chief mourner.

How soft, how polished, are the thoughts and words; how exquisite is the poetic tact and taste: "I mourn for my Love."—Sweet bird! Thou shalt indeed be chief mourner, for thou art alone fit for so tender an office. Equally judicious is the 'keeping' in the other characters, as they appear in order on the stage:—

Who'll bear the pall?
We, says each Wren,
Both the Cock and the Hen,
And we'll bear the pall.

The distinguishing feature of the poem, the warm eagerness of Robin's friends, is here again discernible. It was not enough that one Wren should spring forward to offer his best services. Both the Cock and the Hen, forsaking their own nest, and deaf to the chirpings of their unsledged offspring, unite to bear the pall.

The two following stanzas present nothing particularly worthy of remark. But in this very want of interest the art of the poet is conspicuous. He has dexterously withheld all splendour or passion from these verses, to render more impressive the close of the elegy:—

Who'll sing a psalm?
I, says the Thrush,
As she sat on a bush,
And I'll sing a psalm.
Who'll toll the bell?
I, says the Bull,
Because I can pull:

Mark the close of the verse:—

So, Cock Robin—Farewell!

What a moving cadence: "Cock Robin—Farewell!"

—How admirably does it lead us to the peroration, which I never yet could read without diluting with my tears the contents of my inkstand:—

All the birds in the air
Fell to sighing and sobbing,
When they heard the bell toll
For poor dead Cock Robin!
To Morsæ Volucras, te turba ferarum,
Flevarunt.—OVID.

In an elegy like the one before us, the moral must not be disregarded; and here let me remark, that the bard purposed to convey, by allegory, a lesson pregnant with invaluable instruction; and in availing himself of the agency of the plumed, in preference to non-plumed bipeds, he is justified by the example of Homer himself, who deemed the mortal strife of the frog and the mouse a subject not unworthy of his lyre. The moral of the Cocco-Robiniad is striking and was once new, and has been therefore imitated by most of our modern poets. It teaches us the excellence of that bond of union denominated friendship, and the high degree of affection with which the memory of him is cherished who has conciliated the good-will of his fellow-creatures, when compared with the remembrances attached to one who has pursued an opposite line of conduct;—and, in fine, it inculcates the impressive truth, that virtue is its own reward!

Having considered the subject, weighed the merits of the particular stanzas, and deduced the moral of the story; we must advert to the excellence of the style, and the beauty of the numbers. But this, as our learned and lengthy divines say, will form the subject of our next week's discourse.

JORINDA AND JORINDEL.

(From Grimm's German Popular Stories.)

There was once an old castle that stood in the middle of a large thick wood, and in the castle lived an old fairy. All the day long she flew about in the form of an owl, or crept about the country like a cat; but at night she became an old woman again. When any youth came within a hundred paces of her castle, he became quite fixed, and could not move a step till she came and set him free: but when any pretty maiden came within that distance, she was changed into a bird; and the fairy put her into a cage and hung her up in a chamber in the castle. There were seven hundred of these cages hanging in the castle, and all with beautiful birds in them.

Now there was once a maiden whose name was Jorinda: she was prettier than all the pretty girls that ever were seen; and a shepherd, whose name was Jorindel, was very fond of her, and they were soon to be married. One day they went to walk in the wood, that they might be alone: and Jorindel said, "We must take care that we don't go too near the castle." It was a beautiful evening; the last rays of the setting sun shone bright through the long stems of the trees upon the green under-wood beneath, and the turtledoves sang plaintively from the tall birches.

Jorinda sat down to gaze upon the sun; Jorindel sat by her side; and both felt sad, they knew not why; but it seemed as if they were to be parted from one another for ever. They had wandered a long way; and when they looked to see which way they should go home, they found themselves at a loss to know what path to take.

The sun was setting fast, and already half of his circle had disappeared behind the hill: Jorindel on a sudden looked behind him, and as he saw through the bushes that they had, without knowing it, sat down close under the old walls of the castle, he shrank for fear, turned pale, and trembled. Jorinda was singing,

"The ring-dove sang from the willow spray,
Well-a-day! well-a-day!
He mourn'd for the fate
Of his lovely mate,
Well-a-day!"

The song ceased suddenly. Jorindel turned to see the reason, and beheld his Jorinda changed into a nightingale; so that her song ended with a mournful jug, jug. An owl with fiery eyes flew three times round them, and three times screamed, Tu whu! Tu whu! Tu whu! Jorindel could not move: he stood fixed as a stone, and could neither weep, or speak, or stir hand or foot. And now the sun went quite down; the gloomy night came; the owl flew into a bush; and a moment after the old fairy came pale and meagre, with staring eyes, and a nose and chin that almost met one another.

She mumbled something to herself, seized the nightingale, and went away with it in her hand. Poor Jorindel saw the nightingale was gone,—but what could he do? He could not speak, he could not move from the spot where he stood. At last the fairy came back, and sung with a

"Till the prisoner's fast,
And her doom is cast,
There stay! Oh, stay!
When the charin is around her,
And the spell has bound her,
Hie away! away!"

On a sudden Jorindel found himself free. Then he fell on his knees before the fairy, and prayed her to give him back his dear Jorinda; but she said he should never see her again, and went her way.

He prayed, he wept, he sorrowed, but all in vain. "Alas!" he said, "what will become of me?"

He could not return to his own home, so he went to a strange village, and employed himself in keeping sheep. Many a time did he walk round and round as near to the hated castle as he dared go. At last he dreamt one night that he found a beautiful purple flower, and in the middle of it lay a costly pearl; and he dreamt that he plucked the flower, and went with it in his hand into the castle, and that every thing he touched with it was disenchanted, and that there he found his dear Jorinda again.

In the morning when he awoke, he began to search over hill and dale for this pretty flower; and eight long days he sought for it in vain: but on the ninth day early in the morning he found the beautiful purple flower; and in the middle of it was a large dew drop as big as a costly pearl.

Then he plucked the flower, and set out and travelled day and night till he came again to the castle. He walked nearer than a hundred paces to it, and yet he did not become fixed as before, but found that he could go close up to the door.

Jorindel was very glad to see this: he touched the door with the flower, and it sprang open, so that he went in through the court, and listened when he heard so many birds singing. At last he came to the chamber where the fairy sat, with the seven hundred birds singing in the seven hundred cages. And when she saw Jorindel she was very angry, and screamed with rage; but she could not come within two yards of him, for the flower he held in his hand protected him. He looked around at the birds, but alas! there were many nightingales, and how then should he find his Jorinda? While he was thinking what to do, he observed that the fairy had taken down one of the cages, and was making her escape through the door. He ran or flew to her, touched the cage with the flower,—and his Jorinda was before him. She threw her arms round his neck and looked as beautiful as ever, as beautiful as when they walked together in the wood.

Then he touched all the other birds with the flower, so that they resumed their old forms; and took his dear Jorinda home, where they lived happily many years.

POETRY.

THE ROMAUNT OF LLEWELLYN;

CANTO I.—PART II.

XXIII.

O'er the wide sea the moon was gleaming high ;—
The seaman's voice was mute ;—the vessel tight
Held on her way ;—now would Llewellyn try
How mote his citterne sound on such a night :—
For, skill'd was he to wake, with finger light,
Its slumbering strings, and bid them breathe again
Their tales of love, and teen, and fate's despite !
And now, careering o'er that moonlit main,
He woke, with voice and hand, this long-remember'd strain.

XXIV.

A lay it was of simplest melodie,
Aforetime framed ;—when first his bosom heaved
To the strange magic of a woman's ee ;—
Or e'er his heart with hopeless passion grieved ;—
Or e'er of all he found himself bereaved,
That may delight the soul of trusting man ;—
While hope, the syren, sang ; and he,—believed !
O'er the wild-warbling wires he lightly ran
His plaintive touch, and then this lowly lay began !

'Elleore,—thy cheek is pale !
The rose doth to the lily veil !
Ladye, those sweet lips of thine,
No more like lush carnations shine !
Life of mine, thy languid form
Droops like the snowdrop in the storm !

2.

'Ladye dear,—yet do I feel
Just as in thy days of weal !
Flame so pure, so bright as mine,
Changeth not for change of thine !
Elleore,—my heart, my love,
One, through weal and woe, shall prove !

3.

'Yet,—thou loved one,—shouldst thou die,
Not one tear should dim this eye !
Small, sweet lady, were the grief
That in tears mote find relief !
The heart that deeply, truly, feels,—
Within its inmost core conceals !

'Ellenore,—then if thou die
Not from me should steal one sigh !
Soul of mine, this heart should break
Ere sigh or tear its grief mote speak !
For, I wote, they all are vain
When hope and life no more remain !

5.

'At such dread moment,—all were still,
As on the height of Athos' hill !
Where, 'tis said, no breezes bland
Disturb the track traced on the sand !
And no softly falling shower
Calls from the sullen earth a flower !

6.

'Well I ween, I soon should lie
In the grave so peacefully !
Never more to know or feel,
What sighs and tears may not reveal !
Love as truthful, grief as true,
As a poor broken heart e'er knew !

XXV.

So sang Llewellyn,—o'er the silent main
Floated the gentle accents far away ;—
Unheard, ywis, by mortal ear the strain,
Save his, who framed the sorrow-speaking lay ;
And the rude steersman's,—who did rather pay
His mute attention to the quivering steel,
That show'd him o'er the deep his dubious way,—
Unto the veering prow, and guiding wheel,—
Than to the simple song that says what lovers feel !

XXVI.

Agon he struck the strings of his guitar,
And woke a sad and touching symphony :—
'Twas like,—the sound of waters from afar,—
Or mocking brooklet softly bubbling by,—

Or trees that answer to young zephyr's sigh !
Such have I heard,—percase again may hear,—
Which brought sweet dreams afore my pensive eye,
Of joyance gone, and scenes most sweet and dear,
When I had but begun my boyhood's gay career.

'Gaily we, in boyhood's hours,
Through sweet scenes of joyance goe,
Plucking pleasure's short-lived flowers,—
Weetless then of future woe !
Haughtily, in youthhede's prime,
Many a lofty wish is framed ;—
Eye of fire, and brow sublime,
Show the heart as yet untamed !

2.

'Dole in derne survenes at last,—
Weeping teares and sorrowing sighs !
Wearily each day is past,
Bootless then are former joys !—
Slowly hours of sorrow roll !—
Swiftly happy moments fly !—
Longer is a day of dole,
Than a year,—an age of joye !'

XXVII.

Such was the lay ;—and, well I ween, that lay,
Linkt with sweet sounds, of melancholy tone,—
Mote bleeding heart and anguish'd sprite appay
With thoughts that dwell on sorrows like its own !
Such solace springs from sympathy alone,
That, from another's woe knows how to extract
A charm to still the deeply mutter'd groan,—
To calm the breast with hopeless anguish rackt,
And hush to slumber woes, the which too long have waked !

XXVIII.

The wanderer now a loftier prelude tried,
That breathed of battles,—of expiring groans,—
Of chiefs that mid the maddening conflict died,—
Of widows' plainings, and of orphans' moans,—
And all that man's unceasing discord owns !
It was a strain a warrior's breast to please,
Whose softer thoughts ambition's clarion drowns !
The prelude ended, to the wide-spread seas
And starry skies he sung this lay of elder Greece.

'My brand I'll bear with myrtle branches drest ;
As, erst, that peerless pair of brothers bore
The blades, which pierced a tyrant's haughty breast,
And made their native Athens free once more !
Blest youth, for thee death vainly spread his toils,
Beloved Harmodius ;—for legends tell
That, with Tydides, in the happy isles,
And with Achilles swift of foot, you dwell,

2.

'My brand I will, with myrtle boughs, disguise ;
As, erst, those noble brothers bore their blades,—
When, at Minerva's solemn sacrifice,
They sent the haughty tyrant to the shades.
Thy fame, beloved Harmodius, ne'er shall fade !
Aristogeiton's glory shall remain !—
For that, unto the tyrant's heart, the blade
Ye plunged, and made your Athens free again !'

XXIX.

Ill a light citterne soited lay so bold ;—
Ill match'd a gentle voice so rude a strain !
That voice, those strings, seld had aforetime told
Of aught but love ;—and of his pleasing pain,
And soul-breathed sighs ;—and of the haught disdain
That woman's wanton heart so often shows
To humble troth ;—and now he turns again
To the sweet theme ;—for sweet are all love's woes,
Sweeter by far, perdie, than the death-like repose

XXX.

Of cold, unfeeling hearts ;—ay, lay me down
To die or to renounce my deep-fixt love ;
I would not change, not for the richest crown
That the earth owns ;—so be I might not prove
The warm, fond, love-born wish, that, interweave
With every thought, gives life its sweetest zest,—
Else wellnigh worthless,—and not much above
What nature hath allow'd even to the beast,
That, once with grazing fill'd, there lays him down to rest.

XXXI.

This life,—which witless mortals precious deem,—
With all that wisdom, wealth, or power e'er gave,

Fame's dear-bought breath, or mad ambition's dream,
Hath not a single heartfelt blessing, save
The charm of mutual love !—Still do we crave Something, but wote not well what it may be !—
That nameless something, in which we would lave
Our hearts and souls, is sacred sympathy,—
When virtue's bands unite two minds eternallye !

XXXII.

But, to my theme :—he turn'd to love again,
And sang a lay, as ye full soon shall hear ;
A gentle lay, that well exprest the pain
Of despised love, and show'd the fickle fair
One's plighted troth, which he had held so dear,
Broken like a reed :—and, as he sang, the strings
Were wet, I ween, with many a dropping tear ;—
For many a thought of past imaginings,
Deep-buried in his breast, agen to light it brings !

1.

'On seeming smiles and gentle guise relying,—
The while his heart with newborn rapture beats,—
What witless wight, for thee, thou false one, sighing,
In whisper'd tones his tale of love repeats ?
For whom are now those dark-brown ringlets waving
Thy neck around, with such unstudied grace ?
For whom is now that beauteous bosom heaving ?
Who gazes on that soul-bewildering face ?

2.

'Alas, though now he hail the soft emotion
Thy fond caress and winning words impart,—
Soon shall he find thee trothless as the ocean !
Soon shall keen anguish strike his trusting heart !
Unhappy me !—thy fleeting smiles believing,
I deem'd I aye should find thee true and kind,—
When, as my heart was lost beyond retrieving,
My fondest hopes were scatter'd to the wind !'

XXXIII.

Such song he sung ;—and, sooth to say, it came
Even from his inmost soul, and did express
The tortures of a bosom where hope's flame
Was quenched in waves of bale and bitterness !
Well spoke the trembling strings the dire distress,
And derne despair of a love-wounded soul,
Wellnigh sunk beneath the heaviness
Of all the woes, in one dark tide that roll !

Aye me,—meseems too true, that man is made for dole !

XXXIV.

And now, strain after strain, he pours them forth,—
Albe that none of whom he recks may hear ;—
Each lay gives to another lay its birth,
The night, the air, so gentle are, and clear,—
And former thoughts, and feelings that were dear,
With force impetuous rush upon the mind !—
Soon days gone by, and distant scenes are near,—
The present is as nothing,—for behind
To joyance past he turns,—yet may no solace find !

XXXV.

For what is joy, present or past ?—A dream,
Perdie,—and this each mortal wight shall know !
The life of man is not what it doth seem Unto the unpractised youth !—for all, I trow,
Or soon or late, shall find it teem with woe !
Except, in sooth, the young, who by the grace
Of heaven, which ruleth this spot of dirt below,
Are early laid at rest,—ere yet the face
They meet of fell adversity, or learn to trace

XXXVI.

The gloomy march of life by sighs and tears !
Ah me,—let never wight, in highest glee,
Forget that after gladness woe appears,
A guest unbid,—unwelcome too,—how be !
Yet, certain as the tempest to the sea,
As death to them that live !—Even such the fate
Of earth's tear-nurtured sons, by heaven's decree !
With joyance, then, let none be too elate,—
But evermore in mind bear their uncertain state !

XXXVII.

Well I remember me,—while yet a boy,
From a wise dame learnt I a cunning tale ;—
That, after bale, there sometimes springeth joy,—
But, after pleasure, dole doth aye prevail !
For sisters twain they be, and never fail,
Together linkt, o'er the wide world to range !
So, take them as ye may,—first laugh, then wail,
As oftent is our lot,—ne deem it strange,
If momentary joy to long impleasance change !

XXXVIII.

And, sooth to say, 'tis but a troublous dream,
This life that we possess;—which, whether 'twere
In wrath or kindness given us, is a theme
Of meditation awful, deep, severe!
Wise to my mind that saying doth appear
Which erst the sage of Salamis did give,—
'Call no one blessed, till the funeral bier
His lifeless frame receive;—with all that live,
Or e'er their dying hour, with adverse fate may strive!'
(To be continued.)

TO MY MOTHER!

ON COMING OF AGE.

Full oft my fa'vrite harp I've strung,
Midst scenes of pleasure, and delight,
When hope, and joy on tip-toe sprang;
To chase the gloom of sorrow's night;
When friendship wreath'd my youthful brow
With laurels from the warmest breast;
And love still pledg'd her dearest vow,
Or fondly midst my cares—carest!
When morning bid me sigh farewell!
Such moments, oh! what tongue can tell!

Yet, Mother, midst this changing scene,
My lyre hath never sung of thee,
Though as the oak to ivy green,
All that is dear art thou to me.
The burning thirst for future fame,
That grief and gloom could well repay;
The ardent impulse for a name
O'er which bright fortune cast a ray,
These, these the youthful bosom cheer,
But still to me, thou'rt far more dear.

My Mother!—'twas that tender name,
Which first my infant lips could say;
(Alas! no Father could I claim—
In death's cold arms he silent lay)
And when my prattling tongue could tell
The story of my infant toils,
Attentive on each theme thou'dst dwell,
And crown me with approving smiles;
Smooth down my ambient locks, and pray
That I might live to know this day.

And I have reach'd this wish'd for day!
Light as a feather in the air,
I've wing'd my silent trackless way,
With scarce a trace of dark despair.
For midst the throng of care or grief,
Thy dictates (ever kindly given)
Taught me a wounded heart's relief,
Was in the smiling Hope of Heaven?
Yet still I wander from the road
Which leads me to a — God!

Yes, 'twas thy fost'ring tender care,
That snatch'd me from the rav'nous grave,
That bid me think not of despair,
But sickness, death, and sorrow brave.
'Twas thou who watch'd me when I slept,
Who fondly hung around my bed;
And when affliction came, thou wept,
And tried to ease my aching head;
Still watch'd with ever anxious eye,
And scarcely dar'd to breathe a sigh!

Have I forgot thee—no, thy name
Is wound around my fervent heart:
Thine may be sorrow's pang or flame,
Yet still we'll never, never part.
When age appears—(and time will come)
My heart shall bound to lend thee aid;
And should the cold and silent tomb
Be thine, ere all thy worth's repaid
Then may we meet, when time shall be no more,
Nor e'en a ruffled wave shall lash the shore.

VARIETIES.

INGENIOUS EXPEDIENT.—The following is the substance of a curious direction contained in the will of the late Mr. Benbacock, recently made public by the death of Mrs. B. whose effects are announced for sale in the papers. He desired that after all his just debts were liquidated, his books should be packed in a wooden box, bored on all sides with holes, and be thrown into the river. The executors, however, deemed it a very dangerous measure, in case of any latent claim that might hereafter be made on the estate, and hit upon the following expedient, viz:—to leave some small debts, or fractional parts of debts unpaid—thus providing against such an event, and at the same time complying with the commands expressed in the will.

A Nobleman dunned by his tailor, who was not only a very ill-favoured person, but perhaps made still more disgracings by his business, said to him in a humorous pet, "Gad curse it—you are the ugliest rascal in London. Show me but a man as ugly as yourself, and I'll pay your bill." Our ingenious tradesman departed, reflecting on this hard condition, when by good luck it struck him to enlist Heidegger on his behalf; but this was no easy job; Heidegger was a high Don, and it was absolutely necessary to employ finesse. So he went to the Count as with a message from my Lord, desiring to see him immediately. Heidegger hesitated, but at length went; and the tailor watching his opportunity, popped his own ugly face in at the door along with the hideous visage of the foreigner. The Nobleman could not resist the appeal, but, bursting into a fit of laughter, worth all the money, gave a cheque for his bill.

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE GEORGE COOKE.—During Kean's recent visit to Whitehaven, he related the following anecdote of the late George Cooke, which may possibly be new to many of our readers:—When George was playing at Liverpool, the managers found great difficulty in keeping him sober; but after repeated transgressions, he solemnly promised not to offend again during his stay. In the evening of the day on which the promise was made, George was not to be found when wanted for Sir Pertinax Macmurephant; the audience grew impatient; the manager stormed, and all was in "most admired disorder." After a long search, one of the managers found him at a pot house near the theatre, where he was drinking with great composure and perseverance out of a very small glass. "Oh! Mr. Cooke," exclaimed the irritated manager, "you have again broken your solemn promise; did you not tell me you would give over drinking?" George surveyed the manager with the most provoking coolness, and said, "I certainly did make such a promise, but you cannot expect a man to reform all at once. I have given over in a great measure," holding up the small glass to the manager's nose.

INDIAN CURIOSITIES.—Capt. J. Betham has brought from Madras a collection of curiosities illustrative of manners and science amongst the natives of India, consisting of agricultural implements, carriages, Masulah boats, catamarans, musical and warlike instruments, a collection of drawings of the costumes of the casta, carved and painted figures of the different trades, Hindoo deities, Pegu weights, female ornaments, a few valuable manuscripts (particularly an Armenian version of the New Testament, 570 years old), some ancient coins, and other curiosities; forming altogether an Asiatic museum, which we are led to expect he intends to have exhibited. He has also brought home an Indian Cosmorama, consisting of 104 extremely curious historical drawings.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SECRET WRITING.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I take the liberty of sending you what I presume to be an explanation of the "Specimen of Secret Writing" inserted in the last page of Saturday's Iris. At the same time I must acknowledge that I have not been able to discover the "principles on which the solution must depend" any further than this, viz: that a is substituted for m, d for y, &c. &c.

I mistake if there be not an error in the spelling of the words bacotink and antq in the first line: I presume they should have been written, bajetink and amig.
I am, &c. A SUBSCRIBER.

Mythology is a subject which is involved in much intricacy. From the great length of time, indeed, which has elapsed since the origin of Pagan worship, and the obscurity in which the early history of all nations is shrouded, it is extremely difficult to trace the origin of their various religious rites, even with all the assistance that can be derived from a knowledge of what may be called the primitive languages, and the utmost etymological acumen.

Manchester, Dec. 23, 1822.

MR. EDITOR,—Your correspondent, who styles himself "A Subscriber," has succeeded in deciphering the specimen of secret writing inserted in the 47th number of the Iris, and has detected two instances of erroneous orthography into which it had inadvertently fallen. The way in which he discovered any key was, I presume, by observing the relative frequency of occurrence of different letters in certain situations. The article a, for example, occurs more frequently than the pronoun I, or the interjection O; when, therefore, he found a character repeatedly standing by itself, he would immediately note it down as being the substitute of a; and as in the specimen a appears in this situation, he will substitute the letter a in every word where a has been employed. Again to, of, is, in, be, &c. are words of two letters, and the, and, &c. are words of three letters which repeatedly occur. Now in the specimen, fgn appears to stand for the, and on farther inspection this is confirmed, for bf is evidently the substitute for it, and, from the connexion, bf appears to stand for is. In this manner the other letters of the key will be discovered, first by conjecture chiefly, and afterwards confirmed by their relative situation in other words.

It only remains, therefore, that your readers be put in possession of the complete key to the specimen laid before them. For a, b, c, &c. respectively, to the end of the alphabet, the following were substituted a, g, l, k, m, s, P, q, b, r, e, t, a, s, c, w, x, y, i, f, m, j, h, v, d, u.
I am, &c.

GIMEL.

A MACHINE MAKER is informed that Mr. St. Clere has furnished us with a diffuse, literal, and figurative elucidation of the point objected to in our last. Mr. St. Clere derives the word Machine from the Greek; and, on reference to the lexicon, finds it defined, artificium, solertia, molitio, consilium; and on looking into Alisworth he finds consilium defined, reason, understanding. He quotes "machinations of the human mind," and satisfactorily shows that he did not intend to convey any idea that should derogate from the uncontrolled freedom, or immateriality of the soul.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER.

Monday, January 13th.—The Way to Keep Him: with The Libertine. Sir Bashful Constant, Mr. Liston.
Tuesday, 14th.—Love, Law, and Physic: The Portrait of Cervantes: and The Libertine. Lubin Log and Sancho, Mr. Liston.
Wednesday, 15th.—The Rivals: with Peter Fin's Trip to Brighton. Bob Acres and Peter Fin, Mr. Liston.
Friday, 17th.—For the Benefit of Mr. Liston: Exchange no Robbery: Tom Thumb the Great: and Family Jars. Sam Swipes, Lord Grizzle, and Delph, Mr. Liston.

"Peter Fin; or, a New Road to Brighton," a new and very humorous farce, said to be from the pen of Mr. Jones, of the Edinburgh Theatre, was brought out on Wednesday night. It is scarcely necessary to observe that Mr. Liston's "Peter Fin" was every thing the author could possibly desire; his simplicity and enthusiasm were ludicrous, and afforded ample scope for laughter and merriment.

MR. VANDENHOFF.

Of this gentleman who has lately appeared at the Edinburgh Theatre, in the character of Coriolanus, the Edinburgh Weekly Journal says as follows:—"His person is uncommonly fine, and his gestures full of grace and dignity: his voice is deep and clear, his face handsome, and his eye and forehead very powerful. The whole effect of his countenance is expressive; yet this quality must submit to considerable qualification. When fairly fixed and concentrated in one absolute and engrossing emotion, it is difficult (having succeeded in forgetting Kemble) to conceive any thing more stately and impressive than the form and face of Mr. Vandenhoff. Arrest him in this point, and the painter and statuary would find him an excellent study. But, besides that his features are small, his face, in its transitions from one passion to another, sometimes exhibits a sarcastic peevishness, in place of the lofty scorn which his mind conceives, and which is not merely short of, but at variance with, the characteristic emotions of Coriolanus. His bust, however, is remarkably fine; his throat, more especially, and the junction of the throat with the head, is the finest we recollect to have seen. To these physical endowments, his mental requisites do no injustice. The general conception of the character was so completely (and so properly) formed upon that of Mr. Kemble, to which also his delineation of it very nearly approached, that no room was afforded, at least no opportunity was seized, for the display of originality of genius; but a vigorous and masculine understanding, as well as a classical taste, was conspicuous through the whole, and the representation was powerfully and consistently maintained to the end. Upon the whole, Mr. Vandenhoff's success was complete; and we do not hesitate to pronounce him to be amongst the very first tragedians now upon the stage, and assuredly the highest in that department that has ever before been in Edinburgh as a resident actor."

WEEKLY DIARY.

JANUARY.

REMARKABLE DAYS.

SATURDAY, 18.—La festa di Cattedra.

Or commemoration of placing the supposed Chair of St. Peter, is thus described by Lady Morgan: 'At the extremity of the great nave of St. Peter's, behind the altar, and mounted upon a tribune, designed or ornamented by Michael Angelo, stands a sort of throne, composed of precious materials, and supported by four gigantic figures. A glory of seraphim, with groups of angels, sheds a brilliant light upon its splendours. This throne enshrines the real, plain, worm-eaten wooden chair, on which St. Peter, the Prince of Apostles, is said to have pontificated; more precious than all the bronze, gold, and gems, with which it is hidden, not only from impious but from holy eyes, and which once only, in the flight of ages, was profaned by mortal inspection. The Festa de Cattedra is one of the very few functions, as they are called (funzioni), celebrated in St. Peter's. The splendidly dressed troops that line its nave, the church and lay dignitaries—abbots, priests, canons, prelates, cardinals, doctors—dragons and senators, all clad in various and rich vestments, marching in procession—complete, as they proceed up the vast space of this wondrous temple, a spectacle nowhere to be equalled within the pale of European civilization. In the midst of swords and crosiers, of halberds and crucifixes, surrounded by banners, and bending under the glittering tiara of threefold power, appears the aged, feeble, and worn-out Pope, born aloft on men's shoulders, in a chair of crimson and gold, and environed by slaves (for such they appear), who waft, from plumes of ostrich feathers mounted on ivory wands, a cooling gale, to refresh his exhausted frame, too frail for the weight of such honours. All fall prostrate as he passes up the church to a small chair and throne, temporarily erected beneath the chair of St. Peter. A solemn service is then performed, hosannas arise, and royal votarists and diplomatic devotees parade the church, with guards of honour and running footmen; while English gentlemen and ladies scramble, and crowd, and bribe, and fight their way to the best place they can obtain.'

TUESDAY, 21.—Saint Agnes.

Has been always considered by the Catholics as a special patroness of purity, with the immaculate Mother of God and St. Thecla. Rome was the theatre of the triumph of St. Agnes; and Prudentius says, that her tomb was shown within sight of that city. She suffered not long after the beginning of the prosecution of Dioclesian, whose bloody edicts appeared in March in the year of our Lord 303. She was only thirteen years of age at the time of her glorious death.

On this day, some silly women fast all day, and take care that they do not touch, or are touched by, a male, in order that they may dream of their lovers at night. Many other kinds of devination are practised by our rustic damsels, for the same purpose.

ANNUS MIRABILIS!
OR, A PARTHIAN GLANCE AT 1822.

July.—Clara Fisher, at the Lyceum, played Crack, a drunken cobbler in the Turnpike Gate: "train up a child in the way it should go." Tread-Mill adopted in Cold Bath Fields prison. Achilles mounted in Hyde Park: several breeches made in the wall, but not one pair made for the statue. Annual regatta of the Funny Club: members rowed in their shirts to the Castle at Richmond in a soaking shower: odd notions of fun. Margate steam-yachts much in request, and Dover coach fares reduced. Death of John Emery the comedian. Haymarket Theatre much frequented: Terry excellent in John Buzby: "a Day's pleasure" productive of a Night's. Migration over Westminster-bridge: Astley's Amphitheatre courted in the dog-days: humour of the horse-clown applauded, and the Antipodean postere-master much admired. Only one man horsewipped by Barry O'Meara, and he the wrong one.

August.—Appearance of Miss Paton in the Marriage of Figaro: oratics for once unanimous. Census of London population: one million souls, exclusive of one female infant sworn by Hannah White to Ex-sheriff Parkins. English players at the Porte St. Martin, in Paris: open with Othello: a wise selection, considering the objection of the French to slaughter on a stage: Moor of Venice damned, and Desdemona hit by a penny piece. The King embarked at Greenwich for Scotland: not a Caledonian visible during his absence, even at the India House; all being, or affecting to be, at the Levee at Holyrood House. "Carle now the King's come:" highly interesting to those who understand it. Lord Portsmouth, frightened at the Advent of Majesty, abruptly quitted Edinburgh. Viscount Newry, sided by his five servants, rowed from Oxford to London in eighteen hours: not a scull in the boat. Fonthill Abbey on sale, and Wanstead House no more remembered: Salisbury plain covered by women eager to gain admission: ran of the piece stopped by Farquhar's "Stratagem." John Paterson, aged fifty, married at St. Anne's Soho, to Jane Barclay, aged eighteen: no cause assigned for the rash action.

September.—Return of the King to London: Scots still insufferable; the swell taking time to abate: plan of erecting a Parthenon on Calton Hill: Auld Reekie to be christened Modern Athens: great demand for fowling-pieces at Mortimer's in Fleet-street: not a cockney, from Savage-gardens to Skinner-street, that did not talk of bagging his three brace. The Latine Frigate with 200,000*l.* on board: vessel meant to be weighed at Amsterdam, and the scheme interdicted. New Marriage Act threatens to annihilate that ceremony. Death of Sir William Herschel, and discovery of a new comet without a tail. Dinner given to Mr. Hume at Aberdeen: nothing on table but Peter's brown loaf: "Thrift, thrift, Horatio." Statement of a civic dinner given at Norwich in 1516: amount of bill 1*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* utterly disbelieved by Sir W. Curtis. A man of fashion seen in London, who made no excuse for being there in September: the crowd was immense.

October.—Alterations in the interior of Drury-lane theatre—opening address of G. Colman: abolition of stage doors: great shifting of actors from one house to the other: stars changed to comets. Congress at Verona. London still a desert: but junior merchants and clerks in public offices occasionally seen stealing through the streets. The French ministers presented their compliments to Sir Robert Wilson, and requested the favour of his absence from France. His appeal to his constituents, who will probably order the decree to be rescinded. Turkey and Greece: letter from Paris telling the British public all about it. Columbian bonds at a high premium, and the holders lords Peru and Potosi. Appearance of "The Liberal" from the south: so called by the godfather of the Serpentine River, who gave it that name because it was neither serpentine nor a river. Stoppage of Mr. Bowring at Calais, and his removal to Boulogne: his eulogy as a Russian anthropologist. Death of Mrs. Garrick at Hampton: extract from Lee Lewis, proving her to be daughter to the Earl of Burlington, and, consequently, proprietor of the mansion in Piccadilly bearing that name; stated by one journal to have had but a single maid of all work, and by another to have been possessed of a coachman and footman: scramble among the Dilettanti for little David's original Hogarths. Mermaid exhibited in St. James's-street: said by some to have died of the stich: and by others to have been produced by Mrs. Salmon in Monkey Island. Alderman Wood seen on the Maidstone road, riding between two packsaddles, laden with samples of hops. Marriage act still much criticised, notwithstanding which seven bachelors were married in one day, at the parish church of St. Andrew's Holborn. A clergyman attended to give the unhappy wretches the last consolations of religion.

November.—Commencement of Michaelmas Term: attorneys brandishing their pens: plaintiffs and defendants loitering about Oliver's coffee-house. Reported abduction of Lord Byron to South America: death of Mr. Zee: consequent tumble of Columbian bonds down a precipice of twenty-five per cent. Lords, in reversion, of Potosi and Peru left sprawling in the mire, and many dozens of dry champagne advertised for sale considerably under prime cost. Liberation of Orator Hunt: his procession through London, and radical dinner at the Shepherd and Shepherdess. About the same time Mount Vesuvius began to grumble: and in both cases "repeated shocks and internal howlings were heard from the mountain." Congress continued sitting at Verona with closed doors and plugged key-holes: much conjecture consequently afloat. The Opera-house end of Pall Mall was much alarmed by an explosion of gas. Signor Zuchelli's elegance was sadly scorched; and Madame Camporese forcibly driven into two of Madame Rouzi di Begni's characters. Signor Ambrogetti's voice has not been heard of since. The British ambassador's letter-bag was tied up, and much epistolary grumbling consequently confined to the gizzards of the English exiles at Paris. Auxiliary Bible-meeting at the Mansion House: a great pouring out of clergymen and old women down the front steps of that edifice, who were mistaken by the multitude for disorderly people of the night preceding. A committee appointed of twenty males and as many females, "with power power to add to their numbers." Lord Portsmouth horsewipped by his lady, to verify the dictum of Orator Hunt, that all the fair sex are reformers. A million bushels of human bones were landed at Hull from the fields of Dresden and Waterloo: human bones best adapted to fertilize land, whence we derive the word man-ure. Galvani's Messenger gave an account of a parting dinner given to Annareon Moore by the English in Paris. His speech on the occasion was not so well-timed as well-spoken: it implied that there was nothing like England after all: a strange observation in the hearing of those who preferred France before all. Extraordinary effect of galvanism upon the body of an attempt made by the Rev. Mr. Colton to latinize Gray's Elegy. Another new tragedy from Lord Byron, entitled Werner: less obnoxious to Church-goers than its predecessor, but more so to criticism. A caution to resurrection-men: one Simon Spade, a body-snatcher, while sounding for subjects in St. Martin's church-yard, dug up his own wife. The poor man has been inconsolable ever since. Miss F. H. Kelly made her first appearance at Covent-garden theatre in the character of Juliet: if this young lady's object was secrecy, never did any arrow so miss its mark; the whole town has been gazing at her ever since. Several fogs were seen gathering round the Serpentine river and the Paddington Canal. The Royal Humane Society's man, consequently, on the watch: notwithstanding which, the average November quantity of men and women put a period to their existence: the former, as usual for money, the latter for love.

December.—Great demand for post-horses at Verona in consequence of the abrupt dissolution of the Congress. Lord John Russell's new tragedy, two editions in one week: and an Episcopal visitation sermon too weak for one edition. Bethel Watermen's Reform society, Sheriff Thompson in the chair: drag-net to sweep off all aquatic execrations: "damns have had their day:" Bibles in brigs, and prayer-books in punts. Strange monsters imported by Polito, consisting of an intellectual dandy, a civil radical, and an actor without a grievance: also a blue-stocking breeder, and a tortoise-shell tom-cat: the mob nearly overpowered the constables. Sad sameness of Christmas dinners. "Chine nods at chine, each turkey has a brother:" every table-spoon in the house flaming with burnt brandy. Infallible cure for chilblains. Proposals published for a Sob-way Company, to repair London gas and water-pipes without breaking up the pavement: much patronized by Bond-street fashionables, who were naturally desirous of taking a subterraneous walk toward the city, to borrow money, and by so doing to avoid a rencounter with those with whom they had already undergone that ceremony. Kean and Young in Othello; "The Douglas and the Percy both in arms." Dance of actors from both theatres: foot it and hey "contrary sides:" Mr. Liston and Miss Stephens still only underlined. "The cry is still they come." Diabolical attempt to poison a whole family at breakfast, in Lombard-street, by putting Paine's Age of Reason under the tea-pot: providentially none of the family could read. Growing civility of sweeps, dustmen, and patrols: plainly denoting that the era of Christmas-boxes is at hand. Boys arm-in-arm and three a-breast sping manhood along Fleet-street, with Cossack trowsers and bamboo canes. Grave papas, usually seen about without an accompaniment, were met dragging along children in couples, and occasionally stopping to peep into toy-shop windows. Premature twelfth-cakes stealing behind confectioners' counters: striplings of sixteen walking half ashamed arm-in-arm with maiden aunts from whom the family has expectations. Grimaldi and the new pantomime: front rows filled by wretches, who, at every knock-down-blow, fling back their flaxen polls, in delight, into the laps of their chuckling parents on the seat behind. Magnificent prospectuses from divers new Utopian Magazines. Bellman and lamplighter, run up the side of Parnassus. A great issuing of orders to tailors on the 31st of December, for apparel to be sent home the week following, and this to evade re-appearing in the present year's bill. Awful events, which too plainly denote that Annus Mirabilis, the year 1822, is hastening to the "Tomb of all the Capulets!"

Some boys at school being required to write an Epigram on the mean occupation of the poet Bloomfield in the early part of his life, one of them soon brought the following in triumph:

Bob Bloomfield was a Shoe-Maker and Poet too!

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

"Remote from towns he ran his godly race, Nor e'er had chang'd nor wish'd to change his place."
GOLDAMITZ.

Seathwaite church yard, in Westmoreland, contains the following inscription;

"In memory of the Reverend Robert Walker, who died the 25th of June, 1802, in the 93rd year of his age, and 67th of his curacy at Seathwaite.

"Also of Anne his wife, who died the 28th of January, in the 93rd year of her age."

This is the pastor alluded to in Mr. Wordsworth's Excursion, as a worthy compeer of the country parson of Chaucer. A brief memoir of his life, extracted from the same writer, may perhaps be acceptable.

ROBERT WALKER was born at Under Crag, in Seathwaite, in the year 1709, and was the youngest of twelve children. His eldest brother died at Under Crag, aged 94 years. Robert was a sickly child, and his health continuing delicate, it was deemed best to breed him a scholar; for it was not likely that he would be able to earn his livelihood by bodily labour. At that time few of the dales were furnished with school houses; children were taught in the chapels; and in the same building where he officiated so many years, he received the rudiments of his education. After some time he became school-master at Lowes-water; and, by the assistance of a gentleman in the neighbourhood, he acquired, at leisure hours, a knowledge of the classics, and qualified himself for taking orders. Upon his ordination he had the offer of two curacies of the same value, viz. five pounds per annum: but the cure of Seathwaite, having a cottage attached to it, as he wished to marry, obtained the preference. The young woman on whom his affections were fixed, though in the condition of a domestic servant, had given promise, by her virtuous disposition, that she was worthy to become the help-mate of a man entering on such a plan of life as he had marked out for himself. By her frugality she had stored up a small sum of money, with which they began house-keeping in 1735. About twenty years afterwards his living had been augmented, for in a letter to a friend, he says, "the annual income of my chapel, at present, may amount to about £17 10; of which five pounds are in cash from the bounty of Queen Anne, £5 from the lord of the manor, and £3 from certain inhabitants as a rent charge. The house and gardens I value at £4 yearly, not worth more; and the surplice fees and voluntary contributions may be worth £3, but, as the inhabitants are few in number, and the fees very low, this last-mentioned sum consists merely in free-will offerings. I am situated greatly to my satisfaction with regard to the conduct and behaviour of my auditory, who not only live in happy ignorance of the follies and vices of the age, but in mutual peace and good will with one another; and are seemingly, (I hope really too) sincere Christians, and sound members of the established church, not one dissenter of any denomination being amongst them all. I got to the value of £40 for my wife's fortune; and though my income has been but small, and my family large, yet, by a providential blessing upon my diligent endeavours, the kindness of friends, and a cheap country to live in, we have always had the necessaries of life."

About the time when this letter was written, the Bishop of Chester recommended a scheme of joining the curacy of Ulpha to the contiguous one of Seathwaite; and the nomination was offered to Mr. Walker; but, an unexpected difficulty arising, Mr. W. in a letter to the Bishop, thus expresses himself: "If he," meaning the person in whom the difficulty originated, "had made any such objection before, I should utterly have declined any attempt to obtain the curacy of Ulpha." And in a second letter to the Bishop he writes:

My lord,—I have the favour of your's of the 1st inst. and am exceedingly obliged on account of the Ulpha affair. If that curacy should fall into your lordship's hands, I would beg leave rather to decline than embrace it; for the chapels of Seathwaite and Ulpha annexed together, would be apt to cause a general discontent among the inhabitants of both places; by either thinking themselves slighted, being only served alternately, or neglected in the duty, or attributing it to covetousness in me; all which occasions of murmuring I would willingly avoid." Concluding, as he did in his former letter, that it was his wish "to live peaceably with all men."

The year following, the curacy of Seathwaite was augmented again: and, to effect this augmentation, fifty pounds had been advanced by himself. Scanty as was his income, the offer of much better benefices could not tempt Mr. W. to quit a situation where he had been so long happy, with a consciousness of being useful.

Having given to one of his sons a college education, in the year 1775 he requested the Archbishop of York to ordain him: concluding his letter thus. "Divine Providence, assisted by liberal benefactors, has blest my endeavours, from a small income to rear a numerous family; and as my time of life renders me unfit for much future expectancy from this world, I should be glad to see my son settled in a promising way to acquire an honest livelihood for himself. His behaviour, so far in life, has been irreproachable; and I hope he will not degenerate, in principles or practice, from the precepts and pattern of an indulgent parent. Your Grace's favourable reception of this, from a distant corner of the diocese, and an obscure hand, will excite filial gratitude, and a due use shall be made of the obligation vouchsafed thereby to your Grace's very dutiful and most obedient son and servant,
Robert Walker."

The same man who was thus liberal in the education of his family, was even munificent in hospitality as a parish priest. Every Sunday were served, upon a long table, messes of broth, for the refreshment of those of his congregation who came from a distance, and they usually took their seats as parts of his household. It seems scarcely possible that this custom could have commenced before the augmentation of his cure. His generosity in old age may be still further illustrated by a little circumstance relating to an orphan grandson, which I find in a copy of a letter to one of his sons: he requests that half a guinea may be given to "little Robert for pocket money," promising to make him the like allowance annually. The conclusion of the same letter is so characteristic that I cannot forbear transcribing it. "We," meaning his wife and himself, "are in our wonted state of health, allowing for the hasty strides of old age knocking daily at our door; and threateningly telling us, we are not only mortal but must, ere long, take leave of our ancient cottage, and lie down in our last dormitory. Let us hear from you soon, to augment the mirth of the Christmas holidays. Wishing you all the pleasures of the approaching season, I am, dear son, with lasting sincerity, your's affectionately,
Robert Walker."

He loved old usages, and in some instances stuck to them to his own loss: for having had a sum of money in the hands of a neighbour, when long course of time had raised the rate of interest, and more was offered, he refused to accept it. From the vice of cupidity he was quite free. He made no charge for teaching his school: such as could afford to pay, gave him what they pleased: when very young, having kept a diary of his expences, the large amount, at the end of the year, surprised him; and from that time, the rule of his life was to be economical not avaricious. At his decease he left no less a sum than £2000; and such a sense of his various excellences was prevalent in the country, that the epithet of WONDERFUL is to this day attached to his name.

There is in the above sketch something so extraordinary as to require further explanatory details: but these must form the subject of a future number.

MATHEMATICS.

Solution of No. 53, by Mr. Jones, Chorlton Row.

I. G. B.

F. C. H.

First, draw the line CAB; then with centre C and radius CA, and centre C and radius CB, describe two concentric circles;—through FCH draw a diameter to the two circles, and parallel to this diameter draw the chord IB.—from A draw AG perpendicular to IB.

The depth of the well will then be represented by AB, and the latitude of the place by the angle BCH.

Now, the difference between the circumferences described by the points B. and A. in one revolution of the earth upon its axis is $= 2BG \times 3.1416$; but, $BG = AB$ multiplied by the cosine of the angle BCH or GBA, $= AB \times \cosine \text{ of } 51^\circ 32' = 248.825 \text{ feet.}$

Hence, the difference between the spaces described in 24 hours by the points A and B is $248.825 \times 2 \times 3.1416 = 1563.7314 \text{ feet.}$ And the time the body would fall through 400 feet is equal to $\frac{1}{2} \sqrt{\frac{400}{16}} = 5 \text{ seconds.}$ Therefore, as 24 hours : 5 seconds :: $1563.7314 \text{ feet} : 1.086 \text{ inches;}$ the distance the body would fall east of the perpendicular.

Jack at a Pinch favoured us with a solution similar to the one above;—most of our other correspondents seem to have misunderstood the question.

Question No. 58, by Mr. John Hill.

Required the value of $x, y,$ and z , when $(40^3 - x^3) \times (xz^2 - x^3) \times (xy - y^2)$ is a maximum.

We beg to call the attention of our mathematical friends to Questions No. 46, 47, 50, 51, 54, 56, and 57. To these questions we have not yet received any correct solutions, excepting such as have been furnished by the respective proposers of the questions, and some that have been sent to us by our able correspondent Jack at a Pinch.

SCIENCE, ETC.

NEW THEORY OF THE BLOOD.—Sir Everard Home in an introductory lecture on the physiology of the blood, advances a new theory, from a discovery made by him in 1808. Observing the growth of a grain of wheat through a microscope, he saw a blob, and then a tube passing from it; the blob was the juice of the plant, and the tube was formed by the extraction of carbonic acid gas. By analogical reasoning he was led to examine a globule of blood, in which he found similar tubes, and which he injected under the exhausted receiver of an air pump. Hence, he concludes that carbonic acid gas exists in the blood in the proportion of two cubic inches to an ounce, and that it is given out in considerable quantities from the blood after a full meal, and very little from the blood of a feverish person.

Tread-Wheel applied to Canal Navigation.—The object is to obviate the necessity of employing horses in drawing barges on canals. The apparatus is made light, and separable from the barge: two men can propel a barge by it at the rate of five miles an hour. The saving in the expense of horses and towing-paths promises to make this an important application of human power. M. Van Heythuysen is the person who has adopted this apparatus.

Improvement in Metallic Casting.—Iron and metallic casts are said to be very much improved by subjecting the metal, when in the moulds, to pressure. This is done by making a part of the mould of such a form as to receive a piston, which, on the metal being introduced, is made to press on it with any required force. It is stated that castings obtained in this way are not only free from the common imperfections, but have a peculiar soundness of surface, and closeness of texture; qualities of the utmost importance in ordnance, flattings, cylinders, &c. The improvement belongs to Mr. Hollingrake, who has obtained a patent for it.—Journal of Science.

Mathematical Prize Question.—The following is proposed by the class of mathematics of the Royal Academy of Sciences of Prussia:—To give a complete mathematical theory of the luminous or colored circles which form around the Sun and Moon; and such an one as will equally agree with the results of observations, and with the known properties of light and the atmosphere. The possible influence of the inflection and polarisation of light is to be considered. Memoirs must be sent in before the end of March, 1824. The prize is 50 ducats.

Porcelain Clay—Gold in Cheshire.—A superior clay, said to be well adapted for the manufacture of the best sort of china, has recently been discovered on the estate of Mr. Ackerley, at Little Saughall, near Chester. This clay is now in progress of trial, and it is expected that a pottery will soon be established on the place. It is stated also that Mr. Ackerley procured small grains of gold, from some of the strata through which he has penetrated in search of coal.

Electro-Magnetic Effect of Lightning.—A violent thunder-storm occurred on the 22d of June last, at Toulouse, when the lightning passed by various metallic pipes through a house, and gave occasion to observe its strong powers of magnetization. Just under the roof, a part of the floor was completely destroyed by the lightning, and a piece of iron that had belonged to it had become so strongly magnetic, that it was able to lift a table-knife. Small iron tools were magnetized by the iron, but it lost its power in 36 hours. A tailor was sitting on a chair near the conductor through which the lightning passed; he felt no shock, but next day, on taking a case of needles from his pocket, he found them so strongly magnetized, that they hung six or seven together. Another case, containing five needles, was lying on a chimney-piece 20 feet from the conductor; they also were magnetized. There were fourteen or fifteen persons in the house, none of whom felt the electricity. It may be presumed, therefore, that the whole went through the conductor. In the present state of electro-magnetic science, it is easy to understand the effect on the needles and neighbouring pieces of iron. The case resembles those quoted by Sir H. Davy, from the Phil. Trans., and is an illustration of the process he recommends for the formation of powerful magnets by lightning-rods.—Ann. de Chim.

WILLIAM PITT, EARL OF CHATHAM.—

The following eulogy on this celebrated statesman is taken from an excellent work very little known in this country, entitled, "The History of the War of the Independence of the United States of America;" translated from the Italian of Charles Botta, by George Alexander Otis, and printed in Philadelphia in the year 1821.—

"This man, whether for his genius, his virtues, or the great things he did for his country, is rather to be paralleled with the ancients than preferred to the moderns. He governed for a considerable time the opulent Kingdom of Great Britain: he raised it to such a pitch of splendour, as the English at no other period had ever known, or even presumed to hope for; and he died, if not in poverty, at least with so narrow a fortune, that it would not have been sufficient to maintain his family honourably; a thing at that time sufficiently remarkable, and which in the present age might pass for a prodigy! But his grateful country recompensed in the children the virtues of the father. The parliament granted a perpetual annuity of four thousand pounds sterling to the family of Chatham, besides paying twenty thousand pounds of debt, which the late Earl had been compelled to contract, in order to support his rank and his numerous household. No individual until that time, except the duke of Marlborough, had received in England such high and liberal rewards. The Earl of Chatham was no less distinguished as a great orator, than as a profound statesman, and immaculate citizen. He defended with admirable eloquence before parliament, those resolutions which he had maturely discussed and firmly adopted in the consultations of the cabinet. Some, it is true, blamed in his speeches the too frequent use of figures, and a certain pomp of style much availing of the taste of those times. But this great minister surpassed all the rulers of nations of his age, in the art of exciting, even to enthusiasm, the zeal of the servants of the state, civil as well as military: a talent which heaven confers but rarely, and only upon privileged individuals. In a word, he was a man whose name will never be pronounced without encomium, and the resplendent glory of whose virtues will eternally recommend them to invitation."

REVIEWS.

Peveril of the Peak. BY THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY. London, Hurst Robinson, & Co. 1822.

Sir Geoffrey Peveril (descended from an illegitimate son of the Great Norman) of the Peak, is a cheerful, loyal, old cavalier of the seventeenth century; who with royalists generally, is much embarrassed in his fortune by the oppressive measures of the long Parliament. Ralph Bridgenorth, is a Presbyterian, who benefits by the prevailing policy; nevertheless, being a neighbour, an old school-fellow, and a liberal kind of man, he lives in friendly habits with Sir G. and renders him many services.

Sir G. has an only son, Julian Peveril; Mr. B. by a series of misfortunes finds his family reduced to an infant daughter, and the care of this little motherless child is solicited by, and granted to, the Baronet's Lady. Julian and Alice, (the name of Miss B.) grow in sincere attachment and become lovers, each remarkable for high and virtuous principle.—The variable policy of the times, and the clashing views of the two families occasion their separation, and subject the lovers to various vicissitudes, in the course of which they meet, and ultimately are united.

The licentious court of Charles the Second, and the dilemma of the Monarch himself, are strikingly depicted; particularly the character of the duped, unprincipled, Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. Many designing and perfidious, some passable and romantic, and several amiable and worthy personages, as well as a most active, extraordinary little being, are exhibited by the masterly hand of this excellent writer. His incidents are interesting, and should we at any time feel disposed to nod, he re-excites our vigilance, by the promising motto, that should be "at any time" prove "particularly dull, we may be assured there is a design under it."

A meeting of Presbyterian religionists, at the residence of Bridgenorth is somewhat ludicrously described;—

It was now lighted up for the reception of company; and five or six persons sat in it, in the plain, black, formal dress which was affected by the formal Puritans of the time, in evidence of their contempt of the manners of the luxurious court of Charles the Second; amongst whom, excess of extravagance in apparel, like excesses of every other kind, was highly fashionable.

Julian at first glanced his eyes but slightly along the range of grave and severe faces which composed this society—men, sincere perhaps in their pretensions to a superior purity of conduct and morals, but in whom that high praise was somewhat obfuscated by an affected austerity in dress and manners, allied to those Pharisees of old, who made broad their phylacteries, and would be seen of men to fast, and to discharge with rigid punctuality the observances of the law. Their dress was almost uniformly a black cloak and doublet, cut straight and close, and undecorated with lace or embroidery of any kind, black Flemish breeches and hose, square-toed shoes, with large roses made of serge ribbon. Two or three had large loose boots of calf-leather, and almost every one was begirt with a long rapier, which was suspended by leathern thongs, to a plain belt of buff, or of black leather. One or two of the elder guests, whose hair had been thinned by time, had their heads covered with a scull-cap of black silk or velvet, which being drawn down betwixt the ears and the scull, and permitting no hair to escape, occasioned the former to project in the ungraceful manner which may be remarked in old pictures, and which procured for the Puritans the term of "prick-eared round-heads," so unceremoniously applied to them by their contemporaries.

These worthies were ranged against the wall, each in his ancient, high-backed, long-legged chair; neither looking towards, nor apparently discoursing with each other; but plunged in their own reflections, or awaiting, like an assembly of quakers, the quickening power of divine inspiration.

PORTRAIT OF FENELLA.

This little creature, for she was of the least and slightest size of womankind, was exquisitely well formed in all her limbs, which the dress she usually wore, (a green silk tunic, of a peculiar form) set off to the best advantage. Her face was darker than the usual hue of Europeans; and the profusion of long and silken hair, which, when she undid the braids in which she commonly wore it, fell down almost to her ankles, was also rather a foreign attribute. Her countenance resembled a most beautiful miniature; and there was a quickness, decision, and fire, in Fenella's look, and especially in her eyes, which was probably rendered yet more alert and acute, because, through the imperfection of her other organs, it was only by sight that she could obtain information of what passed around her.

The pretty mute was mistress of many little accomplishments which the Countess had caused to be taught to her in compassion for her forlorn situation, and which she learned with the most surprising quickness. Thus, for example, she was exquisite in the use of the needle, and so ready and ingenious a draughts-woman, that, like the ancient Mexicans, she sometimes made a hasty sketch with her pencil the means of conveying her ideas, either by direct or emblematical representation. Above all, in the art of ornamental writing, much studied at that period, Fenella was so great a proficient, as to rival the fame of Messrs. Snow, Shelley, and other masters of the pen, whose copy-books, preserved in the libraries of the curious, still shew the artists smiling on the frontispiece in all the honours of flowing gowns and full-bottomed wigs, to the eternal glory of calligraphy.

The little maiden had, besides these accomplishments, much ready wit and acuteness of intellect. With Lady Derby, and with the two young gentlemen, she was a great favourite, and used much freedom in conversing with them, by means of a system of signs which had been gradually established amongst them, and which served all ordinary purposes of communication.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM'S LEVEE.

We must now transport the reader to the magnificent hotel in — street, inhabited at this time by the celebrated George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, whom Dryden has doomed to a painful immortality. It was long past noon; and the usual hour of the Duke's Levee—if any thing could be termed usual where all was irregular—had been long past. His hall was filled with lacqueys and footmen, in the most splendid liveries; the interior apartments, with the gentlemen and pages of his household, arrayed as persons of the first quality, and in that respect rather exceeding than falling short of the Duke in personal splendor. But his ante-chamber, in particular, might be compared to a gathering of eagles to the slaughter, were not the

simile too dignified to express that vile race, who, by a hundred devices, all tending to one common end, live upon the wants of needy greatness, or administer to the pleasures of summer-teeming luxury, or stimulate the wild wishes of lavish and wasteful extravagance, by devising new modes and fresh motives of profusion.—There stood the Projector, with his mysterious brow, promising unbounded wealth to whomsoever might choose to furnish the small preliminary sum necessary to change egg-shells into the great arcumum. There was Captain Seagull, undertaker for a foreign settlement, with a map under his arm, of Indian or American kingdoms, beautiful as the primitive Eden, waiting the bold occupants, for whom a generous patron should equip two brigantines and a fly-boat. Thither came, fast and frequent, the Gamblers, in their different forms and calling. This light, young, gay in appearance, the thoughtless youth of wit and pleasure—the pigeon rather than the rook—but at heart the same sly, shrewd, cold-blooded calculator as yonder old hard-featured professor of the same science, whose eyes are grown dim with watching the dice at midnight, and whose fingers are even now assisting his mental computation of chances and of odds. The fine arts, too—I would it were otherwise—have their professors amongst this sordid train. The poor Poet, half ashamed, in spite of habit, of the part which he is about to perform, and abashed by consciousness at once of his base motive and shabby black coat, lurks in yonder corner for the favorable moment to offer his dedication. Much better attired, the Architect presents his splendid vision of front and wings, and designs a palace, the expense of which may transfer the employer to a jail. But uppermost of all, the favourite Musician or Singer, who waits on my Lord to receive, in solid gold, the value of the dulcet sounds which soiced the banquet of the preceding evening. Such, and many such like, were the morning attendants of the Duke of Buckingham—all genuine descendants of the daughter of the horse-leech, whose cry is, 'Give, give.' But the levee of his Grace contained other and very different characters; and was, indeed, as various as his own opinions and pursuits. Besides many of the young Nobility and wealthy Gentry of England, who made his Grace the glass at which they dressed themselves for the day, and who learned from him how to travel, with the newest and best grace, the general Road to Ruin—there were others of a graver character—discarded statesmen, political spies, opposition orators, servile tools of Administration, men who met not elsewhere, but who regarded the Duke's mansion as a sort of neutral ground; sure, that if he was not of their opinion to-day, the very circumstance rendered it most likely he should think with them to-morrow. It was high tide in the ante-chamber, and had been so for more than an hour, ere the Duke's gentleman in ordinary ventured into his bed-chamber, carefully darkened so as to make midnight at noon-day, to know his Grace's pleasure. His soft and serene whisper, in which he asked whether it was his Grace's pleasure to rise, was briefly and sharply answered by the counter question—'Who waits?—What's o'clock?' 'It is Jerningham, your Grace,' said the attendant. 'It is one, afternoon; and your Grace appointed some of the people without at eleven.' 'Who are they?—What do they want?' 'A message from Whitehall, your Grace.' 'Pah! it will keep cold. Those who make all others wait, will be the better of waiting in their turn. Were I to be guilty of ill breeding, it should rather be to a king than a beggar.'—The gentlemen from the city—'I am tired of them—tired of their all cant, and so religion—all Protestantism, and no charity. Tell them to go to Shaftesbury—to Aldersgate-street with them—that's the best market for their wares.'—

Jockey, my Lord, from Newmarket.—'Let him ride to the devil—he has a horse of mine, and spurs of his own. Any more?'—'The whole ante-chamber is full, my Lord—knights and squires, doctors and doctors.'—'The dicers, with the doctors in their pockets, I presume.'—'Counts, captains, and clergymen.'—'You are alliterative, Jerningham,' said the Duke, 'and that is a proof you are poetical. Hand me my writing things.'—Getting half out of bed—thrusting one arm into a brocade night-gown, deeply furrowed with sables, and one foot into a velvet slipper, while the other pressed in primitive nudity the rich carpet—his Grace, without thinking farther on the assembly without, began to pen a few lines of a satirical poem; then suddenly stopped—threw the pen into the chimney—exclaimed that the humor was past—and asked his attendant if there were any letters.—Jerningham produced a huge packet.—'What the devil!' said his Grace, 'do you think I will read all these?—I am like Clarence, who asked a cup of wine, and was soused into a butt of sack. I mean is there any thing that presses?'—'This letter, your Grace,' said Jerningham, 'concerning the Yorkshire mortgage.'—'Did I not bid thee carry it to old Gatheral, my steward?'—'I did, my Lord,' answered the other; 'but Gatheral says there are difficulties.'—'Let the usurers foreclose, then—there is no difficulty in that; and out of a hundred manors, I shall scarce miss one,' answered the Duke. 'And bark ye, bring me my chocolate.'—'Nay, my Lord, Gatheral does not say it is impossible—only difficult.'—'And what is the use of him if he cannot make it easy? But you are all born to make difficulties,' replied the Duke.—'Nay, if your Grace approves the terms in this schedule, and pleases to sign it, Gatheral will undertake for the matter,' answered Jerningham.—'And could you not have said so at first, you blockhead?' said the Duke, signing the paper, without looking at the contents.

CENSURE OF THE KING UPON BUCKINGHAM.

'Now, Heaven forgive thee thy hypocrisy, George,' said the King, hastily. 'I would rather hear the devil preach religion than thee teach patriotism. Thou knowest as well as I, that the nation is in a scarlet fever for fear of the poor Catholics, who are not two men to five hundred; and that the public mind is so harassed with new narrations of conspiracy, and fresh horrors every day, that people have as little real sense of what is just or unjust, as men who talk in their sleep of what is sense or nonsense. I have borne, and borne with it—I have seen blood flow on the scaffold, fearing to thwart the nation in its fury—and I pray to God that I or mine be not called on to answer for it. I will no longer swim with the torrent, which honour and conscience call upon me to stem—I will act the part of a Sovereign, and save my people from doing injustice, even in their own despite.'

December Tales. London, Whittakers, 1823.

Many of our readers have, no doubt, perused with infinite amusement Mr. Hogg's delightful volumes—the Winter Evening Tales; and many more may have dwelt upon the wild and powerfully imagined "Sea Stories," attributed to Mr. John Howison, which appeared in Blackwood's Magazine. If either of these have afforded them pleasure, we can recommend the little volume before us to their notice as being upon the model of Hogg and Howison. We do not here mean to say that it is an imitation of these two "great story tellers," but it is upon the same model, and by one of the same school, and we think the author may take his seat beside them. The Tales which it contains are varied and rather unequal, but there is an ease, flow, and richness in the diction, and a depth and intensity of feeling displayed throughout, with which we do not often meet. Let those who have been delighted with the genuine English goodness of heart which is displayed in the writings of Charles Lamb, turn to one of the Essays (for there is an occasional Essay or two) and they will find the same philanthropical and liberal spirit which is the soul of every thing that emanates from the pen of Elia.

In this entertaining little volume we recognise an old friend or two with which amongst others we were favoured several months ago by the kindness of the author. We also find "The Falls of Ohiopyle," a tale which, without knowing the author, we highly admired in the July No. of that amusing and very superior Miscellany—the London Magazine.

We are not frequently tempted to peruse a Romance; but, in this instance having some knowledge of the gentleman from whose pen they came, we began to peruse the December Tales with avidity, nor were we disappointed. Those who delight in terrific and well told tales "of the supernatural, and who love a good ghost story to while away a December evening," will do well to read "the Sea Spirit," and "the Wanderings of an Immortal;"—"the Falls of Ohiopyle," and "Mary Stukely," will have many admirers; and the more grave will find something to their taste in the "Recollections." Our limits this week will not permit us to devote as much space to this work as we intended; but we hope to resume it again, and give a further notice. In the mean time we give as a specimen—

THE CHURCH-YARD.

That spirit is never idle that doth waken
The soul to sights, and contemplations deep;
Even when from out the desert's seeming sleep
A sob is heav'd, that but the leaves are shaken!
CORNWALL.

Among my stated rambles there is one which I retreat with pleasure, unalloyed by repetition;—it is a path which leads to a church-yard; and here I have lingered for hours, unwearied, occupied by the reflections produced by surrounding objects. The spot of which I speak is situated on an eminence, which commands a lovely prospect. I have been seated on my favourite seat, a large mossy stone, over which a spreading beech throws its shade, when the close of day was approaching:—there was the stone church, with its sombre, ivy-grown walls and steeple; the thick leafy grove, with its music-breathing inhabitants; the green hill, and the little murmuring rivulet, that wandered at its bottom, over its pebble-gemmed bed, dashing its light spray over its violet banks; the white-washed cottage and barn, with the horse-shoe nailed over the door, the lingering relic of drooping faith in demonology; the spreading fields, and clump of trees, and thinly scattered habitations; and, farther on, the majestic windings of the river, beyond which dim hills raised their eternal barrier, to close all further view; and, most beautiful of all, the deep, gentle shade of evening, sinking and reddening on hill, and plain, and valley:—it is then that the soul, emancipated from earthly thoughts and earthly hopes, holds closer sympathy with the scenes around, and holier visionings flit before the mind; and what spot could better harmonize with such thoughts than the one I have described?

A church-yard is, of all places, the one most calculated to call up those feelings which, abstracted from the pleasures, are uncontaminated with the evils, of the world: in the evening, too, the charm is stronger—on every side lie "relics of mortality"—the fantastic or fearful shapes, which the gloom lends to distinct objects—give a mysterious awe to this ultima Thule of human schemes; and the doubtful certainty (if the expression may be used) of shortly becoming a companion of the mouldering dust, and hideous corruption beneath us, doubtful as to its period, but certain as it regards the event, is fraught with deep, though fearful and appalling interest. Am I wrong in saying, that this is the place—the school—the theatre for a poet? Is it not here that the casualties of rank and station are destroyed?—and is it not the work of the poet also, to overlook these accidental distinguishments?—to develop the rise of simple and unadorned loveliness?—and to see, and properly to estimate, the intrinsic excellence of things and actions?

*Like a demon thing,

Death is your only sure balance in which to weigh the real worth or importance of individuals; the magic girdle, that fits none but those whose deeds have been pure—the wild steed, that none can manage, but those who encounter him undismayed—the infallible touchstone of greatness or power;—he is like the gust, which blows away the thistle-down of splendour and vanity, and exposes the nakedness which lies beneath;—he is the best of friends, who relieves us from our cares—our greatest enemy, who bereaves us of that we love best—our life; in short, he is the most paradoxical of things, who is every day present, but never seen—the most unwelcome of visitors, who, whenever he comes, is an unwished-for guest.

I am fond of a church, particularly an old one; it is, as it were, the home for the soul; the refuge from the world; and I am fond of its venerable antique gloom—its painted windows—its monuments, which speak of "the dead and their house, the grave"—and of its music:—there is an awful, solemn beauty in church music, which stills each unhalloved thought—each wish that speaks of earth—and throws its calm of holiness over the mind: the deep roll of the organ—the thrilling, enthusiasm-creating sound of human voices, trembling to the throne of eternity, which, when I think of, I reflect with complacency upon the abodes of monkish superstition—

Those deep solitudes and awful cells,
Where heavenly, pensive Contemplation dwells,
And ever-musing Melancholy reigns—and could almost wish that I had been an inhabitant of them. Blest with peace, and undisturbed with vice and folly—Pshaw! pshaw! I am dreaming: and these are the dreams of a poet, doomed to wake an essay writer.

But there is another ornament to a church—the greatest, perhaps, in my estimation—its bells—its organs of speech, with which it calls together fellow-worshippers.

I love these eloquent inanitations—these metallic tractors of the soul, whose vibrations call up into view the past, which is fled; the present, which dies in its existence; and the future, which will fade away like its predecessors: that simple stroke of two pieces of metal gives me an infinity of ideas—the burst into life, and quick sinking into nothing—the reiteration of the strokes, one succeeding another, in measured intervals—all speak of the mutability of every thing earthly, and the rapid succession of beings, which bloom, and perish, and are forgotten.

I cannot admire the Mahometan custom of employing the human voice as a substitute for bells: methinks the invitation, which calls to such exercises of devotion, should be addressed to the mind in some sound which may awaken suitable thoughts, not spoken in the every-day dialect of business and pleasure. An English steeple will continue, in my thinking, to be very preferable to a Turkish minaret.

And what is it that lends this magic to so simple a music?—what is it but that which lends beauty to every thing—the fertile power of association? It is the connexion which subsists between it and the inward workings of the soul—the relation which it bears to the operations of life and of death, which renders it thus pleasing.

It is this principle of association which is the vivifying soul of matter, which gives interest and beauty to inanimate objects—which engages the soul through the medium of the senses—which is the spirit of poetry;—it is not the mere sentiment, conveyed by the words of the poet—it is the flood of sweet and gentle reminiscences which starts upon the reader, varied, as it must of necessity be, in different individuals, as their respective views, characters, situations, and mental organizations differ, from which is derived the highest pleasure of poetical compositions. I am not young; I am, indeed, approaching to the period when I shall cease to indite those dotings of age; but in these recurrences to the feelings of past days, consists my fondest pleasure—these, and a few other loved associations, linger in my memory, and shall sink with me to my peaceful bed.

It was a saying worthy of Pope, that he should not care to have an old stump pulled down which he had known in his childhood. I am deeply imbued, I might say saturated, with such feelings. I have a piece of an oak, which grew by the school where I was educated, and has long since fallen a prey to the axe of the spoiler. I remember, as well as I do any thing, the cutting down of the venerable tree; how we crowded about it, and how each busy discipulus was cutting off relics of their old friend. The branches, which were left by the workmen as useless, were gathered up, and, in the evening, made into a bonfire; then, too, we had a feast, and we sat round the glowing embers, with every one his apple, his gingerbread, his nuts, and his glass of currant wine. Then tales of school heroism, and school mischief, were recounted; and still the wit became brighter as the fire decayed—the “mirth and fun grew fast and furious.” Ah! those were happy days.

I often visit this scene of my infant years;—the school is there, with the stone owl, with its goggle eyes, perched above it; there is the playground; the dark stone walls, with their soft and solemn brownness—but I will write an essay on the school and my school days:—there are many faces, too, but they are strange to me—those of my time, alas! where are they?—they are scattered over the world—those that survive, at least; there was Zouch; and C—, with his bright wit and clear judgment; and Phillips, with his lively sallies of good-humoured mirth; and dozens, whom I could mention. One of them I must mention; 'tis R—, the most singular, inoffensive mortal I ever met with. R— fell in love—a thing of common occurrence and slight moment with most men; but it was otherwise with him: his constitution was delicate, and his feelings sensitive beyond the conception of any but his intimates; to such a being, to love as he loved, was an exertion of energies almost alarming. He succeeded—the object of his adoration loved him—the day was fixed for their marriage—before it came, she died, and R—'s fond ties were broken. From that hour, all his time was spent in retracing the walks they had taken together. There was a rose tree, which she had planted, and R— watched over it with incessant care; for “he was the slave of sympathy.” I found it near him one day: he said to me—“You see that tree—I shall live as long as it; no longer?” He would not be persuaded that it was a mere whim of the imagination. Two months after this, he died. I passed through the garden—the tree was withered.

I am perfectly sensible not half my readers will believe this story. To those who do—who will look upon it as an instance of the strong power of the imagination over the mental and physical faculties—I relate this short notice of a gentle and innocent being. Poor R—! it is an humble stone that covers his remains, in yonder church-yard: his name is unknown, save to a few, but by those it will be long honoured, loved, and wept over.

THE ROMAUNT OF LLEWELLYN;

CANTO I.—PART III.

XXXIX.

Leave we, somewhere, Llewellyn and his songs!
Now would I say of what myself do feel;
What to mine own woe-wasted heart belongs:
And certes, gentles, much I may reveal
Ye each have known, albe ye do conceal!
For not to all alike the power is given
To wake the slumbering tale of woe or weal;
Of all to tell with which the soul hath striven,
The story of a heart with passion's lightning riven!

XL.

As some bewilder'd bird upon the water,
The while that drooping daylight 'gins to close,
And the wild waves and warring winds have brought her
Far from the spot where all her hopes repose,
Forlorn and faint o'er bounding billows goes,
And sorrowing seeks the dim and distant shore;
Such sadness, such despair this bosom knows,
As, drifting on, the sea of sorrow o'er,
Above, around, below, the winds and waters roar!

XLI.

So, may I, like that lonely bird, complain,
Of every joy and every hope bereft;
Some ease the soul imbibe, when its pain
It may impart,—the sole, and solace left
To me, as down the tide of time I drift!
Nathless, like some poor dying swan, I will
My voice in one last mournful requiem lift,
Then bid this heart lie evermore as still
As if it ne'er had known grief's agonising thrill!

XLII.

Alone here sit I by the taper's light,
Which, faint and flickering, scant dispels the gloom;
'Tis now the midmost, deadest hour of night,
And all around is silent as the tomb!
Now do hell's torture snakes my heart consume!
Wild through my breast the waves of sorrow flow!
Hope gasping lies,—ne ever may relume
Her quenched lamp,—ne may I ever know,
Save death's kind hand alone, the fine of all my woe!

XLIII.

Death is the unfailing leech, who every wound
May medicine,—and every agony
May soothe:—within his earthen house is found
That peace for which through life we vainly sigh!
Methinks it no displeasure were to die;
To tears and time, and sighs and sorrows bid
A long and last adieu!—How blest were I,
Within mine oaken chest for ever hid,
To have the charnyard gravel rattling on its lid!

XLIV.

There is, for tempest-beaten souls, a shore,
That shall receive them from life's stormy wave;
Where they shall be at peace for evermore,
Nor sigh, nor tear, nor teen, nor trouble have!
There is a haven shatter'd hearts to save,
That long have been of fortune's gale the sport,
A place of sweet repose,—it is the grave!
There shall the wicked want the power to hurt!
Rest shall the wearied ones find in that last resort!

XLV.

This is the hour when all is silent,—save
The ceaseless tumults of this anguish'd soul;
Save the dark thoughts, that, like the ocean-wave,
Untamed, untameable, for ever roll!
Now reigneth memory without control,
The queen of sorrow, weeping o'er the past,
The wayward sorceress of joy and dole;
And troublous thoughts drive thro' my bosom's waste,
As o'er the desert sweeps the Samiel's baleful blast.

XLVI.

What are my thoughts?—They are of days gone by,
And happier years;—hopes that have died forlorn;
Sad recollections of departed joy,
And keen regret for what may ne'er return;
The deep, dark, dumb despair I long have worn,
That racks my bosom, and wellnigh would weep;
But tears come not to eyes that hotly burn:
For what are tears, when feelings lie so deep
In their sad cell, the heart, where they for aye should sleep?

XLVII.

Low in my bosom lies the secret germe,
Whence springeth bootless bale and cureless care,
Eating the heart,—as in the bud the worm
Feeds on the centre, but doth not appear.
There is the well of many a weeping tear;
There is the cave of many a sorrowing sigh.
Howbe, as I did say, mine eyes are sear
At times, and may not weep,—yet sometimes I Allow that sad resource to grief-struck memory.

XLVIII.

Not alway was I wretched.—There hath been
A time when I was gayest of the gay.
But ye have oft a sunny morning seen
The prelude of a dark, tempestuous day.
Ah! little weets the urchin at his play,
Of storms that shall his future path assail,
Clouds that effoon shall intercept the ray
Of life's bright morn, and cause him weep and wail,
And turn his ruddy cheek too soon to sickly pale.

XLIX.

That time we all have known,—so sweet, so dear;
Ere the young heart the cold, cold world hath tried;
Ere we have shed one single bitter tear,
Or proved those pangs unfeeling ones deride;
Or been the scoff of insolence and pride;
Or felt how slander's venom'd tooth may wound;
Or seen how often seeming smiles do hide
A heartless heart;—or, to our cost, have found,
That treachery more than truth doth in this world abound.

L.

'Tis then the green and kingcup-deck'd field,
The daisied bank and sheene of silver stream,
The changeful ocean, sun, and sky, do yield
A rapture, that, effoon, becomes—a dream
Of what is past;—a momentary gleam
We not forget, but not again may feel;
A setting sun that t'row a parting beam;
A star that did, a little while, reveal
Its glory, then in clouds its brightness did conceal.

LI.

Yet, doth the memory of those sweet days
Steal on me oft;—like witching melody
Upon the enraptured sense of one, who strays
By the lone margin of some moon-lit sea.
And, as, to catch the dying accents, he
Doth lingering turn, and lean his listening ear;
So I, to trace the fading memorie
Of boyhood's joys, in many a by-gone year,
Do pause, and muse, until the ideal scenes appear.

LII.

Alas, poor fool;—how didst thou then neglect
Each gentle blessing;—fondly pressing on Along the road of life,—and still expect
For joys, thy folly worthless deem'd, that soon
Thou shouldst attain some fairer, brighter boon.
Fair was the dawn, and fairer still should be,
So didst thou ween, so whisper'd hope,—the noon
Of life.—Now eloquently speak for me
The faded cheek, sunk eye, and thro' of agonie.

LIII.

'Tis a new world meseemeth:—far 'ess fair
Than that I knew, while yet, in boyhood's hours,

I roam'd withouten guile, or grief, or care,
By bubbling brooklets, and sweet, leafy bowers,
Muttering my childish thoughts, and plucking flowers,
Or chasing butterflies athwart the mead:
Meet emblems of this worthless life of ours;
Where, onward, plucking paltry gaudes, we tread,
Or are, in vain pursuit, by varied visions led.

LIV.

Vainly I seek past pleasure to renew;
Such change is there.—The very flowers do seem
As if their beauty, and their sweetness too,
Were past,—for ever past,—even as a dream;
Or as the leynne's momentary gleam;
Or as, at spring's return, the winter's snow;
Or as a bubble floating down a stream;
Or a passing cloud, LOUISA, on thy brow;
Or, the least lasting thing of all, a woman's vow.

LV.

Yet must I sometimes pause, and think the while,
Whence is this wondrous change?—Is this the world
Once lovely and beloved, that now so vile
And void appears?—Ab, whither am I whirl'd
By faithless fortune's wheel?—Am I not hurl'd
By mystic means from home and hope afar?
Adown life's stream we float with sail unfurl'd,
And scene on scene, and change on change appear,
And at each change, meseems, in some new world we are.

LVI.

Unchanged the world remains.—The change is here;
In this sad breast,—this sorrow-sunken soul,
This tristful heart, the deep, dark dungeon, where Lie broken hopes and ever-during dole.
Yet, as the solitary tear may roll,
Or from my breast ascend the infrequent sigh,
Deem not that ye may ever know the whole
Of sorrow's sad imaginings,—which lie
Too silent, deep, and dark, for human ear or eye.

LVII.

I am a lonely thing in the wide world.
No heart to mine with throb responsive beats.
From my derne breast all gentle feelings hurl'd.
Since sympathy's sweet balm it no where meets,
Within its narrow cell the soul retreats:
For, scant on me one lip doth waste a smile,
Or but the same dull formula repeats,
That questions of my health,—sibb the while
It care not if I lay cold,—cold,—beneath the soil.

LVIII.

Trow ye, I trust the plausible outside,
The seeming smile, and ill-dissembled sneer,
The looks that barely thoughts of baseness hide,
Well-order'd words that fain like truth appear,
But deal in things to falsehood that are near,
And yet are bevell'd off with such a grace,
Just sloping to the lie that still they fear?
Oh, trust me, well I read the canting race
Of fools and would-be knaves, that slay while they embrace!

LIX.

For man is still of man the direst foe!
The stronger ever on the weaker preys!
It alway hath been, alway will be so!
And he who dares not strike, silent betrays
His friend to those that dare, and so repays
Full many a debt that weigh'd upon his soul!
I say as I have seen the gentle ways
Of those meek bipeds who this world control;
And, if I say not sooth, then misery be my dole!

LX.

I've seen how sorely slander's tongue may wound!
I've marked the oppressor's wrong, the rich man's scorn!
Friends have I sought, but falsehood mostly found!
With despised love my heart hath droop'd forlorn!
My daily meat and drink hath been to mourn!
I've wept till eye and heart alike are sore!
I've rued the day that ever I was born,
And sigh'd for death ten thousand times or more.
For what is life when grief gnaws at the bosom's core?

LXI.

Deep, deep within, is memory's hidden well;
Where perish'd hope's few floating things remain,
Silent and dark, save when the waters swell
One moment up to light and life again.

There lies young joy that in the birth was slain,
Dead but unburied hope,—still living care,
Love too sincere,—and vows that were in vain;
While one deep voice for ever murmurs there,
'Weep on, weep on, thou wretch,—thy portion be despair.'

LXII.

In secret anguish thus I brood o'er all
The chances of this life,—in which around
Us, friends and foes alike do daily fall,
To prove that peace which in the grave is found.
For there at least are all dissensions drown'd,
And they, that bated us without a cause,
Yield us our share of common churchyard-ground
Most peacefully;—for such the quiet laws
Of that best, last, long home, toward which each mortal draws.

LXIII.

The tide of time rolls on,—and the vast mass
Of great and little minds, pass on and perish:
And if there be who seeketh to surpass
His fares;—yet they, I ween, do seldom cherish
The wight who would presumptuously nourish
Dreams of excelling them;—but rather wield
A lethale blow to hope that 'gins to flourish:
Respect and deference they rarely yield,
Until, perforce, they've found such may not be withheld.

LXIV.

Some hate a man,—for he is dark or fair;
Some,—for that they are rich and he is poor;
Some hate him,—for the colour of his hair;
And some for that they loved him once before;
Others, for want of cause, hate him the more.
For, certes, in full many a heart there is
A wondrous store of envy boiling o'er,
Which, when it doth its own desires miss,
Takethest dear delight in poisoning others' bliss.

LXV.

But, there is other ground whence hate hath sprung.
A noxious weed, poisoning our mortal state;
Some hate a man,—for they have done him wrong;
And this is aye the surest soil for hate:
While some, for benefits of ancient date,
Make this return, and so rub off the score:
But cruellest of all the wretch's fate,
Whose fault was, that he did too much adore
Her who doth hate him now, more than she loved before.

LXVI.

For long it hath been known, and well exprest,
In love or hate, the female mind is still Wayward and wilful:—and when love the breast
Resigns, then entereth hate the void to fill.
And, what fair, false one loved thee, certes will
As strongly hate, whatever her remove;
Percease thou may'st have sigh'd to her, until Her pity,—then contempt,—then hate,—thou prove.
Not far divergent lie the paths of hate and love.

LXVII.

Yet, would I not return her haught disdain;
For 'twere to justify it.—I would be
One, who too deeply suffer'd, to complain.
Or if, at times, a tear came to mine ee,
Or a sigh stole out,—'twere but in secrecie.
And if thy love were true, remember this:
For every pang thou causest her,—to thee
Shall come a tear of blood,—a pang no less Than thy resentment gave in that thy dire distress.

LXVIII.

Yet is there that which wounds the noble minde,
And gives the gush of anguish to the ee,
More than disdain, or hate, or deed unkind;
It is—forgiveness of an injurie.
And, if thou have or friend or enemy,
Who hath, by chance, or thoughtlessness, or spleen,
Disturb'd thy peace of mind most cruelly,
The sweetest vengeance thou mayst take, I ween,
Is to forgive, forget, the injuries that have been.

SCIENCE, ETC.

Comparative Nutritive Properties of food.—An interesting report on this subject has been presented to the French Minister of the Interior, by Messrs. Percy and Vauquelin, Members of the institute. The result of their experiments is as follows: In bread every 100 lbs. is found to contain 80 lbs. of nutritious matter; butchers' meat, averaging the different sorts, contains only 35 lbs. in one hundred; French beans (in the grain) 92 lbs. in one hundred; broad beans, 89; peas 93; lentils (a species of half-pea, little known in England), 94 lbs. in one hundred; greens and turnips, which are the most aqueous of all vegetables used in culinary purposes, furnish only 8 lbs. of solid nutritious substance in one hundred; carrots (from which an inferior kind of sugar is produced), 14 lbs.; and what is remarkable, as being opposed to the old theory, 100 lbs. of potatoes only yield 25 lbs. of nutriment. One pound of good bread is equal to 2½ lbs. of potatoes; and 75 lbs. of bread and 80 of meat, are equal to 300 of potatoes. To go more into detail, ½ lb. of bread and 5 oz. of meat, are equal to 3 lbs. of potatoes; 1 lb. of potatoes is equal to 4 of cabbage and 3 of turnips; and 1 of rice, broad or French beans, in grain, is equal to 3 of potatoes.

Fracture of Calculi in the Bladder.—An instrument has been invented, and, it is said, brought to perfection in Paris, by M. Amusat, the use of which is to break down calculi in the bladder, and render the fragments so small that they may be voided as gravel. The instrument consists of pincers which are confined in a tube not larger than a sound, until introduced into the bladder. They are then opened, the stone is seized with facility, and by moving the handles in a particular manner, is soon reduced to powder. In a few seconds a stone the size of a nut is broken with facility; it appears, however, that as yet the trial has been made only on a dead body. It still remains to be learned what the result will be in a living one.

On the Employment of Potatoes in Steam-Engines and other Boilers, to prevent the calcareous Incrustations on their Bottoms and Sides.—The practice of adding about 1 per cent. of potatoes to the bulk of water contained in a steam-engine boiler, which has been long practised in this country, has been recently introduced into France, and merits the encomium which is bestowed on it by M. Pryn, in a letter to the Editor of the Jour. de Phar., Oct. 1832. He assigns the true cause of the beneficial agency of the root. The potato dissolves in the boiling water, forming a somewhat viscid liquid, which envelopes every particle of the precipitated calcareous salt, (usually selenite, sometimes carbonate of lime,) renders them slippery, so to speak, and prevents their mutual contact and cohesion. After a month's service, the boiler is emptied, and new potatoes added along with the charge of water.

New Steam-Engines of great Power.—We understand that Mr. Perkins has invented a new steam-engine, founded on a new property in steam, by which more than seven-eighths of the fuel and weight of engine may be saved. He has constructed a small one, with a cylinder two inches in diameter, and a stroke of twelve inches, which has the power of seven horses.

Preservative from Death by Skating.—Dr. Balfour has invented a very simple apparatus for preventing persons drowning, when the ice breaks under them in skating. It consists of an iron ring, elongated on one side into a perforator of about two inches in length, with a very slight curve. This may be permanently fixed on a pole or staff of any length, or adapted to the head of a walking cane. If the latter is preferred, a person may carry it in his pocket, with the part stuck into a cork, and screw it on and off at the ice. It is very evident that when a person feels himself going down, he will instinctively strike the perforator into the solid ice nearest him: and, as the specific gravity of the human body is not much greater than that of water, the slightest hold will suspend him till assistance is procured; nay, it is quite possible for a person so armed to extricate himself. The instrument cannot fail in any case to preserve life, except when the ice gives way to a great extent, and even then it will answer the purpose of suspension, if stuck into a large piece of floating ice.

A reasonable Desideratum.—The New England fishermen preserve their boots tight against water by the following method, which, it is said, has been in use among them above 100 years. A pint of boiled linseed oil, half a pound of mutton suet, six ounces of clean bees'-wax, and four ounces of rosin, are melted and well mixed over a fire. Of this, while warm, not so hot as may burn the leather, with a brush lay plentifully on new boots or shoes, when they are quite dry and clean. The leather is left pliant. Fishermen stand in their boots thus prepared, in water, hour after hour, without inconvenience. For three years past, all my shoes, even of calf skin, have been so served, and have, in no instance, admitted water to pass through the leather.

THE CLUB.

No. XXVI.—FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1823.

However, many books,
Wise men have said, are wearisome; who reads
Incessantly, and to his reading brings not
A spirit and judgment equal or superior,
(And what he brings, what need he elsewhere seek?)
Uncertain and unsettled still remains,
Deep-versed in books, and shallow in himself,
Grude or intoxicate, collecting toys
And trifles for choice matters, worth a sponge.

MILTON.

OUR worthy friend the Chairman is so much respected by the other members, and shews on all occasions so much good sense and forbearance in examining the opinions of others, and in stating his own, that (in our various discussions) he is seldom in the minority. He sometimes, indeed, indulges in a little railery at the expense of an opponent, but it is always in the way of pleasantry, and with good nature.

There is, however, one subject, often introduced at our meetings, upon which he cannot get a single member to agree with him: he is very much averse to public libraries, and will have it that they are productive of very little benefit, and the source of many bad consequences.

One of his arguments, which is to be found in the writings of many of the ancients, and upon which Cicero in particular has insisted a good deal, is, that though we ought to study much, it is unwise to read many books. The old gentleman illustrates this position by a variety of instances: and contends that if the caution was necessary formerly, it must be particularly so at present, as the number of books, many of them of rather an attractive nature, has become very great. If we refer to the practice of any very distinguished author, we shall find, our friend believes, that his reading has not usually been very various. Demosthenes, the greatest orator the world has yet produced, was proverbially devoted to one author, and, Newton, as distinguished for his mathematical productions, was remarkable for the few books which he had read even on his favourite sciences. Our friend thinks he can in this way account for the usual case of a person's making more real progress in learning while he is an advanced school-boy, than in an equal time during any subsequent period of his life. In the former instance, the student is obliged to make himself familiarly acquainted with a few well chosen authors; in the latter, he is apt to "skim over the surface" of many, and to devote himself to none. "More," says our friend, "depends upon the mode of study than upon the degree of it. One man may acquire as much in two hours as another learns in a week. Method, which is of importance in every thing, is particularly so in study." Our friend, who is now and then found to push his arguments a little too far, and, in that way, to give his opponents an unnecessary advantage, calls the present times the age of reviewing, and ascribes the circumstance, in a considerable degree, to the influence of circulating libraries.

The reading of a circulating library cannot, he contends, be called study. So far from improving the faculties of the mind and increasing the stock of knowledge, it has a tendency to dissipate the attention, and induce habits of literary idleness. The many superficial pedants who make so much show in the world, and who seem to know something of almost every book that has been written, and whom our friend denominates title-page-men, are generally well known in circulating libraries.

The other members concur in many of the Chairman's remarks, but they do not admit his conclusion. They think that circulating libraries are in many respects particularly useful. They concede the existence of some disadvantages; but to be free from all objections is not the privilege of human institutions.

Many persons whose days are passed in the drudgery of trade or commerce, find reading to be a very agreeable relaxation. They therefore take up a book in the evening as a recreation, and divert themselves with it when their minds, harassed by the labours and anxieties of the day, are unfitted for regular study. To persons of this description, a public library has many recommendations. It enables them, in particular, to consult many publications at a trifling expense. It places within their reach that innocent means of filling up their leisure hours, for the want of which they might otherwise have been the victims of more criminal propensities.

Circulating libraries have some claims even upon the regular student. When they contain good works, which is always the case under the direction of a sensible committee, they furnish the means of making those references for which every studious person has sometimes occasion.

One of the members, in alluding to the benefits which these libraries confer, mentioned the opportunities they supply to studious females. But the Chairman will not admit the validity of this argument. He thinks that it goes very far to support his own opinion. Females seldom find any thing in circulating libraries to improve either their intellect or their morals. On the contrary, they often injure both by the publications which are contained in these establishments. Novels and romances, the usual works which females take out of circulating libraries, have, unhappily, a powerful tendency to produce those airs and conceits which impair so much that natural grace and sweetness of manner, to which the sex owe so many of their attractions.

These are the lights in which the subject is at present viewed in the Club. Of the value of the President's reasons, and those of his opponents, as far as our limits would admit of our stating them, our readers may now form their own opinions.

VARIETIES.

ENGLISH WORKS.—A Gentleman visiting the Royal Library at Copenhagen, inquired whether any English works had lately been admitted. "This, Sir," answered the librarian, producing a shell which had entered the library at the time of the bombardment, "is the last English work we have received."

FRUIT.—In the time of Henry the Seventh, fruit seems to have been very scarce. In an original manuscript signed by himself, it appears that apples were paid for, not less than one or two shillings a-piece; that "a red rose" cost two shillings, and that a man and woman had eight shillings and four-pence for strawberries.

VANITY.—The Marquis de L'Etortière, an officer in a French regiment of the Guards, and one of the handsomest men in Paris, being one day among the crowd assembled in the church of the Quinze-Vingts, at the morning mass, felt some one press against him on one side in such a manner as caused him to look round rather sharply, when his neighbour thus addressed him. "Sir, pray have the goodness to turn the other way."—"What for, Sir?"—"Since you force me to confess it, Sir, I will tell you, that I am a painter, and my friend, who is in the gallery on the left, and who is commissioned by a beautiful young lady to take your portrait, has signified to me by a sign, the attitude in which he wishes to take you." M. de l'Etortière, flattered by the circumstance, and actually perceiving a man in the gallery, who regarded him attentively, and who, he imagined, had a pencil in his hand, took great pains every time he was required, to place himself in the attitude that he supposed the painter wished him to assume. Some minutes after, the man who had accosted him returned his acknowledgements for the politeness with which his request had been attended to, and slipped among the crowd; and the Marquis, on putting his hand into his pocket soon after, found himself minus his purse, watch, snuff-box, and all the jewels he had had about him.

It is said that Mr. Gifford, whose delicate health for some time past has retarded the publication of the forth-coming number of the Quarterly Review, purposes continuing in the Editorship of that Work for at least six months longer. We understand he has at present a great part of the matter ready for the two numbers which will appear in that time (besides the one now in the press,) and thinks he shall then, after having experienced the effects of the balmy season of the year, be able to decide whether he may proceed with his labours, or ought to relinquish them.

Belzoni leaves town on Monday on a new journey; but whether to make a tour through Persia, or to try to trace the route of Mungo Park, is not certain.

FIDELITY OF A DOG.—The following anecdote as related by BONAPARTE, is taken from the Journal of LAS CASES.—"In the deep silence of a beautiful moon-light night," said the Emperor, "a dog, leaping suddenly from beneath the clothes of his dead master, rushed upon us, and then immediately returned to his hiding place, howling piteously. He alternately licked his master's hand, and ran towards us; thus, at once soliciting aid and seeking revenge. Whether owing to my own particular turn of mind at the moment," continued the Emperor, "the time, the place, or the action itself, I know not; but, certainly, no incident on any field of battle ever produced so deep an impression on me. I involuntarily stopped to contemplate the scene. This man, thought I, perhaps, has friends in the camp or in his company; and here he lies forsaken by all except his dog! What a lesson Nature here presents through the medium of an animal! What a strange being is man! and how mysterious are his impressions! I had, without emotion, ordered battles which were to decide the fate of the army; I had beheld, with tearless eyes, the execution of those operations, by which numbers of my countrymen were sacrificed; and here my feelings were roused by the mournful howling of a dog! Certainly at that moment I should have been easily moved by a suppliant enemy: I could very well imagine Achilles surrendering up the body of Hector at the sight of Priam's tears."

HANDEL.—Handel being questioned as to his ideas and feelings when composing the Hallelujah Chorus, replied in his imperfect English, "I did think I did see all heaven before me, and the great God himself;" and, indeed, we may well suppose that they must have been ideas little less sublime, that furnished sounds so grand in their combinations.

A PHYSICIAN'S FEE.—Sir Richard Jebb used to tell a story of himself, which made even rapacity comical. He was attending a nobleman, from whom he had a right to expect a fee of five guineas—he received only three. Suspecting some trick on the part of the steward, from whom he received it, he at the next visit contrived to drop the three guineas. They were picked up, and again deposited in his hand: but he still continued to look on the carpet. His Lordship asked if all the guineas were found. "There must be two guineas still on the carpet," replied Sir Richard; "for I have but three." The hint was taken as he meant.

WEEKLY DIARY.

JANUARY.

REMARKABLE DAYS.

SATURDAY 25.—Conversion of St. Paul.

Saint Paul suffered martyrdom under the general persecution of Nero. Being a Roman citizen, he could not be crucified by the Roman laws, as his colleague St. Peter was; he was, therefore, beheaded:—hence the usual representation of him with a sword in his hand.

A singular custom was observed on this day in St. Paul's Cathedral, until the reign of Elizabeth. Sir William de Baud, who was Sheriff of Essex and Hertfordshire, in the year 1375, obtained liberty to inclose within his parish at Corrington, in Essex, twelve or twenty-two acres of land, of the Dean of St. Paul's, in consideration of presenting them with a fat buck and doe yearly, on the days of the Conversion and commemoration of St. Paul. 'On these days, the buck and the doe were brought by one or more servants at the hour of the procession, and through the midst thereof, and offered at the high altar of St. Paul's Cathedral: after which the persons that brought the buck, received of the Dean and Chapter, by the hands of their Chamberlain, twelve pence sterling for their entertainment; but nothing when they brought the doe. The buck being brought to the steps of the altar, the Dean and Chapter, apparelled in copes, and proper vestments, with garlands of roses on their heads, sent the body of the buck to be baked, and had the head and horns fixed on a pole before the cross, in their procession round about the church, till they issued at the west door, where the keeper that brought it blowed the death of the buck, and then the horns that were about the city answered him in like manner; for which they had each, of the Dean and Chapter, three and fourpence in money, and their dinner; and, the keeper, during his stay, meat, drink, and lodging, and five shillings in money at his going away; together with a loaf of bread, having in it the picture of St. Paul.'

SUNDAY, 26.—Septuagesima Sunday.

The institution of this and the two following Sundays cannot be traced higher than the beginning of the sixth or the close of the fifth century. 'When the words Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima (seventieth, sixtieth, and fiftieth), were first applied to denote these three Sundays, the season of Lent had generally been extended to a fast of six weeks, that is, thirty-six days, not reckoning the Sundays, which were always celebrated as festivals. At this time, also, the Sunday which we call the first Sunday in Lent, was styled simply Quadragesima, or the fortieth, meaning, no doubt, the fortieth day before Easter. Quadragesima was also the name given to the season of Lent, and denoted the quadragesimal or forty days' fast. When the three weeks before Quadragesima ceased to be considered as weeks after the Theophany (or Epiphany), and were appointed to be observed as a time of preparation for Lent, it was perfectly conformable to the ordinary mode of computation to reckon backwards, and, for the sake of even and round numbers, to count by decades.—(Shepherd.)

CRITICISM.

COCK ROBIN.—(Concluded.)

IN the language in which the sentiments are clothed, the poet will be found at least equal to himself. That the impassioned question and the eager reply are the true features of the pathetic, we have the testimonies of Longinus and Boileau, the first of ancient and modern critics.

Nor must we omit to notice the artful employment of diminutives, as, 'my little eye, my little dish,' &c. throughout the poem. Nothing so much gives the air of tenderness or softness to the elegy as this class of nouns. Our poet, doubtless, had studied the beauties of the elder Italian school, or the higher examples of the Roman bards. Catullus had already pointed out the path—witness his verses on Lesbia's Robin (the ancestor of the hero of our present tale), when the winged favorite, like his descendant, had paid the debt of nature:—

O factum male, o miscelle passer,
Tua nunc opera, mea poëta,
Plendo turgiduli rubent ocellis.*

Brandenrumpf, a learned monk of the 14th century, has quarreled with the stanza:

Who'll toll the bell?
I, says the Bull,
Because I can pull.

To introduce thus an apathetic animal among the characters in this poem, he observes, destroys the symmetry of the piece, which is in other respects confined to the smaller orders of the winged and finny kinds; but, for my part, I am satisfied, after great research, that the poet is misunderstood—and that the word 'bull' is used (as with Cowpert and others) per ellipsin vel synecdochen, for the bull-finch, who would doubtless be competent to toll the bell employed on the melancholy occasion.

If Brandenrumpf, however, felt dissatisfied at the introduction among the dramatic persons of a Bull (in the mistaken sense of the word), how justly would his displeasure have been increased, had he lived in these times, and perused the last edition of our poet. Besides many injurious alterations in the text, to which I shall presently more particularly address myself, he would have perceived with horror a vital stab at the sense and meaning of the fourth stanza. He would there have read, nay more, he would have seen, with rage, in the copper-plate designs which accompany the edition, not Scarabeus Popinalis of Linnaeus (the Black Kitchen-Beetle), playing his work with the busy hum (in fancy's ear) of cheerfulness; but the SCARABÆUS PAROCHIALIS, (or, the BLUE PARISH BEADLE!) an order of animals hitherto unnoticed by our naturalists. With what anger would he have gazed on the huge biped, seated on a tomb-stone, in all the unmeaning pomp of corpulency and a cocked hat, sewing something similar in appearance to a common pocket-handkerchief!

Having adverted to these unauthorised alterations, I feel myself compelled to observe at length on a subject, which I must confess has excited in me feelings of great regret, not unmixed with some emotions of indignation. The inexcusable liberties which some editors have taken with the works of our elder poets, have long been matter of reprobation among the learned. The evil spirit of unbridled emendation, which did not respect the sacred remains of Shakespeare, has at length ventured to fix his harpy claws on the labors of the author of the Cocco-Robinad.

I have now before me an edition; (professing to be the latest and the best) of this excellent work; and I note, with grief, the introduction of this verse into the body of the poem:—

Who'll carry him to the grave?
I, said the Kite,
If 'tis not in the night,
And I'll carry him to the grave.

This is clearly an interpolation; but which might have been better tolerated had not the sense of other passages been injured to make room (as it were) for this. In order to preserve the third line, the editor has wholly destroyed the beauty of the preceding stanza, and added a couplet to the following one. The Lark is made to say, 'if it be not in the dark,' thus converting her unequivocal promise into a conditional assent, expressive of the meanest selfishness. And respecting the Linnet, the editor observes, 'Here's the Linnet with a light, although it is not night.' But that the reading of these passages, which I have already given, is correct, will appear from several considerations sufficiently obvious. Indeed if the funeral were not to be solemnized in the night, can it be supposed that a torch would have been at all required?

Again, I perceive at the close of the genuine poem, the addition of no less than three unauthenticated and fabricated stanzas. The editor, it must be confessed, has not been deficient in one species of ingenuity: he has invoked the aid of the sister art; and has attempted to enrich, by the delineations of the pencil, the efforts of his muse. We are, however, not to be cajoled with drawings, however happy, nor dazzled with coloring however vivid. Any, the least distinguishing palate, can detect, in the following verses, the want of that flavor—that gusto—which belong to the original poem:—

Who will fill the grave?
I, said the Hawk, so brave,
Let me fill the grave.
Who will read his will?
I, said the Daw,
Because I am in the law,
And I will read his will.
Who will write his epitaph?
I, said the Nare,
With the utmost care,
Poor Cock Robin is no more.

In explanation of some remarks which have been made, it seems proper to notice that each of these stanzas is accompanied by an appropriate drawing, subscribed with significant designations, such as—

Behold the Hawk engaged,
Filling of Robin's grave.
This is the Jack-Daw,
Who is in the law
With spectacles and law,
A reading of the will.

I should feel less displeased with the editor were the liberty taken with the poet the least objectionable part of his conduct. It is impossible, however, to shut one's eyes against the insinuation intended to be conveyed against the members of a learned profession, under the vile emblem of a Daw. What degree of animosity (I would ask) could have led the editor to furnish that mean fowl with spectacles, and to make so pointed an allusion to his claw? Who does not here perceive a malign, but (I trust) impotent, attempt to charge noisy garrulity—prying curiosity—and a grasping propensity, on some limbs of an honorable vocation? I admonish the editor to a reform. Let him remember, that while I possess even the stump of a pen, I will wield it to the overthrow of attempts which seek to disturb the manes of a departed bird—and at the same time to undermine one of the pillars of our political system.

Here will I pause.—Let us now for a moment return to the agonized group of fowls, who amid the shades of night stretch their wings and ope their bills in bitter sorrow, and prepare to seal the tomb. Borne on the pinions of fancy, let us hover round the sacred spot; and while the notes of woe are heard, and the deep knell dies on the gale, let us mingle our tributary tears with the floods of sorrow that bedew the corpse of ill-fated Robin!

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

Brief Memoir of the Life of the Rev. R. Walker.

We concluded our last by saying that there was in our former sketch something so extraordinary as to require further explanatory details.

We will begin with his industry. Eight hours in each day, during five days in the week, and half of Saturday, except when the labours of husbandry were urgent, he was occupied in teaching. His seats were within the rails of the Altar; the communion table was his desk; and, like Shenstone's school-mistress, the master employed himself at his spinning-wheel, while the children were repeating their lessons by his side. Every evening, after school time, if not more profitably engaged, he continued the same kind of labour, exchanging for the benefit of exercise, the small wheel, for the large one at which the spinner steps to and fro. Thus was the wheel constantly in readiness to prevent the waste of a moment's time. Nor was his industry with the pen, when occasion called for it, less eager. Intrusted with the management of public and private affairs, he acted in his rustic neighbourhood as scrivener, writing petitions, wills, extracts, &c. with pecuniary gain to himself, and to the great benefit of his employers. These labours (at all times considerable,) at one period of the year, viz. between Christmas and Candlemas, when money transactions are settled in this country, were often so intense that he passed great part of the night, and sometimes whole nights at his desk.—His garden also was tilled by his own hands: he had a right of pasturage upon the mountains for a few sheep and a couple of cows, which required his attendance; with this pastoral occupation, he joined the labours of husbandry upon a small scale, renting a few acres of land in addition to his own glebe: and the humblest drudgery which the cultivation of these fields required, was performed by himself. He also assisted his neighbours in making hay, and shearing their flocks; and in the performance of this latter service he was eminently dexterous. They, in return, complimented him with a present of a hay-cock, or a fleece, less as a recompense for these services than as a general acknowledgment.

The sabbath was in a strict sense kept holy: Sunday evenings were devoted to reading the scriptures and family prayer. The principal festivals of the church were also duly observed; but every other day, through every week in the year, he was incessantly occupied in work of hands or mind, not allowing a moment for recreation, except on Saturday afternoons, when he indulged himself with a news-paper, or sometimes with a magazine.—The frugality and temperance established in his house were as admirable as the industry. Nothing to which the name of luxury could be given was there known. In the latter part of his life, indeed, when tea had been brought into almost general use, it was provided for visitors, and for such of his family as returned occasionally to his roof, and had been accustomed to this refreshment elsewhere, but neither he nor his wife ever partook of it.—The raiment worn by his family was comely and decent, but as simple as their diet; the home-spun materials were made up into apparel, by their own hands. At the decease of this thrifty pair, their cottage contained a large store of woollen and linen cloth, woven from thread of their own spinning.—The pew in which his family used to sit, remained a few years ago neatly lined with cloth spun by the pastor's own hands: and, no other instance is known of his conformity to the delicate accommodations of modern times.—The fuel of his house (like that of his neighbours,) consisted of peat procured from the mosses by his own labour. The lights by which their winter's evening work was performed were by his manufacture, being made of the pith of rushes dipped in any unctuous substance that the house afforded; white candles, as tallow ones are here called, were reserved to honour the Christmas festivals, and were produced upon no other occasion. Once a month, during the proper season, a sheep was drawn from his small mountain flock, and killed for the use of the family: and a cow, towards the close of the year, was salted and dried for winter provision: and the hide was tanned to furnish them with shoe-leather. By these various resources this venerable clergyman reared a numerous family, not only preserving them, as he affectingly said, "from wanting the necessities of life," but affording them an unstinted education, and the means of raising them in society.

How could the powers of intellect thrive, or its graces be displayed, in the midst of circumstances apparently so unfavourable, and where to the direct cultivation of the mind, so small a portion of time was allotted? It may be concluded that no one could thus, as it were, have converted his body into a machine of industry, for the humblest uses, and kept his thoughts so constantly occupied upon secular concerns, without grievous injury to the most precious part of his nature. But, in this extraordinary man, things in their nature adverse, were reconciled: his conversation was remarkable, not only for being chaste and pure, but for the degree in which it was fervent and eloquent; and his written style was correct, simple, and animated. Nor did his affections suffer in the least. The stranger who passed that unfrequented vale was fed and refreshed, and "the poor and the needy, he never sent empty away." He tenderly performed all the duties of his pastoral office; the sick were visited, and the feelings of humanity found exercise among the distresses of his neighbours, and in their worldly embarrassments, his talents for business, his disinterestedness and impartiality, (virtues seldom separated in his conscience from religious obligations) were remarkably efficacious. As in his practice there was no guile, so in his faith there was nothing hollow: while his humble congregation were listening to the moral precepts and christian exhortations which he delivered from the pulpit, it may be presumed that peculiar effect would attend his labours, when they reflected that he called upon them to do no more than by his own actions, he daily set them an example. The afternoon service was less numerously attended than that of the morning, but by a more serious auditory, the lesson from the New Testament being accompanied by Burckett's commentary. Not only on Sunday evenings, but every evening, while the rest of the household were at work, some one read a portion of the Bible aloud; and in this manner the whole was repeatedly gone through.

He was zealously attached to the doctrines and frame of the Established Church. We have already seen him congratulating himself that he had no dissenter in his cure. In what degree this prejudice was blameable need not be determined;—certain it is, that he was desirous, not only to live in peace, but in love with all men. He was placable and charitable in his judgments; and, however correct, and rigorous as to himself, he was ever ready to forgive the trespasses of others, and to soften the censure that was cast upon their frailties. It would be unpardonable to omit, that, in the maintenance of his virtues he received due support from the Partner of his long life. She was equally strict in attending to her share of their joint cares, nor less diligent in her appropriate occupations. A person who had been their servant in the latter part of their lives, concluded the panegyric of her mistress, by saying, "she was no less excellent than her husband; she was good to the poor, she was good to every thing." He survived this virtuous companion but a short time. When she died he ordered her body to be carried to the grave by three of her daughters, and one grand-daughter; and when the corpse was lifted, he insisted upon lending his aid; and feeling about, (for he was then almost blind,) he took hold of a napkin fixed to the coffin, and, as a bearer, entered the chapel, not many yards from the lowly Parsonage.

At a small distance from his cottage a mill had been erected for spinning yarn; and so much had been effected by the power of machinery before his death, that its operations could not escape his notice, and, doubtless, did excite touching reflections upon the comparatively insignificant results of his own manual industry. But, Robert Walker was not a man of times and circumstances: had he lived at a later period, the principle of duty would have produced application as unremitting, and the same energy would have been displayed, but, in many instances, the effect would have been amazingly different.

What a contrast does the life of this obscurely-seated, and unremunerated parish priest present to the generality of his brethren of modern days!

Not every man is born to be a Vicar of Bowden; nor is every Vicar like this "Village Preacher!"

ERECTION OF THE ANCIENT MONUMENTS OF EGYPT.

How the Egyptians and Early Ancients moved and formed such stupendous masses has often been a subject of doubt and admiration, perhaps for want of consideration, how Archimedes made his grand experiments, or how the immense concerns of our dock-yards are conducted. The principles of mechanics are few and simple. Plumb-lines, and wheels and axles, are mentioned in contemporary writings. Denon says, that the Egyptians began by elevating masses, in which they marked out their architectural lines; and it is certain that at the temple of Hiermonthis, the sculpture of the capitals has not been finished, so that the pillars were worked after they were put up. The obelisks are described by Pliny as having been brought to Thebes from the quarries by means of a canal. The obelisks were made to rest across the stream upon the opposite banks; vessels loaded with bricks were brought under; the cargo was then taken out, and, the vessels rising, elevated the obelisks. The method employed of moving columns and large stones, was by affixing strong iron axles in each end, and inserting them in broad wheels of solid construction. Such was the plan of Ctesiphon and Methagenes, of which Vitruvius gives the account. Such a wheel also appears affixed to the end of an obelisk in Montfaucon's plate. Herodotus writes, that Cleopas, the son of Rasimith, left steps outside the pyramid, in order that very large stones might be moved by short beams and proper engines. The short beam seems to point out the carchesium, or crane of Vitruvius. Very large stone beams are said to have been placed upon high columns in this manner. Under the centre of the beam they put two cross pieces, mutually contiguous. They then affixed baskets of sand at one end till the weight raised the other. Under the beam thus raised from its bed, they placed a stay or support. They then applied the weights to the opposite end, newly lifted, till it tilted up the other extremity; and so putting another elevator under, they proceeded till the stone was reared into its proper position. It is said, that the stones for the pyramids were brought along artificial causeways; and Pliny adds, that bridges were made of unbaked bricks, till the work was concluded, and then the bricks were distributed for the formation of private houses. M. de Laysorié thinks that the scaffolding of the ancients was formed of ropes, and that such a method might now be very conveniently adopted. Stones were sold ready hewn, and Pliny mentions the process of sawing them (for the saw is seen on Egyptian monuments) by the aid of sand, and this process and very form of the saw are still preserved. In ancient representations, upright posts, or capstans, are erected, around which winds a rope, fastened to the block, and the capstan is turned by long horizontal levers. Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of the erection of the obelisk at Constantinople, says, that there was a wood of machinery, consisting of lofty beams or masts, with which were connected vast and long ropes as thick as rework. With these the obelisk was fastened, and by many thousand men, working as in turning a mill, it was placed in its socket. As clearly as we can comprehend this by comparison with the figure, the great number of ropes was intended to prevent a fall; and those, which elevated the obelisk, were strained by the captain just described, till it was elevated upon its base. A very rude method of fixing upright large stones was, according to some authors, rolling them up an inclined plane, and then letting them fall into the place intended. The excellence of the workmanship in the monuments of Egypt is, however, sufficient evidence of the knowledge of the leading necessary machinery, because it is of course antecedent to the invention of finish and ornament.—Fosbroke's Encyclopedia of Antiquities.

SIR F. HENNIKER'S VISIT TO HIS BANKER AT LAKRAAT.

'Called on the banker—this metropolitan bank is in some danger: there being as many as three or four applicants for money, and I want no less than the enormous sum of 100l. I took my place cross-legged on the mat: the room would just do for a hen-house, mud white-washed, with one small window; in a corner sat "the Firm," with his desk and portable treasury before him—his attendants were armed—coffee was brought, and a slave, who was smoking, as I conceived for his own amusement, was troubling himself to light a pipe for me; I took the liberty to wipe the mouth-piece, which I was afterwards given to understand, is to doubt the cleanliness of master or man, and it is therefore an insult—not to let him spit in your face—I sat here about an hour and a half in limbo; during this, several Turks came in—took their places—drank their coffee—smoked their pipes—remained half an hour—said nothing, and walked away—whether these were visits of ceremony, pleasure, or business, I cannot decide—not a word was spoken—but what was a Turk to say—he has no books, nor news-papers, nor curiosity, nor activity—he has no pleasure but his pipe—funus et umbra:—That a man should travel for knowledge, or dance for amusement, excites the astonishment of the most enlightened of them. "What, come so far to see buildings that are destroyed, and not be paid money for your trouble?" "What, dance yourself, when you can hire others to dance for you for five shillings!" yet with all their idleness and want of thought, I never heard a Mohammedan whistle—whistling would be more tolerable than smoking; they seem happy, and "if in ignorance there's bliss," they ought to be really so—O that Eve had been a Mohammedan. My hundred pounds were to be paid in piastres, half piastres, and paras, pieces the value of six-pence, three-pence, and half farthings, the latter about the size of spangles, these were counted over three times, nor did any attention to the visitors occasion the loss of half a farthing to the bank of Siout—it was but on one occasion that the object of the Firm was at all diverted—he took a pipe from his servant's mouth, put it into his own, and then into his friend's, taking that of the latter in exchange—this is the acme of civility in a Turkish gentleman—none but the ill-bred would feel any delicacy—at length money was thrice counted, put into a carpet bag, my dragoman refused to be purse-bearer, and a donkey was hired to carry it to the boat—such money, and such trouble attending it, ought to be enumerated among the plagues of Egypt—the piastres are copper slightly white-washed, the mask soon wears off, and like the "teasers" of Henry VIII. they blush at their own corruption.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ENGLISH ACTORS AND SCOTTISH REVIEWERS.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—You last week favoured your readers with an extract from a Scotch paper relative to Mr. Vandenhoff's first appearance in Edinburgh. After the wretched actors that public are and have been doomed to witness regularly belonging to the company there, I am not at all surprised to find that such a performer as Mr. V. was well received: Mr. V. has now adopted an honourable and a politic method of proceeding, and I rejoice in his success—this is the step he should have taken are he ventured to re-appear before a Manchester or a Liverpool audience, under the peculiar delicacy and honour which should have been observed by him, in the dangerous and difficult enterprise of regaining his former situation.

It has often been said "that an injudicious friend is your worst enemy," and of the contemptible "puff" which you have extracted, if it was written by a Scotch critic, I suppose he meant to be facetious at Mr. V.'s expense. If by an Englishman (and which I very much suspect) he has missed his mark: for who ever heard of Mr. V.'s 'uncommonly fine person,' 'graceful and dignified gesture,' 'handsome face,' 'powerful eye and forehead,' and then 'his throat, and the junction of the throat with the head,' is the finest the critic has ever seen: then it says that Mr. V. falls in 'the strokes of pathos, which occur in the part, and yet his success was complete; strange contradiction! and it concludes by stating that the whole performance is founded upon Keimble, with this latter remark I perfectly coincide, and it was chiefly owing to such unfortunate adaptation, both in 'Coriolanus' and 'Lear,' that Mr. V. may ascribe his failure in London.

Thus the Scotch critics seem to have discovered what I could not after seven years acquaintance, I mean with respect to his person, face, and action, for I know that Mr. V.'s face and head are by nature little, his hair and complexion very light, his eye very small and light coloured, and sunk in his head, and the whole contour incapable of varied expression: his gait and action too are stiff and ungraceful; yet with all these disadvantages it redounds to his honor to have effected so much as he has done, being so little indebted to nature for assistance, with the exception of a good voice, and sound judgment as a speaker. I would rather have heard of some fine points he may have made in enacting the character, than in perusing a tissue of personal requisites that Mr. V. does not in truth possess.

Your's, V. P.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—In the time of Menage, the French were very partial to a species of writing to which they gave the name of Bouts Rimes. It consisted of a number of terminations of lines which rhyme with one another, and to which the persons to whom they are offered, have to furnish the preceding parts, so as to make sense of the whole.

I am aware that this kind of writing has been condemned by Mr. Addison in one of the numbers of the Spectator. I cannot help thinking, however, with due submission to so great an authority, that the Bouts Rimes is a very good exercise for the mind, and that, therefore, it has been rather too hastily censured. It seems to me a very rational amusement; and particularly adapted to improve the sagacity of young writers.

I beg to propose the following exercise; and shall be glad to see the lines filled up in an early number of your interesting publication.

METEOROLOGY.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—No doubt many of your readers will be glad to see a daily statement of the temperature during the past severe frost. The following are the two extremes for each day, but which generally average about two degrees more than in the neighbourhood of the town: this difference arises from various causes, such as acquired temperature from a concentrated population, combustion of fuel, and gas, &c. Possibly my thermometer may indicate a fraction more than an average of the town from its slightly confined situation.

The wind during the above days, blew generally from the north and north-east. The barometer gradually fell from the 11th to the 19th, and became stationary about the very low temperature of 35°, when it began to rise. This evening, (22nd) the barometer has nearly regained what it had lost since the 11th, and now appears stationary. The ground for the most part has been clothed with snow, and rivers and canals frozen over. My friend's thermometer at Crumppall indicated a cold of 13° on the morning of the 19th, which is 15° below freezing. The mean of the two extremes on that day in town was 21°, in the country probably 19°. Mean of the means of the two extremes of the twelve days, 30.2°.

A gentleman in the neighbourhood of Chancery-Lane, Ardwick, noticed the temperature of the 19th, in the morning, to be 13° the same as at Crumppall.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER,
From Monday Jan. 20th, to Friday Jan. 25th, 1823.

Monday.—Romeo and Juliet: with the Libertine. Juliet, Miss S. Booth.

Tuesday.—Rob Roy: with the Spoil'd Child. Bailie Nichol Jarvie and Tag, Mr. Tayleure: Little Pickle, Miss S. Booth.

Wednesday.—The Provok'd Husband: with the Miller and his Men. John Moody and Karl, Mr. Tayleure: Jenny and Claudine, Miss S. Booth.

Friday.—King Lear: with the Sleep Walker. Cordelia, Miss S. Booth: Somno, Mr. Tayleure.

On Monday evening Miss S. BOOTH appeared in the arduous character of Juliet. With the justly celebrated Miss O'Neil, in perfect recollection our anticipations of Miss B. were moderate; but, never were we more agreeably, more happily mistaken!—This lady's talents are great, and so developed and matured by application and correct conception, that she is sure to obtain the warmest admiration of all who witness her exertions.—Her performance of Juliet was throughout unexceptionable; yet this does not convey a comparative idea of it,—it was throughout of the first description! Of Miss B.'s Little Pickle, it will be sufficient to remark that the public has long stamped it as being peculiarly suited to her neat, spry person, and cheerful disposition. But that the very dissimilar characters of Juliet and Little Pickle could be so exquisitely united in the same lady, remained for Miss B. to exemplify, and is to us equally singular and delightful.

We witnessed the re-appearance of Mr. TAYLEURE on Tuesday night, in the character of Bailie Nichol Jarvie, in Rob Roy; and in that of Tag, in the Spoil'd Child. That this gentleman's London engagement should have improved his general acting was naturally expected; the case, however, was otherwise—grace is still predominant in the old proportion, which always made genuine acting, with him, a minor consideration. Tag, although one of his favourite characters, is much inferior to Mr. Penson's.

In Rob Roy, Mr. TAYLEURE appeared to very great advantage. His bold commanding figure, afforded a striking and appropriate representation of that daring outlaw; and he sustained the character with admirable spirit, and the utmost energy. Of Mrs. M'Grawson, weekly or even monthly paegeic would prove cloying, and exhaust the strains of eulogy; yet, with regard to this lady's performances, the severest liberal criticism could employ no other.

MISREPRESENTATION CORRECTED.

[From a persuasion that our friend Mr. Hezekiah Treacle has not acted towards his rib, according to equity, or conjugal obligation, we do not hesitate to assign to her retaliative epistle, the most prominent place in our Miscellany.—Ed.]

MR. SMITH,

SIR,—I do not know whether you are a married, or a single man, but if you have any regard for our sex, I shall expect to discover that regard, by finding this letter inserted in your Iris.

You must know then, Sir, that I am the wife of MR. HEZEKIAH TREACLE, who, on the 5th of last November, sent a letter to one MR. MEDIUM, secretary to the Club of humourists that publishes those papers in your Iris. Now, Sir, I suspect that my husband is a member of this club, though he keeps his being so a secret from me; for I have seen a formal mysterious looking man occasionally call at our house, and have observed my husband talk with him apart. This man, I suspect, is Mr. Medium, for about the day on which Hezekiah's letter is dated, I recollect the person whom I take for Mr. Medium spent the evening at our house, but not in the parlour where I was,—he was closetted with my husband; and I never could learn what they were doing, only that it was some particular business. I remember now it was the 5th of November, for I said to Hezekiah that he and his friend might be contriving another gunpowder treason, upon which he smiled, but made no reply. However, little did I think that I was the victim of their machinations.

We have taken the Iris from its commencement, and it is always served up with breakfast on Saturday morning, exactly at eight o'clock. I have reason enough to recollect this, as Mr. Treacle once chided a good servant so for bringing in breakfast without the Iris, that it was with great difficulty I prevailed upon her to remain with us longer.

After looking the papers over, and reading aloud to me what pleases him, Hezekiah leaves the number out till the next week, that the rest of the family may read it. He then carefully lays it up in his scrutoire. I remember, however, my precise man once took a number away with him, and though I often asked him what he had done with it, he always evaded my question. One day last week, however, I went to look for a receipt for some money which I knew I had paid, and which the tax-gatherer called for a second time, and I thought I would see if the number missing was put by among the others, when I found it carefully in its order; but what was my surprise and chagrin, when I found my husband's letter to Mr. Medium in it. But, Sir, though Hezekiah says he wrote this letter to attract my notice, yet he was so ashamed of himself, that he durst not let me see it. I so far overcame my feelings as to put the number in its place, and to say nothing to him; but resolved to send you a letter in reply, and trust me I will not shrink, but he shall have it to his breakfast as soon as his coffee is ready, on the morning of publication.

As to vindicating myself from the frivolous charges he brings against me, I do not consider them worthy of an answer. With his shop (thank God) I have done this long time. He and his young men are the fittest to manage it. I assure you, Mr. Smith, I never was brought up to such matters. My husband received £1000 with me, and I think that was a handsome thing. I never interfere with his shop, and he ought to allow me to manage my own domestic affairs. I am ashamed for him when I observe what little matters he makes of importance. The apples that he mentions, for instance, were some nice pippins which I put into his scrutoire, that he might have one after dinner, as he is very partial to apples. With regard to the other matters, perhaps he may have seen occasionally little instances of omission, or inadvertency; but, let me ask any considerate person, whether, in a family consisting of twelve persons, and among them four small children, every thing can be always in the most orderly state?

With regard to any little defects in my dress, all my friends tell me, that to wear no whalebone in my stays is the greatest; and which, I am informed, makes me look like a sack of flour with a string tied round the middle; yet to this I have submitted to please some whimsical notions which Hezekiah entertains about the order of nature, and the symmetry of the human figure. But, as soon as this letter appears in print, I will resume my whalebone, though at the expense of this supposed symmetry.

However, it is time, Sir, that I gave you some account of my husband, since he has been so very particular in his account of me.

During our courtship the most agreeable thing I observed in him, was, that I never knew him to exceed the period of an engagement five minutes; at the same time, he would not stay after the clock struck ten, say what I would to detain him. He once complained that our clock was two minutes and a half too late. The general topic of his conversation was the happiness of a well regulated family, and he was very severe in his remarks on the practice of keeping irregular hours. He declared that he was never out of his late master's house at a quarter past ten during the whole time that he had lived with him.

Now, Sir, I must tell you that I date all my husband's whimsical formalities to the influence of his late master's example and his over-nice rules. Well indeed do I remember this person! He was a little, spare, nimble man, always dressed in brown; he wore bright buckles in his shoes, and a little round hat, and he never was married! I could fill half a dozen numbers of your Iris with an account of the oddities of Peregrine Pimento, all arising out of his slavery to certain rules of method. From his exactness in weighing his groceries he got the name of Split-raisin. I cannot resist the desire I feel of giving you a sketch of this oddity of regularity. Mr. Pimento used to write down on a card the manner in which he intended to dispose of every hour in the week. He had a little book of aphorisms relating to order and method, which he called his golden rules. This little book commenced with a few lines of poetry, beginning "Order is heaven's first law." One of the first employments of a young apprentice was to write out for his own use a copy of these rules.

If any one made application to Peregrine for his opinion of a tradesman whether he was trustworthy, the only answer he gave was "I consider him a very regular man," or "His business is conducted without method." The Dutch were great favourites with Mr. Pimento, for he had somewhere read that this people had so high an opinion of method, that for them to say of a man that he kept his accounts irregularly was the same as to say he had failed in business or was bankrupt.

During his last illness Peregrine Pimento drew up an exact account of the manner in which he wished to be buried. He directed that his relations and friends should follow him to the grave;—not in the order of consanguinity, but according to his declared opinion of their character for method and punctuality. My husband Hezekiah was appointed to follow next to the body, and Mr. Pimento presented him with the original copy of his Golden Rules with his own hands on his death-bed; and Hezekiah prides himself more upon his old master's preference than many a nobleman does upon his title.

Hezekiah has so faithfully copied his master, that he sees but one virtue in the world—Order, and one vice—Disorder! Besides the Bible, the only books he reads, are, The Tradesman's Dictionary, A Treatise on Discount and Tare and Tret, and Interest Tables. The latter seems to please him much because he says the figures appear so methodically placed. I have several times heard Hezekiah say he once intended to study astronomy, but was deterred by observing the confusion in which the stars appeared to be placed; adding, that he could not see how any thing like order could be produced out of such confusion; for if his drawers and canisters were half as confused he should not have the courage to attempt to reduce them to method. He has so frequently read that chapter in the Bible to the family which contains the precept "Let all things be done decently and in order" that we can all of us repeat it without book. Hezekiah never gives any other opinion of a sermon than that "It was a very methodical discourse," and perhaps he will add "He has no doubt but the minister is a very punctual man." Or should the sermon not be approved, "This preacher is utterly destitute of system."

But to give you an idea of my husband's particularities about the house would be impossible. As soon as the bell begins to ring eight at night, I have to despatch a servant to see if every thing be in its place, to save chiding when he returns from his shop. I have known him stand in the lobby calling for his top-coat when it was at his elbow, but the servant after brushing it had hung it on the wrong nail, and it is a maxim with Hezekiah, never to allow any thing to exist, except in its appropriate place. He has often threatened to have all the nails and hooks in the house labelled.

Last summer, my two youngest children having the whooping cough, Hezekiah took a cottage at a little distance from the town, and, as he said, to give his family an example of order from nature, he bought some ducks, and prepared a path for them to walk home unobstructed. In the evening he took great delight in observing the ducks come home in a line, one regularly behind another. On one occasion, however, it happened that one of the ducks saw a snail near the path, and left the line to pick it up. This so offended my husband, that he ordered the straggler to be killed, lest it should set a bad example to the flock. Nor has my favourite cat met a better fate. Hezekiah always requires his slippers to be placed side by side, in front of his arm chair, so as to be ready when he comes home, but puss in her play, happening to disturb their position, received so severe a correction, that the very sound of his feet made her leave the house. One morning as Hezekiah was going to the shop, he found puss at the house door, and imagining that she had been out all night, he ordered the youngest apprentice to drown her, for that she led a disorderly life. Not long ago, some friends spent the evening with us, and, among other topics of conversation, the bravery of the English soldiers was one, when Hezekiah maintained that all the superiority of English soldiers arose from the exact order kept up in their armies, and not from any superior bravery.

In fine Mr. Smith, were I to tell you only a small part of my husband's singularities arising from his strange notions of order, I know not when I should have done.

Reading a little time ago in your paper of a certain manner of deciding a man's propensities, by elevations upon the bones of the head; I applied to a person who has some skill in this science, to point out to me which were the bumps of method. At night when Hezekiah was asleep, I put my fingers to the place pointed out to me, where the bump ought to be found, and I certainly did perceive an elevation so great, that I thought he had let one of the tea canisters fall on his head, but on application of my hand to the other side of the head, I found a protuberance equally great.

The result of this examination, greatly confirms the truth of the science of Craniology, and will cause me to bear with the absurdities of my husband, with more patience.

After all I can perceive that Hezekiah is more precise about the full and change of the moon. I therefore at such times put a little of Dr. Henry's calcined magnesia into his rice milk, as he always takes rice milk for his supper. At the time of the last new moon, he was still more particular than before. He went through the whole house and complained that every thing was in confusion. As he looked rather wild I asked if he was unwell, and he complained that he had a violent pain in his head. I thought a few leeches applied to his temples would relieve him, and after some persuasion obtained his consent to send for the woman to attend with ten or a dozen. The woman did not come immediately; and she had only just got the last leech to take hold when the clock struck ten. Hezekiah hearing the usual hour of repose announced, arose and insisted upon going to bed, though his temples were covered with leeches; and when we offered to restrain him, he declared that we were conspiring to break all the rule and method of his house. I at length succeeded in pacifying him, after much exertion, and I am happy to add that he has been much better since, and I hope this letter may have a good effect, and help to convince him that though method is good in its place, yet it is not the only, nor even the principal virtue.

I am, Sir, &c.

DIANA TREACLE.

REVIEW.

A Clear, Systematic View of the Evidences of Christianity. In addition to the important historic matter, and valuable dissertation, found in the most popular Evidences, the present volume contains a collateral digest of prophetic and historical evidence; a Scriptural view of the Godhead; and a summary of Mahometanism. With introductory observations on the popular causes of Infidelity. By JOSEPH MACARDY. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 222. London, 1823.

IT has pleased God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spoke in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, and who hath, in these last days, spoken unto us, by his Son, Jesus Christ, so to reveal himself in his Word, that salvation might be within the reach of all his intelligent creatures. Hence, without regard to mental capacity, dignity of station, or circumstances of birth, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," is addressed to all without distinction, as the condition of eternal life. The man who in simplicity, by faith, receives this doctrine in his heart, and suffers it to have its practical influence on his life and conduct, requires no other proof of the validity of God's Word, than the evidence of its power within him. But the testimony of such a man, and so arising, would go for nothing, in proving the authenticity of divine revelation, with one whose pride of intellect has taught him to consider no evidence valuable and irrefragable which does not demand, or which will not endure, the test of recon-dite investigation.

There is an obliquity in some minds which inclines them from the admission of any thing like a truism with as much aversion, as they might once have manifested towards a difficult problem; as if the flight of time was of less importance, or the certainty of death less awful, because the "tempus fugit" of the sun-dial, or the "all men must die" of the grave-stone, is in the mouth of every school boy. Does health, hope, happiness, money, power, or any other earthly good, lose either its value or its attraction, because of its common-place appreciation by the illiterate as well as the learned? Surely not. Then why should the word of life contained in the Holy Scriptures be slighted, merely because it abases the pride of intellect, and promises to the rich and the poor, equal blessings. It is sometimes an easy thing to despise the truisms of Christianity through life, but not unfrequently, when driven at last to engage in the vulgar, common-place affair of dying—then, has the stout unbeliever confessed the importance, and sought the consolation of those trite maxims—those soul-cheering truisms which the Word of God affords: and these instances, we believe, would be much more frequent, did not a dread of being seen in their last moments, induce many an infidel to skulk out of the world with a secrecy and meanness, more like a gaol breaking felon, than becoming the exit of a philosopher.

In the oracles of God, however, while the knowledge of salvation is so simple and obvious, and the joy of a believer, such as a stranger intermeddled not with;—yet there is in the HISTORICAL, PROPHETICAL, and ARGUMENTATIVE portions, a length, and depth, and breadth, and height of meaning, in which the highest human, as well as archangelic intellects may expatiate, and which is fairly open to the candid investigation of the rational philosopher. This, indeed, has generally been the debatable ground upon which the advocate for Christianity and his Infidel opponents have met: and perhaps it is the only ground upon which they can meet with any thing like fair and equal advantages. We say it not to the praise, but the shame of the Infidel, that to his attacks, Christianity is indebted for so many unanswered defences, and unanswerable defenders; and we sincerely rejoice at every accession to their number, how much soever we may lament the necessity which calls them forth.

Of the different treatises on the Evidences of Christianity, distinctly so denominated, or as collaterally affecting the argument, not a few have been written by learned laymen, whose vocations have not subjected them to the stale and blatant imputation of being interested advocates, to the number of these we feel great pleasure in adding the work of Mr. MACARDY.

The title-page, as quoted at the head of this article, contains a pretty fair exposé of the general contents of the work, the design of which is thus stated in the Introduction:—

"My object in the present work has been—1. To produce a summary of real, substantial, indisputable evidence; and, 2. by arrangement and moderate compression, to digest and exhibit it in a popular form; so as not to be unworthy the perusal of the more erudite, and affluent; and at the same time, not to tax unreasonably, the leisure, or pecuniary resources, of readers in general."

How far this object has been attained, it would be impossible to shew by any extracts which the limits and nature of our publication would admit. A peculiar, useful, and highly interesting, portion of the book, is that in which, "by arrangement and moderate compression," a great number of scripture predictions, and historical allusions are placed in juxtaposition, with the records of the evident completion of the one, and of the authority of profane authors for the use of the other. Thus the scripture testimony of the Messiah and his own predictions, are shewn to harmonize with facts, and synchronize with dates in the writings of persons, not to be suspected of wishing to promote their credibility.

Of clear and striking predictions from the Old Testament, concerning Jesus Christ, with parallel passages recording their fulfilment in the person of the Saviour, Mr. Macardy has selected 48, at the conclusion of which he observes—

"On merely glancing over these predictions, with their exact fulfilment in the Nature, Life, Death, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, we involuntarily exclaim—And are the Jews really in possession of this amazing, minute, and regular chain of prophecy! To which the reply must be, without reserve, or qualification.—They are. And we dare them to disclaim, or disprove, a single assertion. With their traditions and comments we have nothing to do; to the text of their Sacred Books alone, we adhere."

Amazing coincidence! the most cursory perusal of these predictions, with the recorded life of our Blessed Saviour, fills the mind with wonder, admiration, and gratitude! Truly the incomprehensible God has most graciously condescended to reveal his will to his creature man; and to confirm his communications in a most satisfactory manner! The Christian hesitates not to summon investigation, every external evidence of his religion is conclusive and incontestable; and the most extensive and profound research, but renders it more clear, and indubitable.

Imposture!—great indeed must be the subtlety of that impostor; who, whilst in the womb, watches the revolutions of empires, and appears exactly in the predicted season! Imposture!—wonderful indeed, must be that embryo sagacity, which, conscious of the expectation of the Jewish and Heathen world, bursts the fatal bands, and emerges in the wished-for moment! Imposture!—disinterested quality, why not still behold thee meek; patient; humane; studious of the comfort of those who revile thee; operating mercifully, and unobtrusively, on those who persecute thee; and from a peculiar profundity of grace, and wisdom, predicting events, yet remote, unanticipated, and improbable! Would men only undertake a rational investigation of the evidences of Christianity, these absurdities need not have been noticed.—They would soon see, that the most subtle, wealthy, powerful impostor, could so more adapt his own life, to the fulfilment of such a series of predictions, than he could predispose the minds of others, to jealousy, fear, confidence, attachment, revenge, and every other feeling necessary, on their part, to effectuate such various vicissitudes, and terminate in such a peculiar catastrophe. Even could wealth, and power, influence; and with subtlety, effect any coincidence; they are in themselves so negative, and generally disqualifying, that the imposture would be immediately detected.

In fact, the promised Messiah must have come into the world in the very place, at the precise time, and under exactly similar circumstances, as Jesus Christ, if the predictions of the Old Testament were to be fulfilled. His nature, birth, conversation, actions, sufferings, death, resurrection, appearance amongst his followers, and ascension into Heaven; His subsequent gift of the Holy Spirit, to enlighten, embolden, and support his disciples; with the economy of the present Gospel, as penned and received by them, are all indispensable, essential parts, of the glorious plan of Human Redemption."

The second book in Mr. Macardy's arrangement treats "of the truth of Christianity, on evidence from profane writers." These authorities are less interesting from their novelty than their intrinsic value. The celebrated letter from Pliny to Trajan, and the Emperor's no less celebrated rescript, with other testimonies, tend to shew that the Christians of those times were not bad subjects of the state, and that some of the measures against them were taken less from a conviction of their necessity, than from a desire to satisfy the people. Trajan, after commending the manner in which Pliny had proceeded against the Christians, says, "These people are not to be sought for: but if they be accused, and convicted, they are to be punished, but with this caution, that he who denies himself to be a Christian, and makes it plain that he is not as by supplicating our gods, although he had been so formerly, may be allowed pardon upon his repentance. As for libels sent without an author, they ought to have no place in any accusation whatever, for that would be a thing of very ill example, and not agreeable to my reign." To a similar purport writes Adrian, only with more express reference to malicious informers—"If then any one shall accuse, and make out any thing contrary to the laws, do you determine according to the nature of the crime: but, by Hercules, if the charge be only a calumny, do you take care to punish the author of it with the severity it deserves." Indeed, Adrian as well as Severus, both designed, according to historians, to have built a temple for Christ, and to have received him among the gods.

A brief and satisfactory abstract of the objections of Celsus and Porphyry, the former an Epicurean, and the latter a Pythagorean philosopher, will be found interesting and instructive, especially to those persons who may not have access to more ample extracts from these writers. They exhibit in their objections, all the flippant quibbles, as well as all the bitterness of the enemies of the cross of Christ in our own times. They often, indeed, display a knowledge of the Scriptures, to which the shallow antichristian jesters among us, have often very slight pretensions. It appears, as our author justly observes,—

"That the Old and New Testament scriptures were as critically scrutinized by Porphyry, as by Celsus: And that both exercised their entire learning and ingenuity to bring them into contempt. Both were philosophers of great reputation with the heathen world, and possessed all the advantages to be derived from a life devoted to philosophic subtlety, and historical research. But, how far have they succeeded? No doubt their talents and arguments appeared formidable in their day, to many; but, when compared with the animating truths, and substantial virtues of the Gospel, they dwindle into obscurity, and perish in early oblivion."

Some account of the celebrated Julian, usually denominated "the apostate," follows, which, interesting as it is, we must pass over. This personage has recently become an object of interest with the poetical public, in consequence of the publication of Sir Aubrey de Vere

Hunt's noble dramatic poem, which is founded on the chief incidents in the Emperor's life.

The fourth book is devoted to "A scripture view of the Godhead;" in which that tremendously important subject is treated, in what the author deems "the only safe and reasonable manner;" that is, by adducing the parallel tests of scripture on the point, in connection; and thereby exhibiting the literal evidence of the holy word. All consecutive reasoning is abandoned, and the argument is left to its own weight on the mind of the sincere inquirer; and it is the author's opinion, that, from "the divine records carefully and judiciously compared, the DIVINITY OF CHRIST, will be found an essential doctrine,—an integral part of Divine Revelation." So we think; and we would recommend to any person whose mind may be wavering on this subject, a careful and serious examination of Mr. Macardy's statement.

While, however, we are well aware how much the "damning ingenuity,—the contemptible pride,—and the invincible prejudice" of creed-makers have tended to bring into disrepute, this as well as some other doctrines; nevertheless, while we would deprecate every attempt of imposing as infallible, dogmas and figments of human opinion, as comprehending that which is essentially incomprehensible, yet we do think it is highly expedient such a consistency in words, should be given to the doctrines held and professed in every religious community, that not only the members themselves may have distinct notions of their own belief, but that others also, to whom the fact is material, may be assured of their orthodoxy. The Quakers, it is well known, have generally been inimical to human expositions of tenets commonly held by Christians—especially the Athanasian definition of the Trinity; in consequence of this, the Unitarians have tacitly considered them as merging in their opinions. Their professed dependance upon the influences of the Holy Spirit was proof enough to the contrary. We are glad, however, to see that an intelligent member of this highly respectable community has recently exculpated them from the above implication, by a satisfactory avowal of the opinion of Friends, that they hold, in common with other Christians, the great doctrine of the atonement.

In reference to the above important doctrine, it is justly observed by Mr. Macardy, that the Arian heresy, which raged among the Eastern Christians, finally merged in the Mahometan imposture: and we know that Jews and Moslems are held by Socinians as holding doctrines less repugnant to the truth, than the polytheistical and idolatrous heathens; hence they argue, that whenever the outcasts of Israel and the followers of the Meccan Prophet, shall be converted, it is much more likely to be to Unitarianism, than to the faith of Trinitarians. Even if this supposition was unquestionable, it would by no means follow that they had become Christians:—

"I have abandoned the usual track," says our author in his Introduction, "and designedly treated the Jews with appropriate animadversion. I readily grant that the present generation cannot be called the murderers of the human nature of the Messiah; but, behold their general spirit—their obstinacy—their averseness to inquiry—their determination to retain the badge of ignorance and perfidy, that has so long adhered to them! If we must sympathize, let us extend our charity to the unenlightened Heathen—to those who are in Nature's darkness—who most anxiously look for a Divine Revelation—who are contending for intelligence with invincible difficulties—who have never despised their supreme benefactor; nor proved themselves the most interested, obstinate, inhuman of men! I shall never advocate persecution; it is revolting to all the feelings of my soul: but, I would expose the obstinately malevolent to general execration; and, should they still persist in offensive practices, I would consign them to posterity with an indelible brand of merited infamy. This remark I apply more to the pestiferous infidels of the day, than to the infatuated Jews;—in whom, I behold a people wholly abandoned to themselves—to their own perverse, inflexible passions. The divine radiance that occasionally gleams across the human mind is withheld, and they wander as sheep without a shepherd—as creatures uninfluenced by the Creator."

With the good disposition manifested towards the heathen, we cordially agree; while we think the Jews deserve the pity and sympathy, as well as the animadversions of Christians: and it is well known to be an unsettled point between good men, whether the Jews shall be first converted, and become the evangelizers of the world, or whether they will be left without, until the fulness of the salvation of the Gentiles has taken place.* The operations of the society for promoting the conversion of the Jews, with which the venerable Mr. Simeon is connected, have been the subject of much ill-judged banter; but this, it will be perceived, has been from those quarters, where almost any thing that is evangelical is similarly treated.

From the foregoing notice, and extracts, from a work, the very nature of which precludes our selection of those parts which are the most interesting, we are persuaded that many persons will be induced for themselves to peruse a book, which we can most cordially recommend. There is an anecdotal attraction in the arrangement of the matter, which will secure a perusal of the whole by almost any reader of ordinary religious inquisitiveness.

H.

* A perfect recollection of Mr. Macardy's sentiments on this point enables us to refer to that part of the 'View' which embraces it; on treating of the objection, 'That the diffusion of the Gospel is comparatively limited,' He says:—"What are a few centuries compared with the duration of the universe?—A few generations, with doctrines, the duration of which is to co-exist with the globe itself! The Supreme Governor deals not rigorously with the unenlightened—he will not exact unjustly. The evidence of Christianity strengthens daily, and becomes more evident—more universal. When it shall please him, he will call new missionaries into action, those who are now dispersed throughout all nations, and amongst all people. He will convince the Sauts, that it is hard to contend against omnipotence—he will dispel their infatuation—send them forth to declare their own obstinacy and guilt—to expose and illustrate their own prophetic records—and to manifest a zeal for the diffusion of evangelical truth, righteousness, and concord, equal to that of their illustrious kinsman—equal to their present stupidity and perverseness! What idolatry—what imposture, shall be able to withstand so formidable an attack? Or what part of the habitable earth can escape the multifarious movement? This is undoubtedly their destiny; and while they seem to pursue the devious wanderings of their own disordered fancy, and to prove 'an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word, among all nations,' (1 Deut. xviii. 37) they are placing themselves as lights to illuminate, and evangelize all the descendants of Adam!"—Book v. ch. ii. sec. vi.—Ed.

WRITTEN ON HEARING OF THE DEATH OF CANOVA, THE SCULPTOR.

Canova is dead!—and the hand that hath wrought

Such Promethean wonders is nerveless and cold;
And the mind once so pregnant with beautiful thought,
No more shall those visions of beauty unfold.

His eye and his hand were creation to form,
Which, developed in marble, shall bear his proud name,
Through the conflicts of empires, o'er anarchy's storms,
To the records of art in the Temple of Fame.

For tasteless, ungifted, cold, dumb, and alone,
His heart, who can gaze without feeling's wild strife
On figures, smote, as by enchantment, from stones,
Into all but the warmth and the motion of life.

And what, though the captious would wither the bloom
Of his fair reputation with slanderous breath,
Yet the pilgrims of genius shall honour his tomb,
And rescue his name from oblivion and death.

Had he lived in an age when the Roman was free,
Ere the tyrant or priest placed their feet on his neck;
Ere a race, sprung like Jung from Liberty's tree,
Saw their history a dream, and their grandeur a wreck;—

Then haply with names blasphem'd high had he soar'd,
For whom his green chaplets Antiquity twined;
Whose temples and friezes have more been adored
Than e'en the divinities which they enshrined.

But the past so enchanting, how vague is the theme!
As the sculpture, when broke, is a fashionless block;
And the statue, how'er a Colossus we deem,
Is a statue of time in eternity's rock.

Canova is dead! and let Italy sigh
O'er the artist—the last of her high-boasted names;
"Canova is dead!"—No, he never shall die!
Each work of his chisel in triumph exclaims,

THE ROMAUNT OF LLEWELLYN;

CANTO I.—PART IV.

LXIX.

And THOU, whose bright dark eye perchance may see,
Perchance may read, this lay of tender pine;—
Oh, my sweet friend!—bowbe disdainfully
That word thou hear, yet am I friend of thine!
Thyself did yield that name, dear lady mine;—
And we were friends!—And, spite of all that's past,
Friends are we still,—and shall be to the fine
Of this poor life;—though many a bitter blast,
May blow on thee or me, and many a cloud o'ercast

LXX.

The sunshine of our days.—Yet, come whate'er
Fortune may please, or providence, to send;—
Blow, on my life's frail bark, or foul or fair,—
Nathless, I shall be to the last thy friend!
And many a soul-breathed prayer to heaven I send
That thou mayst never know such agonies,—
Mayst never feel such griefs, as oft-time rend
Mine heart, and sink my soul,—giving sad sighs
To my perturbed breast, and hot tears to mine eyes.

LXXI.

Forgive me, my sweet friend, I do beseech thee,
For that, unwitting, I have caused thee pain;—
Suffice it, that my present pangs shall teach me
The awe which trembles lest I wound again!
Never to err, no mortal may attain;—
But, to forgive is aye an angels part;—
Then may I seek forgiveness not in vain;
An erring mortal I:—while thou still art
No less than angel in thy kind, forgiving heart!

LXXII.

And if, as it may be, thine eyes peruse
This page tear blotted, at such hour of night
As reigneth now,—then mayst thou not refuse
The tribute of a sigh to what I write:—
Yea, tears may flow, no flow without delight!
Sighs sweetly breathed from breast so fair and pure!
Tears silently ydropt from een so bright!—
Ah me,—how well appaid all I endure!
That blessed balm could well each festering heartwound cure!

LXXIII.

They tell me, that the hand of malady
Hath somewhat blanch'd thy cheek,—the ruby ta'en
Some deal from thy sweet lip,—and given thine ee
A softer fire!—Ah, soon may every pain
Depart,—and health and peace return again
To soul and eye, and lip, and cheek, and brow!
For, I did weep to think upon the wane
Of health in thee, heart's mistress mine;—and now
The thought agen doth bid most bitter tears to flow!

LXXIV.

And yet, if thou should die,—and hope with thee,—
Nay, saw I thee in shroud and oaken chest,—
No idle tears should tremble in mine ee,—
By no vain sighs were agonie confest!
For poor I deem the woe, that is express
By sighs and tears!—the heart that deeply feels,—
In the which despair her derne abode hath drest,—
Will burst or e'er one groan, one tear reveals
The sacred, silent, searing sorrow it conceals!

LXXV.

Nor now would I profane thy much-loved name,
Ne idly breathe it to the mocker's ear;—
For, though thou reckless be, or much me blame,
The world at least, I trow, shall never fear.—
Thy haughte disdain,—but not the unfeeling sneer
Of weetless wights,—I bear as best I may!
For well,—too well,—I wote of jest and jeer,—
The taunt of insolence,—and, worse than they,
Falsehood, which can itself like sympathye array?

LXXVI.

For, 'tis of olden time the worldlings' way,
To mark the eye that speaks the inward gloom,—
Even as the tigress couches for her prey;—
And, when they deem they have an abject, whom
They safely may o'erbear,—even such they doom
To scorn and scoffs of most injurious kind;—
And many a gentle wight hath ample room
To rue that e'er the feeling of his mind
Pierced the concealing screen it should have kept behind.

LXXVII.

Low in my bosom, then, for ever dwell
The tender, deep-hid secret of mine heart;—
(Nor ever leave its sad and silent cell.)—
How much I loved, and how unkind thou wert!
For little would it boot me to impart
How thou didst change, unmindful of thy vow;—
And if, in pride's despite, there sometimes start
A solitary teare,—or, on my brow,
Some while sit anguish brooding,—or the hectic glow,

LXXVIII.

For one brief moment, on my cheek;—yet soon
The ruffled brow I smoothen, and I check
The tear,—and then 'tis past!—As o'er the moon
Fleet the swift clouds, nor leave behind a speck;
Even so, at such a time, athwart my cheek
Flit the dark shadows of the thoughts below,
And hastily are gone!—And then I deck
My face in feigned smiles, and show as though
This heart a stranger were to long, life-wearing woe!

LXXIX.

Yet, when departed is the heartless crowd,—
Then, for feign'd joy doth real woe atone;—
Then come convulsive throbs, and singults loud,
The gush of anguish, misery's mutter'd moan,
The tear unseem, the sigh unheard, the groan
That bursts in secret from long-pent-up grief,
Which waited but the moment when alone,
To break its barrier for a season brief,
Lest the full heart should brast for lack of this relief.

LXXX.

EMELIE;—there is torture in the name!
EMELIE;—there is madness in the thought!
Madness and love are feelings much the same,
When hopeless passion hath the brain o'erwrought,
And the soul to waste and desolation brought
By over-musing;—even as life and light
Were wellnigh quench'd for aye, and nothing mote
Agen avail the sorrow-stricken sprite,—
But all were sunken now in ever-during night!

LXXXI.

Yes;—I have mused on thee until I brought Madness wellnigh to the o'erlabour'd brain;—
And when I would untwist the thread of thought
And throw away what was of thee,—'twas vain!
So closely twined in every varied skein,—
So with each chain of feeling linkt thou art,—
That, long as life and thought to me remain,
Or one fond wish inhabits in this heart,—
Of them for evermore thy memory shall be part!

LXXXII.

What, though thou art now but as a once-dreamt dream!
A vanish'd vision!—a lost angel-form!—
Still to fond fancy's eye thy glories gleam
Upon me,—even as when they first did warm
My breast with purest passion, and alarm
My soul with hopes and fears till then unknown!
For, though I erst had sigh'd at beauty's charm,
And somewhat own'd its power,—I've bow'd to none,
Save her, whose thrall I am, till life and all are gone!

LXXXIII.

When first we met, enraptured beyond measure,
Deeply enamour'd, hoping, fearing, sighing,—
The thought of thee was as a secret treasure,
Deep-hid within my breast!—Now hope's a-dying,— Athwart my heaven of joy dark clouds are flying,—
And all around the gathering tempest lowers;—
To distant thunders mutter'd groans replying,
A horrible discord wild anguish pours,—
And grief unspeakable this hopeless heart devours.

LXXXIV.

For there hath been a struggle, a wild war
The pride of man and deep-felt love between!
'Tis hard to say, or e'er we've tried, how far
The haughtiest heart will bear from scornful een!
Yet do I hate thee not;—though I have been
The victim of thy fleeting smiles, and known
What 'twas to bask in love's delightful sheen,—
Then far away, like some base thing, be thrown,
As if I ne'er had call'd one smile of thine mine own!

LXXXV.

Enough!—It was a dream, and it is gone!
And though, what time thou didst my suit repel,
Some deal too harshly thou hast dealt with one,
Whose only crime hath been, he loved too well,—

Still must I on the dear delusion dwell,—
Still hold thy loved idea to my soul!—
There shall it lie, the inmate of a cell
Deep, dark, and silent!—It shall be the sole Delight I have in life, while years on years shall roll!

LXXXVI.

And now, haught empress of my mind, awhile
I bid farewell!—It may be that we meet
In peace as erst; and thou agen mayst smile
In kindness,—bidding this poor heart to beat
In dolour deep no more.—And, well I weat,
Hope is the staff that I must walk withal!
Take life sooner than take what makes life sweet;—
Here is a heart that death mote ne'er appal,
So be I die thy liege, and own accepted thrall!

THE WEARIED BACHELOR.

Sitting a few evenings since, with my feet cased in a pair of woollen slippers, and rested on a polished fender, whilst my arms were extended over those of an easy chair, to take in as much warmth as possible from the blazing fire,
I was aroused from a deep rumination by the friendly salute of "good night," as my antique housekeeper retired, at her usual early hour; which, with a like return from her fellow-servant, threw me into a very different train of thought to what occupied me a few moments before. And who would be a bachelor? exclaimed I to myself, to sit the lonely nights away moping like a pelican of the wilderness, without a fellow-mortal to join in the social comforts of life!—But, such being my lot, I wished to be resigned; yet, the more I endeavoured to console and to reason myself into reason, I only grew the more intemperate and out of humour. In vain I tried to allay my rising passion in the new novel "The Entail," not even the ludicrous description of the Lairds first visit to Guzy Hipel, at the Plealands, moved a muscle of my face; but as I waded further in the volume, I grew still more peevish, and at last threw down the book just as the clock struck nine.

At that moment the door opened, and Jenny brought in the tray, hid by the folds of a snow-white napkin, upon which was laid a dish of oysters prepared for my supper. Such punctuality and cleanliness, would, at any other time, have made me exclaim in favour of a single life; but, now my regret was, that I had no partner to share the grateful meal, or press another fish upon me!

Whilst commencing my repast, with but a slender appetite, my friend Goodwill was announced—"He had taken the liberty of calling," as he said, "at that unseasonable hour, to inform me of the marriage of an intimate acquaintance."—Could any thing have been more unfortunate! At the exact moment I had so composed myself as to begin supper, to be thus thrown, as it were, on the very shoal from which I so narrowly escaped!

Plainly seeing the vexation his news occasioned, he unmercifully rallied me on my "dreary, uncomfortable lot." Jenny having brought an additional plate, knife, and fork, for Goodwill, with as much alacrity as if he had been originally expected, and being in no humour to take a joke, or retort upon my friend,
I went on with my meal as sullenly as the most determined solitaire.

By degrees our conversation improved; and anecdote followed anecdote,* to the amusement

* The following anecdote of the late G. Cooke, was related amongst others; and which, if true, reflects much credit upon the hero of "the sock and buskin."

of both; many were certainly of the Saturnine order, and not a few bordered something on Munchausen's marvellous. Nevertheless, with the assistance of a little aqua vitae, the tedium of the evening was happily beguiled.

Thus a few hours were rescued from painful cogitation; but, my friend had no sooner departed than the gloom and pangs of bachelorship again oppressed and distracted my soul! After a momentary pause, I involuntarily exclaimed,—I must and shall marry! Matrimonial scenes are represented to my mind's eye in such delightful perspective!—so sweet—so sociable—so fascinating! Why should I procrastinate? Why defer the realization of that tranquillity and enjoyment which invariably arise from cultivated minds in hymenean association? Nay, my affections are already fixed; the subject already introduced; importunity alone necessary! I believe Selina loves me; the embarrassment perceptible in her indifference expresses much; I'll address her,—declare the intensity of my passion,—and have my proposal accepted, or obtain a decision, and select elsewhere!

MY DEAR SELINA,

How cruel your indifference; how distracting your procrastination. To Maids and Bachelors the days of youth are fleeting; the prime of life dangerous; and lonely old age dreadful!

No, this will never do!—prose is dull, cloying, does not at all convey the tender passion—love! The muse is sprightly, prepossessing, unfettered; O for a Castalian draught, to assail my wily fair one with parnassian energy!

O be kind—my charming fair!—
Tease me not with vain pretence;
Try and prove my plighted care,
Love how pure, and how intense!
Love and truth like mine will stand,
Ev'ry test that you command.

Sweet, how sweet, it is to prove Kindred happy!—Friends sincere!
Still more sweet is hallow'd love,
Verging to the silv'ry hair;
Midst a group affection true—
Offspring of the waning two!

Mark the weak, old, fearful maid!—
See the bach'lor grey with crime!—
Lonely and unwept they fade,—
Blotted from the scroll of time!—
Strangers hir'd their limbs to turn;
None the dirge of death to mourn!

Come then come, Selina fair!—
Tease no more with vain pretence;
Trust and prove my plighted care,—
Love how lasting, pure, intense!
Let us at the altar meet,
And our earthly bliss complete!

and deserves narrating were it only merely to shew that, amidst all his follies, extravagances, and imperfections, the sparks of generosity were occasionally kindled in his bosom:—

When he was in Liverpool some years since, and had to perform the character of Richard, he was no where to be found: the hour arrived for the curtain to rise, but no Cooke made his appearance, to the great dismay of the managers, who in vain sent scouts in every direction to obtain some tidings of this erratic being.—Fortune, however, led one of the actors, on his way to the theatre, through White-Chapel, where, to his astonishment, he perceived the hero in a pawnbroker's shop! The manager, on receiving this information, immediately repaired to the spot, and found Cooke lying on one of the shelves ticketed, nor would he stir until the sum for which he had pledged himself was discharged! He afterwards told, that, being on his road to the theatre, at the time a distress was levying upon a poor tenant whose appearance affected him, he took the bailiffs with him to a pawnbroker, and actually pawned himself for twenty pounds, the amount of the debt!

DINNER ENGAGEMENTS.

I have at this moment (Jan. 27, 1823) three dinner engagements for next week, and one for the week after; all fairly engraved, with the blanks filled up, (in the office phrase) arranged on my library mantelpiece, and staring me in the face for one half of the day. The frequent sight of them has begotten very odd, and (what will appear very ungrateful) even cynical reflections; which, however, being of a mixed nature, may amuse during this season of festivity:—when dinner invitations are flying about on all sides, like the snow which has lately feathered the earth with white.

Sincerely speaking, then, I hardly ever accept of a dinner invitation, especially if it be on a partly-engraved card, without some little dash of capriciousness in my feelings—and I will tell you why.—In the first place, I know it will be a formal affair: in the second place, I know it will be an expensive affair; and in the third place, I am almost as certain that it will be a comfortless affair. However, to set aside hypothesis and speak of facts. The day arrives. I dress—

Pray call a coach, and let a coach be called.

I arrive at the porch of mine host precisely one half hour after the time specified—which proves my thorough good breeding.—I mount, am announced, bend both head and body* in my salutations to the host and hostess; sit down, say not a word—all being silent—look at the fire, unfurl my cambric banner, (alias, handkerchief) make a gentle nasal sound in consequence, return the said handkerchief into my pocket, look round, now at the portrait of the mistress of the house over the fire place, and again at the fire—balance my legs in a pretty crossed attitude, and cover my knees or lap with my hat. Another half hour 'moves slowly on'—in spite of sundry knocks and sundry arrivals—and at length DINNER IS ANNOUNCED.

What a sound to the gourmand and epicure! To me, alas, a sound of no particular gratification!—for I see clearly what is to follow. The mistress approaches me—'be pleased to hand down Mrs. .' I obey: what a melancholy procession! We move slowly down stairs, 'as hush' as if it were a soldier's funeral. And here, Mr. Editor, I shall take leave to mention a very glaring and a very general error, which prevails, I think, on most occasions, but which, I submit, should be corrected forthwith. It is this: that the master of the house leads the way by taking the lady of the most consequence under his arm; and, on reaching the dinner room, instead of seating her by herself, either on the right or left, bids her walk up to the top of the table. In consequence, the whole arrangement is marred. It is like clubbing a regiment. Instead of attending, like a faithful knight, the damosell entrusted to your care, you are obliged to take up a different position. The mistress of the house graciously calls you towards her—and you come, in consequence, in contact with the lady first led down. Now this is confounding the principles of all social order: of all faithful attachments; and incipient whispers, just bordering as it were, on sonorous declarations, are hence suppressed at the very onset.

However, we are all about to be seated—and,

* Note especial. The pink of fashion, in a bow, or salutation, is only a nod—a sudden drop or bob of the head—as if, in the case of children's toys, it were occasioned by pulling a secret wire. It is literally, now,
'All nodding, nid, 'nid, nodding,' &c.

fortunately, GRACE† is said. Every cover is contemplated with the greedy eye of hope; for I find that there is just about the same stimulus in the first coup d'œil of a dinner, as there is in the taking up of a hand at whist. We hope, in the former, to see plenty of ragouts, stews, and well-tickled-up dishes—in the latter, plenty of trumps, and leading kings and queens. However, the servants deploy—the covers are removed—and the prospect 'stands confessed.' But scarcely an ejaculation, a compliment, an encouragement to do justice to the liberality of your host, ensues—as,

Que ça est bon, ah, goûtez ça!

No: nothing of the kind. The mulligatawny soup smokes—the fish breaks in flakes:—they begin to challenge. To challenge!—good heavens, what sort of challenging is this!—What eye sparkles—what bosom burns—what weapon is drawn! In other words, there is a whisper here, and a nod there, and an elevated arm in a third place, as indications of a wish to drink wine with a lady. The dame consents. The challenge is accepted. What frigidity, formality, and folly!—and, then, the little wine that covers the bottom of the lady's glass, is to furnish the means of acceptance of all challenges, through a succession of attacks. You may fight a father, son, uncle, nephew, cousin, and son-in-law with such a simple weapon. But the dinner goes on—and, at last, goes off. A soft, or a gruff voice just lets us know that ten words have been said for grace: and now, you would think the parties would begin to unbend; to show how the pheasants, and partridges, and woodcocks, and teal, had contributed to set their good humor afloat. But no: it is all rigid frost and ice, like the Serpentine at this moment, the surface of convivial gaiety is frozen. And then, what—in my opinion—greatly contributed to these icy sensations, is, the keeping the cloth on the table. Why, Sir, you fancy yourself at a repast on the summit of the Shreckherhorn, or Wetterhorn. An expanse of snow is before you; and the eyes of the mistress are kept sedulously fixed on it, lest some unhallowed drop of port or claret should sully its virgin purity. Away with all this silly and sickly affectation. Give us again, Mr. Editor, the brown, glossy, warm, harmonizing tint of the well-rubbed mahogany table. Let us have no frigid and formal covering of a table-cloth, after the viands have taken their departure. I attribute half of the quizzical formality in parties to the retention of that damask sur-tout. Neither host nor hostess is aware of the unbecoming background to the dessert which the cloth affords. Did Van Huysum, or De Heem, ever paint their fruits on a white background? I trow, not.

And now comes one of the most grievous parts of my tale: one of the most melancholy portions of my meditations. Just, peradventure, as the conversation is beginning to circulate with the wine, just as a fair neighbour vouchsafes to sever her lips, and put her life into her eyes, by kindred discourse, the mistress addresses her female guests with 'would you like another glass of wine (knowing she would not, and wishing her not to take it) or a slice of cake? And then—on receiving the negative on all sides—she bends forwards, the chair recedes, she rises—and with her the female guests—and, away they go, to play the game of mum chance, in a desolate drawing room, till the gentlemen 'come up.'

† I cannot but observe, and lament in observing, the too general omission of this decent and imperative ceremony. But, more especially, when said, should it be attended to. Not even its general breve can always secure it from the indecent interruption of some magpie chatterer.

'They order these things better in France.' Ladies and gentlemen make more of a heart and soul affair in their dinner symposium—and retire usually together—never suffering the current of good humour to freeze by the unnatural separation of an hour and three quarters.

I know not, however, whether the very worst part of the business is not yet to follow. Nobody DRINKS WINE—(all attributable to the snowy ground on which the bottles move to and fro!) Nobody touches and eulogizes your port or your claret. In vain has Carbonell furnished the former, and Barnes the latter. In vain have the labelled pedigree been suspended over your bin, or the fruits of your enterprise and courage at the sale of an ambassador's cellar, been treasured up in your subterranean retreats! Nobody drinks wine. 'Tis the fashion. In vain have Anacreon and Horace written in choicest verse—'Nunc est bibendum.'—There is no eye to read, and no heart to feel, the beauty of the verse, or the soundness of the doctrine. All is now grave, and silent, and oft-times sullen. English hospitality is sadly changed. I augur dreadful results from this unnatural and morbid state of things: and predict, that those Pindar-ees, who delight and revel in water, will be called on one day to pay dearly for their heresies and abominations. They may safely reckon on being haunted by the ghost of Capt. Morris.

Sir, I am no advocate for vinous potations which end in uproar and temporary insanity; but I am an advocate for all those social and innocuous indulgences which blend heart with heart more closely, and diffuse one general and joyous emotion amidst rational and well-educated society; and, as an old soldier, will prove, at the point of the bayonet, that a pint of port, or of claret, (I always drink the former, especially if it be one month above seven years old) can hurt no man; but, on the contrary, will send him up stairs into the drawing-room a more amusing guest, and a more welcome companion. One of the most virtuous female hearts and fascinating forms ever won, was won by a gentleman of the cloth, in consequence of his exquisite repetition of some verses of Cowper, which his memory and his voice, refreshed and strengthened by six moderate glasses of wine,* enabled him to go through with an irresistible effect. But there was then no table-cloth left, after the dinner had disappeared!

To conclude—I am of opinion that FORMAL DINNERS, so called, are dreadful taxes on your time and your patience. Parties are too often very strangely shuffled together. A is not introduced to B, nor B to C—and so the thing is understood, and felt, from the top to the bottom of the table. Beauty does not smile with the fair, nor wisdom develope itself with the brown, sex. All is dull, cold, and suspicious. And when a feeling breast (which I am sadly inclined to believe mine is) begins to think of the expense, toil, and previous fatigue of the scene before one, it is really distressing. But we must not cut our connexions—only let them 'cut' such an unnatural state of things.

As a contrast to the foregoing, what happiness do I anticipate in the dinner of next Wednesday, with my neighbour and friend Mr. Lightfoot!

You shall have (says his note) no garnished dishes; mere mutton, unemblazoned even with currant jelly. And if I ask a friend or two to meet you, remember, that if we are more numerous than the Graces, we shall be more limited than the muses in number. So, come—and bring your best looks, best spirits, and best appetite with you.

* To the best of my recollection it was claret.

P. S.—The bin, No. 99, shall be invaded; and your favourite port, bottled in the year of the comet,† shall parade in front of you. Do with it as you list. A rubber of long whist,‡ and two sweet warbled duets at the least, shall crown the drawing-room recreations.

I received—read—and shall obey.

PALL-MALL-IENTIS.

CRITICISM.

ORTHOGRAPHY.—(No. V.)

BY S. X.

"Every deviation from correct and established modes of spelling, should be studiously avoided. If the multitude spell wrong, (and the conceited and the illiterate are sure to err,) we are not to follow them in that which is false or erroneous, any more than in that which is evil. In doubtful or ambiguous words, some allowances may be made; but, unquestionably, where there is only one right way, it is always best to adhere to that invariably. ANON.

Wrong.

47. Auctionier—

48. Bile—

The word, thus spelled, means a liquor, separated in the liver, and collected in the gall-bladder. Bile, in fact, is only another word for gall.

Right.

Auctioneer—

Boil—

An angry swelling.

The latter spelling is that which uniformly and invariably occurs in the Bible, and ought, perhaps, on that account to be implicitly followed. Dr. Johnson, indeed, writes the word, bile, which is one instance, out of many that occur, in which the peculiar, and sometimes very singular, orthography of the Doctor has been most decidedly rejected. See the words, Wagon, Auctionier, Despatch, Expense, Ensure, Electary, Visiter, &c.

49. Canvas—

Canvass—

The word canvass signifies a sieve, or straining cloth, being generally made of canvass. Hence a canvass means the act of sifting voices, previous to the final and decisive act of voting. And this enables the different candidates to form some opinion how the matter is likely to terminate.

50. Descendent—

Descendant, a noun substantive, meaning offspring.

51. Descendant—

Descendent, an adjective, coming down.

Respecting this word, Dr. Johnson says, it seems to be established, that the substantive should derive the termination from the French, descendant, and the adjective, from the Latin, descendens. A similar distinction seems to be made in the words dependant, one who is in the power of, or dependent upon, another; and dependent, the adjective, hanging down. But, Dr. Johnson adds, these and many other words of like termination, are written with ent or ant, as they are supposed to flow from the Latin or the French.

52. Expense—

Expence, like Defence, Licence, &c.

The word, licence, when a noun substantive, is generally written with a c, and when a verb, with an s. Dr. Johnson gives it only with an s; though, out of nine authorities which he quotes in his Dictionary there is but one in favour of that mode of spelling the word. In this instance, Mr. Todd has not altered the orthography of the different writers; one authority, exemplifying the third meaning of the word, is from a passage in the New Testament, Acts xxv. 16. Of expence, it may be remarked, our old authors always wrote it expence, and in the plural, expences, which has, perhaps, a more legitimate appearance than expenses. Defence, offence, and many similar words are invariably written with a c, and are, of course, made plural by the addition of an s. In all these examples, the derivative adjectives are formed by changing the c into s; as expensive, defensive, offensive, &c. The word defence, though it is derived from the Latin, defensus, is nevertheless always spelled with a c. Now the word suspense, from the Latin, suspensus, is as invariably written with an s. Such irregularities as these, it must be allowed, occasion no small embarrassment to learners, as custom seems to prevail against analogy, and without any assignable or satisfactory reason for the variation which prevails in the mode of spelling different words which are of similar derivation.

53. Faulter—

Falter—

This word is erroneously printed in the Gentleman's Magazine, for January, 1820, in the Obituary of the late Edward Downes, esquire; though in the original MS. copy of the art. alluded to, which was transmitted to the Editor of that Work, the word was correctly spelled, falter. Either the Editor, or his Reader, it appears, was unacquainted with the true spelling of this word, and substituted falter in lieu of it.

54. Spight—

Spite—

55. Visiter—

Visitor—

56. Wagon—

Waggon—

This very common word is spelled in Johnson's Dictionary with only one g; which is at variance not only with all the authorities he has quoted, but is, in fact, contrary also to general practice. He adds, however, that, although wagon is more conformable to the etymology; yet that waggon is the prevailing form. Notwithstanding this admission on the part of Dr. Johnson, Dr. Mant, in his Family Bible, has adopted the former spelling, with one g; which is not only contrary to the prevailing form, but it is, at the same time, different from every preceding edition of the Bible, whether printed at Oxford or at Cambridge. It were to be desired, indeed, that the Bible should be, in all respects, what LOCKE has predicated of it, according to a much higher acceptance than that of correct orthography,—"truth, without any mixture of error."

LOVE AND REASON.

At a wedding that happen'd, I cannot tell where,
Too remote, or the time or the place to recall
The selectest of guests were assembled, and there
LOVE and REASON were partners, and open'd the ball!

They mix'd in the frolic and mirth of the hour,
In the feast, in the jest, in the loud swelling chorus;
REASON never was known so engaging before,
Nor the little blind Urchin so strictly decorous.

Said LOVE, while his partner led on to her place,
"Really, Ma'am, you have charms that are very uncommon,
"Your movements are formed of precision and grace,—
"I declare you're a mighty good sort of a woman;

"You teach me the figure, and keep me in tane;
"I own I am subject to hurry a little,
"Nor to wait for the time, and to tire myself soon;
"But with you I am sure to be right to a tittle.

"What a pity it were that we ever should sunder;
"One wedding, they say, seldom fails to make two;
"Let us be, of the world, both the envy and wonder,
"Yield, sweet REASON, to LOVE, so shall LOVE yield to you."

"If ever we sever," the Lady replied
With a blush, "gentle Sir, it shall not be my fault;
"You are blind, young, and giddy,—ere I be a bride,
"You must sign me a bond to be led and be taught;

"Your wings must be clapt, and your quiver resign'd,
"Without me you never must venture to aim;
"I'll direct the keen arrow fit subjects to find,
"So shall LOVE never know, or repentance, or blame."

"Cupid led—Cupid pinion'd!" cried LOVE in a rage,
"Tis what Venus herself ne'er allowed to do;
"Shall I, that hold monarchs like birds in a cage,
"Be shackled myself by an ugly old shrew?

"You are mad to propose it!"—"And you, Sir, are rude," Return'd the mild Goddess, unalter'd her brow;
"If the views of all lovers were well understood,
"Disappointment would not be so frequent as now.

"You know, Sir, my terms," she concluded and bow'd,
"It is not my fault if we do not agree!"
"But I say, Ma'am, it is," cried LOVE a very loud,
"I call all to witness, 'twas you refus'd me."

In vain REASON argued;—with passion transported,
LOVE rav'd, wept, and lastly flew off in a pet;
And e'er since that time, it is strongly reported,
That the parties thus severing never have met.

Annual Means, &c.	29.77					41.48	136	51.9					36.290	227

The mean annual temperature of the past year, is 51° 9; the mean of the first three months 44° 2; second, 57° 6; third, 59° 5; fourth, 46° 1; of the six winter months, 45° 1; six summer months 58° 6. The maximum, or hottest state of the year, was 85°, which occurred on the 5th of June; the minimum or coldest state, was 24°, this happened on the 16th of December; making an annual variation of 61°.

The annual mean of the barometer, is twenty-nine inches, and seventy-seven hundredths; highest 30.54, which was on the 27th of February; lowest 28.40, which occurred on the 5th of December; the difference of these extremes, makes 2.05 inches. Mean of the six summer months, 29.80; of the six winter months, 29.78 inches. The mean daily movements of the barometrical surface, measures near forty-one and a half inches: total number of changes, one hundred and thirty-six.

The reporter has had several interruptions, during the latter part of the past year, from a derangement of a part of the weather apparatus; particularly the rain-funnel and thermometer. The omissions of registering the observations of the temperature, and pressure, as well as those of the rain and wind; were kindly supplied by my friend Mr. John Blackwall, of Crumpsall. The whole of the above account of rain and wet days, were registered at Crumpsall; the quantity generally averages more than what falls in town. The results on the barometer and thermometer, for the last five months, are drawn from the observations at Crumpsall: however, they are made to approximate pretty near to what they would have been in town, by adding .23 parts of an inch to the results of the former, and 2° to those of the latter. Mr. B.'s barometer is situated higher than the one in Bridge-Street, which accounts for the above difference.

The notations on the wind at Crumpsall, embrace a greater number of daily observations, than those made at Manchester, and as they do not agree, it is thought proper to omit the sums at bottom.

The fete of this saint is celebrated with great pomp at Catania, in Sicily. The following account is given by a traveller who witnessed it in 1819. The image of the saint, of the natural size, is carried on the shoulders of four priests to the church: this object of the adoration of the people was decorated with diamonds and all kinds of precious stones, and reclined on a massive piece of silver; it was covered with a veil. Cries of 'Long live St. Agatha' resounded through the church, which was splendidly illuminated. The soldiers, ranged in two lines, could scarcely make a passage for it: every one was in motion, and was continually leaping before the statue, exclaiming, 'Oh, how handsome she is! Oh, how good,' &c. From the church the image was conveyed to an enormous car, drawn by twenty pair of oxen, and thus paraded round the city amid peals of applause from the infatuated multitude. The fete was terminated by a display of fire-works and a general illumination.

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

Brief Memoir of the Rev. Robert Walker.

(CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.)

The following letters could not well be embodied in our former article, but are now added by way of supplement.

To Mr. —

Coniston, July 26, 1754.

SIR,—I was the other day upon a party of pleasure, about five or six miles from this place, where I met with a very striking object, and of a nature not very common. Going into a clergyman's house (of whom I had frequently heard,) I found him sitting at the head of a long narrow table, such as is commonly used in this country by the lower class of people, dressed in a coarse blue frock, trimmed with black horn buttons; a checked shirt, and a leather strap about the neck for a stock; a coarse apron, and a pair of wooden soled shoes, (what we call clogs in these parts,) with a child upon his knee, eating his breakfast; his wife, and the remainder of their children were some of them employed in waiting, and the rest in teasing and spinning wool, at which trade he is a great proficient: and moreover, when it is ready for sale, he will lay thirty-two or more pounds weight upon his back, and on foot, will carry it to market, seven or eight miles, even in the depth of winter. I was not so much surprised at all this, as you may possibly be, having heard a great deal of it related before. But I must confess myself astonished at the alacrity and good humour that appeared both in the clergyman and his wife, and more so at the sense and ingenuity of the clergyman himself.

Then follows a letter from another person, dated 1755, from which an extract shall be given.

By his frugality and good management he keeps the wolf from the door, as we say; and if he advances a little in the world, it is more owing to his own care than any thing else he has to rely upon. I do not find that his inclination leads him to seek any preferment. He is settled among happy people, and lives in the greatest unanimity and friendship with them: and, I believe the people are exceedingly well satisfied with him; indeed, how can they be dissatisfied, when they have a person of so much worth and probity for their pastor? A man, who, for his candour and meekness, his sober, chaste and virtuous conversation, his soundness in principle and practice, is an ornament to his profession, and an honour to the country; and bear with me if I say that the plainness of his dress, the simplicity of his manners, the sanctity of his doctrine, and the vehemence of his expression, have a strong resemblance of the pure practice of primitive christianity.

To the above we add the following memorandum made by one of Mr. Walker's descendants.

There is a certain chapel in the diocese of Chester, where a clergyman has regularly officiated above sixty years; and, a few months ago, he administered the sacrament of the Lord's supper to a decent number of devout communicants. After the clergyman had received it himself, the first company who approached and kneeled down to be partakers of the sacred elements, consisted of the parson's wife, (to whom he had been married upwards of sixty years,) one son and his wife, four daughters and their husbands, whose united ages amounted to 714 years. The several distances from the place of each of their abodes, would measure more than 1090 miles. Though this narration may appear surprising, it is a fact, that the same persons, exactly four years before, met at the same place, and all joined in performing the same solemn duty.

That Mr. Walker was most zealously attached to the doctrines and ceremonies of the established church, might be inferred from his exultation that he had no dissenter in his cure. Some allowance must be made for the state of opinion, when his religious impressions were first received, before the reader will acquit him of bigotry on this account, when I mention that at the augmentation of his cure, he refused to invest part of the money in the purchase of an estate offered to him, upon advantageous terms, because the proprietor was a quaker:—whether from scrupulous apprehension that a blessing would not attend a contract framed for the benefit of the church, between persons not in religious fellowship with each other: or as a seeker of peace, he was afraid of the uncomplimentary disposition, which at one time was too frequently conspicuous in that sect. Of this a signal instance had fallen under his own notice; for while he taught a school at Lowes-water, certain persons of that denomination refused to pay the annual interest due from them, under the title of church stock; a great hardship upon the incumbent, for the curacy of Lowes-water was then as poor as that of Seathwaite.

We have already said, that it is in the quiet inclosure of consecrated ground, belonging to the latter place, that the remains of this venerable man lie interred. The sounding brook that rolls close by the church-yard, is now laid bare; but, not long ago, it participated with the chapel, the shade of some stately ash trees which will not spring again.—While the spectator, from this spot is looking round upon the girdle of stony mountains that encompasses the vale,—(masses of rock, out of which monuments for all the men who ever existed might be hewn,) it would surprise him to be told, as with truth he might be, that the plain blue slab dedicated to the memory of this aged pair, was produced from a quarry in North Wales. It was sent as a mark of respect, by one of their descendants, from the Vale of Festiniog, a region almost as beautiful as that in which it now lies!

I will add a few extracts from the parish register of Lowes-water, respecting a person apparently of desire, as moderate as Mr. Walker; with whom he must have been intimate, during his residence there: and it is not improbable that he was the gentleman who assisted him in his classical studies.

Henry Forest came to Lowes-water in 1708, being 25 years of age.

The sycamore trees were planted in the church-yard in 1710.

Let him that would, ascend the tottering seats
Of courtly grandeur, and become as great
As are his mounting wishes; but, for me,
Let sweet repose and rest my portion be.

HENRY FOREST, Curate.

Honour, the idol which they most adore,
Receives no homage from my knee;
Content in privacy I value more
Than all uneasy dignity.

H. F.

He died in 1742, having been curate Thirty-four years.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF THE PUNCH-BOWL.

Autobiography is very much in fashion at the present day. Mr. Cobbett writes Autobiography, and Mr. Hunt writes Autobiography; why then should Criticism turn up her nose at the Autobiography of a Punch-bowl?

I was made on the 20th of October, 1820; and was pronounced, by an admiring public, a fine Bowl. Every body found something to commend in me; some liked my sweetness, and some my acidity—some praised me because I was strong enough, and some because I was not too strong. There were few tasters who did not look forward with pleasure to a second draught.

In a short time the usual vicissitudes of popular favour afflicted me; people began to find in me a hundred faults, of which they had not so much as dreamed before. I was too sour, and too noisy, and too heavy; I inspired nothing but puns and quibbles; every fume I sent forth savoured of Satire; every cup I filled tasted of Absurdity. It was said, that I made young heads giddy, and disrespectful to their superiors; that I was a sad abettor of idleness and impertinence; that I was an utter enemy to all discipline and regularity; in short, that I ought never to be tolerated in the place of which I had possessed myself.

Even my Patrons, the Members of the Club, began to cool in their good opinion of me. 'The King of Clubs,' like many other Kings, began to think of sacrificing his Favourite, in order to conciliate popular favour: my spirits subsided, and I began to be of opinion that the Members were all cracked, and that I should be cracked too, in a short time. I believe I owed my safety to a fortuitous circumstance, to which I never look back without exultation,—Mr. Oakley, my most formidable enemy, dared to introduce a Tea-pot into the Club-Room. The Members retreated from his flag with disgust; and, though I never could get rid of the vile little intruder, yet a proposal for exiling me, and substituting chocolate, was negated by a large majority.

I kept my place, therefore, and although I continued to meet with my quantum suff. of disapprobation from many with whose stomachs I disagreed, I did not cease from being the nectar of the Club, and the inspiration of the writings of 'The Etonian.' The fame of me was diffused far and wide, and the brightest ornaments of Mater Etona became anxious to have a hand in my composition. They were perpetually sending presents of ingredients, and my limited circumference was frequently unable to contain their liberality. One poured in a stream of Good Sense; another gave me a sparkling fountain of Wit; a third dropped from his hand the sugar of Urbanity; a fourth scattered on my surface the flowers of Parnassus. The disposition to jollity, which I had upon my first appearance betrayed, was gradually refined. I became as quiet and civil a Punch-bowl as ever was concocted. Even Ladies ventured to sip from me, and Exquisites pronounced me tolerable. The playful Fancy, which dictated the 'March to Moscow' was derived from my influence—the pen which wrote 'Godiva' was dipped in my liquid. When I am accused of misdemeanors, and riot, and disaffection, I answer by holding up a list of my friends!—You shall know me by the company I keep!

Yet why do I complain of hostility or censure? I never had reason to do so: my greatest friends, it is true, mixed up something of condemnation with their praises; but I need not fret on this account, since my bitterest enemies united something of approbation with their sarcasms. It has been my peculiar lot to please and to displease every body. One considered me lukewarm, but there was sometimes a mellowness in my taste which pleased him; another thought me insipid, but there was sometimes a little acid in my beverage, which redeemed me from total neglect; a third complained that too much of me sent him to sleep, but still he came to me, because he found a little of me was enlivening; a fourth swore I was death to the senses, but yet he had an affection for me, because I gave life to the feelings.

The incidents of my short life have been few, but among those whom they immediately concerned they of course excited great interest. Wherever 'The Etonian' made his appearance, 'The King of Clubs' led the way with the Punch-bowl in his arms; I was tasted by the literati, who read every thing, and the illiterate, who read nothing at all. Many a glutton in literature smacked his lips at my approach, and many a boarding-school belle relinquished the unbroke 'Tears of Sensibility' for the more inviting flavour of the streams of his Majesty's Punch-bowl.

These glorious days, however, are fleeting swiftly away! Once more will my orb be replenished, and the potion I will then afford shall be sweeter than I ever afforded before! Once more, and then my wonted spirits will no longer effervesce within me; my wonted friends will no longer laugh around me; I shall be as sorrowful as the hearts of my patrons,—as empty as the heads of my detractors!—Almighty Bacchus! Shall his Majesty's Punch-bowl sink into a vile piece of crockery? Ere plebeian lips shall defile the rim which the touch of a King hath hallowed,—ere the vessel in which wit has bathed, shall become the receptacle of earthly liquor,—

'Be ready, Gods, with all your thunderbolts,
Dash it to pieces.'

Before this dreadful consummation shall take place, let me, as far as possible, provide for the probable contingency. I know that when my protector, 'The King of Clubs,' shall have vacated his throne, a crowd of petty calumniators will arise, to hide my good qualities and exaggerate my failings. Let me, then, draw my own character before a less partial hand shall do it for me, and tell you what candour will say by-and-bye of the Punch-bowl.

It had many failings, but it had some virtues to counterbalance them; it promoted a fashion of levity, an indifference to rebuke, and an appearance of improprieties which never in reality existed. Many persons have assumed the dress of sanctity where sanctity was not; but few, like 'The King of Clubs,' have taken to intoxication in print, in order to appear to the world worse than they actually were. But, on the other hand, the Punch-bowl gave life and vivacity to 'The Etonian,' which had never been found in the shop of Mr. Twining. It had the grace of novelty, which is no small recommendation where youth is to be the judge; and it affords an opportunity of talking a great deal of nonsense, which could not have been talked half so well round a copper kettle or a silver urn. It was always warming,—often exhilarating,—seldom, I hope, intoxicating,—never, I am sure, unwholesome.—Etonian.

FROM THE FRENCH.

A worn out dandy had a jealous wife,
So cross too that she seem'd to live in strife;
Whose daily fits of anger and suspicion
Obliged him oft to curse his hard condition.
One day at meat with many more beside,
You villain! you have poison'd me; she cried I
You long have sought your tender wife to kill,
I'll have you hang'd you faithless dog, I will.
The husband quick replies, Now heav'n's forefend
I should to so much sweetness lit intend:
You need but open her and then you'll see
A full exposure of the calumny.

Solution of No. 57, by Mr. John Hill.

G. C. E.

A. H. I. F. B.

D. K. L.

Through A G C E B L K D describe an ellipse; join A B, G E, D L, G D, E L & C K: then will G E L D represent a section of the inscribed cylinder.

First, $\frac{156250}{180350 - 79350} = 1.971$, the specific gravity of the solid. And a cubic inch of common water weighs .5274 ounces Troy.

Hence, $1 : 1.971 :: .5274 : 1.039$ the weight of a cubic inch of the spheroid. And, $\frac{325.33}{1.39} = 313.3$ the content of the spheroid in inches.

Now, let $s = 2t = A B$; $2c = C K$, and $m = .5236$, also, $x = I F$. Then, $2c = \left(\frac{s}{2tm}\right)^{\frac{1}{2}} = 7.4183$, and $A F = t + x$; also $B F = t - x$. By conics, $t^2 : c^2 :: t^2 - x^2 : t^2 - c^2 x^2 = E F^2$, and $E L^2 = \frac{4s^2 c^2 - 4c^2 x^2}{t^2} \times m x = \frac{4m^2 c^2 x - 4m c^2 x^2}{t^2}$ a maximum per question.

Hence, in fluxions, $\frac{4m^2 c^2 x - 12m c^2 x^2}{t^2} = 0$. Reduced, gives $x = \frac{t}{\sqrt{3}} = 3.1388$. Wherefore $H F = 6.2776$, and $G D = E L = 6.0568$, and hence the solidity.

Question No. 59, by Mr. Williams.

What is the diameter, height, and solidity of the segment of a sphere which is cut off by a plane passing through the centre of gravity of the hemisphere; the diameter of the sphere being 2 feet.

ENIGMA.

Hail to the hoary sage and studious youth,
Whose thirst for knowledge, and whose zeal for truth
First taught them to explore the historic page,
And call the flowers of each succeeding age,
There shewing by judicious mixture, how
To twine the wreath around the classic brow:
'Tis theirs to tell you, and they'll tell you true,
When the great leader of the oppressed crew,
That groan'd in bondage under Pharaoh's rod;
Brought forth the people with the arm of God:
Me, helpless me, in Egypt left behind,
Ages roll'd on and saw me st ill confin'd:
For 'twas my lot, though I their bondage shared,
Joined in their songs, and in their dangers dared;
When laden with the spoils they sought the coasts,
And fled before the death-devoted hosts,
That never in the desert I should mourn,
Or in the land of promise should sojourn,
But when in future times the Dardan Boy
Brought back Achæa's pride the scourge of Troy,
Dreadnading stoical ease and languid peace,
I stood the foremost in the ranks of Greece.
But such thy fate Pelias and my own,
Never to enter Troy's ill-fated town;
But when Troy fell, and war's alarms were o'er,
And great Æneas sought the Punic shore;

Me, when love's ardent flames began to flow,
He saw in Carthage, and forgot the foe.
But when to Lætium he had steer'd his flight,
And Rome arose to his prophetic sight,
His eye far piercing and his judgment clear,
Knew I should never find a station there.
Such was my lot, but when great Cæsar awoke,
And bade Rome call the conquered world her own,
I in the Canillan legions took my stand,
Nor fear'd the haughty victor's stern command.
I own in council he unequalled sat,
For I ne'er boasted talents in debate,
But Cæsar, nor the world's united might,
Could ever drive me from the midst of fight.
When the great Timor thundered as a God,
And Persia trembled as the tyrant trod
The heaven-rapt brain on the sacred shore
Of Gangra saw me twice, and saw no more.
Till later times if curious eyes pervade,
And wish to draw me from the silent shade,
I still stand forth obtrusive to the view,
By others challenged as I challenge you.
Go then but seek Me not in modern France,
Or with the beaux esprits to lead the dance,
Or in the strains of Italy to join,
Or in the rights of Venus or the Vine.
But go with me all my cares beguiling,
And place me where you'll ever see me smiling;
Place me where George and England shine to view,
And where they flourish, there I'll flourish too.

RETALS.

MARIA'S REMEMBRANCE TO HER HEART.

Ah! why art thou cast down my heart
And why so nearly burst;
Thy lover acted honour's part,
His treach'rous friend the worst.
Let then this thought dispel the mood,
That would thy feelings swell;
And bury in a briny flood,
Of tears, that word farewell!

MR. EDITOR,—Some of your more highly gifted correspondents will probably improve upon my attempt at rendering into metre the rhymes of your correspondent E. H., but I am of opinion, the bard must be very highly gifted indeed, that makes any thing very good out of the terminations he is limited to.

I am, JUVENIS.

What weighs most heavily upon the heart,
And bids the grief distracted bosom burst?
'Tis to be forced from those we love, to part—
Surely of human sorrows far the worst.—

Who has not known this agonizing mood—
Oppress his heart, his tortured bosom swell—
As from his eyes distilled a copious flood,
And his lips utter'd their last sad farewell.
Jany 25th, 1823.

MR. EDITOR,—In attempting to fill up the blank lines given for that purpose in your Iris of last week, I may have mistaken the Author's meaning, but have drawn my supposition from the last word.

I perfectly agree with E. H. that such exercises call forth the genius of youth, and bring into action its dormant powers, but at the same time think, that your correspondent might have chosen more easy words for the first verse. I am aware this may be considered as an apology for my weak production, but shall be happy to see another communication from E. H.

Liverpool, Jany. 28th, 1823.

Farewell! I fear my beating heart
Beneath our wayward fate will burst
To think that we so soon must part:—
But could I deem this ill the worst.

Ah, no! in melancholy mood,
A thousand fears around me swell,
And drown me in the rising flood:
Farewell! again, my love, farewell!

SCIENCE, ETC.

OIL A PROTECTION AGAINST SCALDING.

MR. EDITOR,—It is a fact not generally known, I believe, that if a person dip his hand in oil, he may afterwards immerse it in boiling water without injury or even inconvenience. I have seen the experiment made by others, and I have tried it myself. I am assured that there was, in this country, some years ago, a performer who leaped, in the presence of the audience, into boiling water, and came out unharmed. It seems to me that he must have had recourse to some such resource as that stated above, to protect him from the effects which boiling water would produce under other circumstances.

I am,

ON THE DIVISIBILITY OF MATTER.

MR. EDITOR,—I have read so much, pro and con, in different Authors, upon the subject of the divisibility of matter, that I am still at a loss to understand in what sense I am to take the expression. One writer tells me that matter itself is so divisible; another asserts that extension only is capable of infinite division; and a third contends that the conception of either of the preceding cases is an utter impossibility, to which no demonstration can apply. How, then, is one to decide amid these conflicting testimonies? Permit me to request something in the way of explanation upon the subject from some of your scientific correspondents.

CARBONIC ACID IN THE BLOOD.

'To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

'SIR,—In your valuable and widely circulating paper of yesterday's date, I perceive you attribute the discovery of carbonic acid gas as a component of the blood, to Sir Everard Home. Be it far from me to detract from this gentleman's deserts, but I think if you, or any of your numerous readers, will refer to "Thackrah's Essay on the Blood," he will find the above subject treated in a manner that will show in some degree that Sir Everard is not quite the origin of this important discovery. Mr. Thackrah is a surgeon at Leeds, Yorkshire, and well known in that neighbourhood for his depth of learning and research.

LATE ERUPTION OF MOUNT VESUVIUS.

Naples, Nov. 5th, 1822.

The eruption of Vesuvius has been one of the most striking and remarkable on record. It much resembled (but on a smaller scale) that of the year 79 of our era; and we have experienced a part of what is related by Pliny the younger.

On the evening of the date of my last letter, (Oct. 15) the fury of the volcano appeared to be considerably increased; the torrents of lava burst forth in all directions. Towards eleven o'clock the appearance was terrible; an enormous column of black ashes rose from the crater, in the form of a cone, to an extraordinary height; the lightnings darted from the mouth of Vesuvius, traversing the immense cloud of ashes in all directions, and in infinite ramifications. Issuing thence, they struck the sides of the mountain or the surface of the sea. I cannot give you a better idea of the surprising effect, than by comparing it with a sparkling magic picture exhibited in electrical experiments. The cloud was really a gigantic work of this kind, being composed of volcanic sand floating in the air. Every thing passed in the same manner, except that this magic picture was several miles in extent. When there was a superfluity of electrical fluid, it discharged with a great noise; whereas the currents of electricity, which crossed it in every direction, did not occasion any sensible detonation. The consternation was general; the inhabitants of Torre del Greco, Annunziata, Boscore Case, and Ottajano, precipitately forsook their dwellings. Day-light came, but all the environs of Vesuvius were involved in darkness. The shower of ashes carried by the wind was scattered to a great distance. At Naples no one could go out without an umbrella to keep off the coarser ashes. The appearance of the city was most mournful, and the news we received from the places threatened was very alarming. The furniture of the Royal Palaces of Portici and of the Favourite was removed with the utmost speed; and four or five thousand fugitives, who had fled to the city, increased the alarm. The processions marched through the streets; the churches were filled with supplicants, who implored all the Saints to put an end to this calamity.

At length the lava stopped in its progress. It has done but little mischief, having only covered ancient currents proceeding from various preceding eruptions, but the shower of volcanic substances and ashes has caused, and still occasions, incalculable damage. All the country is covered with them, and the communications are interrupted. In many places they have fallen to the depth of five or six feet, and Pompeii is, as it were, again buried as it was in the year 79.

I have collected several pounds of these ashes, which fell in my balcony. They were of a reddish brown in the beginning, then whitish. The first appear to me to be a powder of pumice-stones, it is excellent to deaden metals.

Several chymists have analysed it, and M. P  p   has discovered in it the following ingredients: sulphate of potash, sulphate of soda, sub-sulphate of alumine, of chalk, and of magnesia; hydro-chlorate of potash, that of soda, a good deal of oxid of aluminium, calcium, silicium, and magnesium; much trioxid of iron, antimony, and a little gold and silver. The chymist, who has contented himself with announcing the existence of these different substances in the ashes of the eruption, promises to investigate and publish their respective proportions. Other substances which the mountain continues to throw out are very different from the preceding.

This eruption appears to me to favour the hypothesis, that the volcanic fire may be produced by the infiltration of the sea-water, in the masses of potassium, sodium, &c. which are not yet oxidated; and the production of electrical fluid in such great abundance may arise from the same source, since the effects of the voltaic pile (mcge) are obtained by the oxidation of metals.

INTERESTING ACCOUNT OF A SOMNAMBULIST.

JOHN BAPTISTE NEGRETTE, of Vicenze, a domestic of the Marquis Louis Sale, was a man of a brown complexion, of a very hot constitution, by nature choleric, and by custom a drunkard.

From the age of eleven he became subject to sleep-walking, but was never seized with these fits, except in the month of March; and at the farthest they left him by the middle of April.

Messrs. Reghellini and Pigatti took a particular pleasure in observing him, while in this condition; and it is to the latter of these gentlemen, whose veracity is beyond the reach of suspicion, that we are now indebted for the following circumstantial detail.

In the month of March, 1745, towards the evening, Negretti having sat down upon a chair, in an ante-chamber, fell asleep, and passed a quarter of an hour, like any other man in the same situation: he then stretched himself for some time, and afterwards remained motionless, as if he wanted to pay attention to some thing. At length he arose, walked across the apartment, took a tobacco-box out of his pocket, and seemed desirous to have some tobacco; but finding he had hardly any left, he assumed a look of disappointment; and advancing to the chair which a certain person was wont to occupy, he called him by his name, and asked him for some tobacco: the other accordingly presented him his box open, and Negretti having taken a quid, put himself in an attitude of listening, when, imagining he heard himself called, he ran with a wax taper to the place where there usually stood a burning candle. Thinking he had lighted his taper, he crossed the hall with it, and went gently down stairs, stopping and turning about from time to time, as if he had been conducting a visitor: on reaching the outward door, he placed himself on one side of it, saluted the company he imagined he was ushering out, and bowed as each of them seemed to pass him: this ceremony over, he returned up stairs very quick, extinguished his taper, and put it back in the place where he had found it. This scene he repeated three times the same evening.

Having left the ante-chamber, he went into the dining room, searched his pocket for the key of the beaufet, and called for the servant whose duty it was to deliver that key to him every night, before he went to bed. On receiving it, he opened the beaufet, took a silver waiter or salver out of it, on which he put four glass decanters, and went to the kitchen, in order, no doubt, to fill them with water. He came back with them empty however; and, when he had reached the middle of the stair case, he put what he had in his hands upon a kind of post or pillar, ascended the remaining steps, and knocked at a door: as it was not opened for him, he returned down stairs, went in search of the valet-de-chambre, asked him some questions, turned upon his heel, and, running precipitately up the staircase, accidentally touched the salver with his elbow, and broke the decanters. He again knocked at the door, but to no purpose; and, on his return down stairs, he took the salver with him, which, having carried into the dining room, he placed it upon a little table. Thence he went into the kitchen, took a pitcher, carried it to the pump, where he filled it with water, and then returned to the kitchen again. He afterwards went to the salver, and, missing the decanters he was displeased; said they certainly ought to be there, as he had placed them himself; and enquired of the other servants if they had taken them away. After a long search, he opened the beaufet again, took out two decanters, rinsed them, filled them with water, and put them upon the salver. He then carried the whole into the ante-chamber to the very door of the dining room, where the valet was wont to receive them from his hands. Some one took the salver and decanters from him, and a little while after returned them. On this he went into the kitchen, wiped some plates with a cloth, held them to the fire as if he wanted to dry them, and in like manner cleaned all the other plates. These preparations completed, he returned to the beaufet, put the cloth and napkin into a small basket, and went, laden with these things, directly to a table, where there used to be a lighted candle. Having seemed to search for a knife and fork, he carried back the basket, and shut the beaufet. And, having afterwards carried every thing into the ante-chamber every thing he had taken out of the beaufet, and placed them upon a chair, he took a round table, at which the marchioness, his lady, used to eat, and covered it with great neatness. Beside it was another table of the same form; this he sometimes touched by mistake, but always returned to that he was covering. Now that this business was finished, he walked about, blowed his nose, and took out his tobacco box again, but withdrew his fingers from it, without offering to take any tobacco, as if he recollected, at the distance of at least two hours, that there was none in it: yet though he could not procure a quid, he found a few grains to throw upon his hand. Here concluded the first act. One threw some water upon his face, and he awoke.

(To be concluded in our next.)

PORTRAIT OF A NUBIAN.

The Nubian is slender but gracefully made, his beauty, like that of a statue, never changes, and he is entirely free from fat; this is the more fortunate, as he is naked:—a publican, or a coachman would make but an inelegant figure in a state of nudity. Many a Nubian who pretends to decency ties a cord round his waist, and on this is hung a screen of grass, but long before evening the grass is dried up and withered. He is as fond as the Arab is of becksheesh, and when he does ask, he asks like the beggar in Gil Blas, putting you in fear of your life; he places his spear close to your breast, and is unwilling to remove it, until either his demand is complied with or till he sees fire arms. He is as afraid as Junius of gunpowder, and he knows that the length of a bullet is beyond that of the arm bianca. He is, however, bolder than the Arab, which is owing to his freedom; at least it is but lately that Nubia has been subdued. The fellahs, when I have been shooting, have run away eight or ten together; but the Nubian, though alone, has unsling his spear and maintained his ground. The Arab is so completely in dread of the Pasha that he never carries his natural propensities beyond robbery, but the Nubian does not hesitate to commit murder. Three men at the entrance killed a traveller whom they asked to supper; a breach of hospitality unknown among the Bedouins or freebooters of the desert.

The Nubians of our crew are far too merciful when they should not be so: as soon as the sun has sufficiently warmed the atmosphere, every man takes off his shirt and commences a search after certain little animals that abound greatly in this country, and in which he is consequently very successful. When he catches any of the vermin, as he is forbidden to put them to death, he throws them into the river or gives them to the winds, and therefore often to his neighbour, so that the hunt is renewed day after day with equal success. We saw a snake in our path, one of the men threw a stone at it, which nearly severed the head from the body. I desired him to put the poor animal out of its misery, which he refused, alleging that it would be wicked to deprive it of life. The natives of Egypt are particularly merciful to all animals, as if it were a continuation of the ancient custom of the country, and it might almost be looked upon as a species of worship. It certainly is not so ridiculous as to see people of consequence in Rome go on St. Anthony's day in their coaches and six to have their horses blessed! The sprinkling holy water over these and other animals fills up three days in the year to please St. Anthony and the pigs.

The Nubian is so uncourteous that he will scarcely return the salutation of a Franc, or when he does grumble out "Aleikum Salam," he adds also, "now be off with you, don't look at our women." If he happens to deviate from this sulkiness it is because he has experienced the liberality of travellers, and then he runs up with all the interest of a "Je suis charm  ," exclaiming, Salam aleikum howbahbe, howbahbe, tyebbiint, tyeb, tyeb, tyeb, wa hall tyeb,—becksheesh ma feesh? "Health to you, welcome, welcome, are you well, very well, exceedingly well, well by G— Is there no becksheesh for me?" I never could ascertain upon what plea they demanded money, unless it is, that I have come upon their land, and am therefore liable to an action for trespass. In passing a village, we observed several women in line, carrying each a platter. Upon enquiry we learnt that news had just arrived of the death of a man belonging to the place, and these people were going to assist at the ulula; as it is the custom at a wake to eat as well as administer consolation, and the widow in this case happened to be too poor to treat her friends, every one who went to weep carried a plate of provisions to the pic nic.—Hemiker.

SLAVE TRADE IN EGYPT.

At Derahvy we were informed that a caravan had just arrived, with gum, ostrich feathers, and slaves; the latter are registered at this place as soon as they are brought into Egypt, and a poll-tax is paid to the Pasha; it is one of the largest and cheapest human Smithfields in the kingdom. The price of a slave varies from seven to twenty-five pounds; they are allowed to bask during the day in a walled court-yard, and at night they are distributed among the cottages like a subscription pack of hounds. The whipper-in carried a caravan of thong, made of the rhinoceros's hide, an instrument too cruel to beat even a donkey with, and switching this about in a masterly manner, he accompanied me to the kennel: here we found a squattee of young ladies seated in a circle; in the centre was a broken bowl, and into this they all dipping their fingers, with as much greediness as if it was hasty-pudding. My nose soon informed me that it was grease; and the merchant tells me that it is the luxury of women, and consolation even unto a slave; with this they besmear themselves from head to toe, and glisten in the sun like a newly varnished picture; they were so well pleased with the fat, that they paid but little attention to the dealer as he pointed out the particular beauties of each. Some were tattooed like aboriginal Britons, and some had their faces oiled like crimped skate; she is considered most ornamental who uses most grease; and she that does not smell offensively is looked upon as a sloven.

The merchant warrants that a slave shall not snore, nor be guilty of many other désagréments of nature.—Hammer.

MR. EDITOR.—After reading the extract given in your IRIS, of the 28th ult. from Southey's History of the Peninsular War, detailing all the affecting circumstances of the death and interment of Sir John Moore, no apology, I presume, will be deemed necessary for inserting the following beautiful LINES on the same subject, written by a student of Trinity College, Cambridge.

LINES,

S X.

On reading an account of the Burial of Sir John Moore, at Corunna.

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried;
Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot
O'er the grave, where our hero was buried.
We hurried him darkly, at dead of night,
The mists with our bayonets turning,
By the struggling moon-beam's misty light,
And the lantern dimly burning.

No useless coffins inclosed his breast,
Not in sheet nor in shroud we bound him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him.
Few and short were the prayers we said,
And we spoke not a word of sorrow;
But we steadfastly gazed on the face of the dead,
And we bitterly thought of the morrow.

We thought as we hallowed his narrow bed,
And smooth'd down his lonely pillow,
That the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his head,
And we,—far away on the billow!
Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him;
But little he'll reck on as calmly sleep on,
In a grave where a Briton has laid him.

But half of our heavy task was done,
When the clock toll'd the hour of retiring,
And we heard the distant and random shot,
That the foe was sulkily firing.
Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
From the field of his fame, fresh and gory;—
We car'd not a line, we rais'd not a stone,
But we left him alone with his glory.

SONG.

Woe, dear maid, apart from thee,
How my drooping soul complains!
Bless, content, enjoyment thee,
Hope alone with me remains;
Speak, then speak—O bid me stay,
Drive me not from life away!

Love entranc'd my days I'll spend,
E'er thought to thee disclose;
View the lily's beauties blend
With the fragrance of the rose;—
Loveliness and truth combin'd,
Nature's sweetest form and mild!

Talk not e'er that I am one
Who can female worth condemn;
True as yonder rolling sun,
Cloudless as the polish'd gem;—
Scorn I those who only view
Transient bliss with such as you!

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR.—In a late conversation with you on the comparative merits of your paper, I remarked, that although a warm admirer of the style of your correspondent "I. B. M." as exemplified in his very interesting numbers, entitled "The Augustan Age," I should nevertheless, "differ from him on the Subject of History." I also stated my intention of embracing the earliest convenient opportunity for communicating my objections.

As my former reading was superficial, I entered upon a particular perusal of "The Augustan Age, No. V." with a view to the fulfilment of my promise; but, judge of my astonishment, when, after the strictest scrutiny, I could not perceive an objectionable sentence throughout that excellent essay!

The fact is, my remark originated in misunderstanding; for, I conceived that the fallacious embellishment, and romantic interest of the Waverley genus was approved and commended in I. B. M.'s first paragraph. Not that the style of this gentleman is either ambiguous or obscure,—no; it is intelligible and energetic; and infinitely more creditable than the admired flippancy of the most popular novel makers. A cursory imperfect glance occasioned, and a further perusal has now rectified my inadvertent conclusion.

Whether, or not, the opinions of I. B. M. accord with prevailing views, is of little consequence; as they may be supported by numerous facts drawn from every age. I cannot but admire the judicious observation, and independent judgment of the Author of "The Augustan Age:" with much information, he combines a clear understanding and a well regulated taste; his ideas evidently arise from considerable powers judiciously exercised; and his decisions are expressed with a confidence in his own deliberations, which at once distinguishes him from common writers, and indicates that description of originality which benefits society and is honourable to its promulgators. Hoping for many literary favours from your correspondent I. B. M., I am, &c.

MR. EDITOR.—That "an honest man's the noblest work of God," is an admitted and generally admired maxim. And, as honest men are not identified with any particular rank, exclusive of all others, it must be granted that they may be found in all the gradations of society. Now, as the poorest and most illiterate, may, nevertheless, be honest men, and in being such, are "the noblest work of God," I wish, Sir, to ascertain that point, distinction, or qualifying materials which constitutes the "Gentleman." Is it rank? Wealth? Authority? each and all of which may be hereditary. Is it Learning? virtue? benevolence? each and all of which must be acquired. Combativeness? impertinence? obscurity? perfidy? all of which are odious and diabolical. For the elucidation of this particular, I do not require your readers to trouble themselves in Antiquarian research; neither do I wish to be troubled with Greek, or Latin, or Teutonic, or even French primitives; the definition must be illustrative of the English acceptance, and in the vernacular tongue of the present race of Englishmen. I am &c., VERITAS.

MR. EDITOR.—A few weeks since you observed that the scene of "the infernal regions," in "THE LIBERTINE," accorded neither with taste nor judgment; and now that its exhibition is discontinued, I beg to trouble you with one or two remarks, which could not fail to strike every beholder. First.—The nodding of the equestrian statue is as onfeisable as absurd.—And, Secondly.—The fall of Don Juan, and the appearance of 'hell's torture snakes,' and masked fiends, is weak, preposterous, and impious; and every child must pity the actor, who can be so imbecile, as to stagger off the stage, for the purpose of looping a huge 'torture snake' to his breast! This scene can have no salutary effect upon the atheist, or fatalist; it only obtains his ridicule, as to principle; whilst it panders to his worst passions by influence. It is at the same time a libel upon Divine Revelation in general, and a caricature upon Christianity in particular. Don Juan is a character altogether out of life; such a monster, (could such possibly exist,) would and should fall by human agency alone; and in this way only can the piece be reconciled to feeling, moral principle, or common sense. A contemptible villain may for a time evade the laws of civilized nations, or the vengeance of natural right, but he will ultimately obtain his desert from either. A Hero may revel in the mysteries of bigots; an enthusiast may delight to step beyond humanity, and to dare supernatural visitations; but an enlightened people cannot be expected to witness a blasphemous caricature of their common religion, without remonstrance and condemnation.

I am, &c.

DRAMATICUS.

MR. EDITOR.—I am surprised that you should copy a commendation of Mr. Vandenhoff's person, and performance as witnessed in his representation of Coriolanus in Edinburgh, a commendation uncalled for, and much more unwarranted and unwarrantable as being so opposite to truth; as, we are assured by your correspondent, 'V. P.' from his knowledge acquired in seven years' acquaintance with that gentleman, that Mr. V.'s eyes are sunk in his head! that the whole contour of his face is incapable of varied expression!! and his gait and action are stiff and ungraceful!!! (See the Iris, vol. ii. p. 32.)—Did you think, in common with the Scotch critics, 'to be facetious at Mr. V.'s expense?' Or, did you hope to mislead those who were not able to judge for themselves? If you did, it appears you were much mistaken.

However to allow you, Mr. Editor, a chance of clearing yourself from any charge of endeavouring to impose upon us, which may be brought against you, I shall suppose that I may err in my information, though that information be grounded on a seven years' acquaintance; and therefore considering you innocent till proved guilty, I must in the mean time beg your pardon for the freedom of my language. I should certainly act as politely towards you and as justly, if I took the liberty to doubt a little the motives, the veracity, or, at least, the judgment of your correspondent; and consequently in turn might now require of him, Does Mr. 'V. P.' pretend to place upon a par Mr. Vandenhoff and the person who now assumes his characters in our Theatre? And therefore is he endeavouring, by detracting from Mr. Vandenhoff, to turn the attention of the public of Manchester to his present representative? The empty benches show what opinion the public entertain in regard to the superiority of the latter over the former. And 'after the wretched actors that public are and have been doomed to witness regularly belonging to the company' here during the last and present season, if a performer of such generally acknowledged excellence as Mr. V. should appear in Manchester and be well received, it will not be at all surprising.

After an acquaintance of three years with Mr. V., and a few introductions to the Tragedian of the present company, my judgment is, that in the performance of the principal characters by the former gentleman, we witness something like a classical taste, we witness a correctness and propriety of pronunciation, a grace and dignity of gesture, a suitableness of person, face, and action, which we in vain look for in the present usurper of his parts. And whatever Mr. 'V. P.' may say to the contrary, those who have witnessed Mr. V.'s performance of the chief characters in tragedy, and who have possessed and formed any judgment, will believe the critics, whether Scotch or English, who commended Mr. V. sooner than his detractor of that gentleman, even though Mr. V. P.'s decisions may be grounded on a seven year's acquaintance with him!

VARIETIES.

ANECDOTE OF DR. JOHNSON.—"Professor Martyn was at Rome at the time when Miss Knight was there, and was improving to the utmost the advantages of her situation. I have heard him speak of the delight one of her teachers took in instructing her, and the lively warmth with which he described her uncommon progress in whatever she undertook. She was one of the many of her sex who had to remember and record the brutal wit of Johnson. The ladies of the time when his notice was considered as an honour, made it too much a point of honour to obtain an introduction:—where this honour was to be found, I confess I never could discover. For myself, I can truly say, that it was a severe punishment to me to share in any of my father's visits to him, and that I never heard him say, in any visit, six words that could compensate for the trouble of getting to his den, and the disgust of seeing such squallidness as I saw no where else.

"My mother I know used to brag that he had never been uncivil to her:—till unfortunately at our table, she asked him very gently if he would not take a little wine; and concluding by his not replying that he had not heard her, she repeated the words. He then thundered out, 'I drink no wine—why do you tease me?' Her boasting, alas! was then all over, and she remained, in rank and distinction, just on a level with the eighteen nymphs who were so incautious as to go in a body to wait on him. I can imagine the dozen and half of damsels all ready to prostrate themselves on the carpet, sooty and smoky as it was, and to cast at his feet, garlands of 'hearts' ease,' 'London pride,' 'maids in mists,' and 'forget me nots,' when he tumbled off the stairs into the dingy parlour, shoulder forward, as if aiming at the diagonal of the apartment, and mouthed or growled out, 'If I had known there had been so many of you, I would not have come.' To one—the spokeswoman, I presume, who had an oration ready, he saved the trouble of recital, by crying out, 'Fiddle-de-dee, my dear!'

"These met their fate, and in my mind a due fate;—but when Miss Knight, whose pretensions to regard were established by having worked on an idea he had thrown out and was too indolent to pursue, in writing Dinarbas; who had produced her elegant illustrative fiction, 'Marcus Flaminius,' and her really useful work, 'The Campagna of Rome;'—when she went to make him a farewell-visit on quitting England, to dismiss her by saying, 'Go, my dear, for you are too big for an Island,'—it was nothing short of gross brutality, and worthy only of Maglaibecchi.—Hawkins.

PORTRAIT OF HORACE WALPOLE.—His figure was not merely tall, but more properly long and slender to excess; his complexion, and particularly his hands, of a most unhealthy paleness. His eyes were remarkably bright and penetrating, very dark and lively:—his voice was not strong, but his tones were extremely pleasant, and if I may so say, highly gentlemanly. I do not remember his common gait; he always entered a room in that style of affected delicacy, which fashion had then made almost natural; chapeau bras between his hands as if he wished to compress it, or under his arm—knees bent, and feet on tiptoe, as if afraid of a wet floor.

His dress in visiting was most usually, in summer when I most saw him, a lavender suit, the waistcoat embroidered with a little silver, or of white silk worked in the tambour, partridge silk stockings, and gold buckles, ruffles and frill generally lace. I remember when a child, thinking him very much under-dressed, if at any time except in mourning, he wore hemmed cambrie. In summer no powder, but his wig combed straight, and showing his very smooth pale forehead, and queued behind:—in winter, powder.—Hawkins.

THE FRENCH PRESS.—Last week the French writers, Messrs. Arnault, Jay, Jony, and Norvigne were cited before the Judge d'instruction, for outrages and offences against the King's Government, in certain papers of the eighth volume of their Contemporary Biography. The Police Correctionnelle will immediately take cognizance of this accusation, and of that against M. Barthélemy, for his St. Helena Collection of Papers, among which O'Meara's first volume is charged as libellous upon the Royal family.

SCOTT AND BYRON.—It appears that for some years very able translations have been made into Russian prose of the Poems of Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott.

CHESS.—A writer in a Brussels publication denies to Maelzel the invention both of the automaton Chess-player and of the Metronome; maintaining that the merit of the former belongs to the celebrated Van Kempeken, and of the latter to M. Wenckel of Amsterdam. It is also asserted that an amateur of chess in Brussels has discovered the secret of the Automaton Chess-player, which, he says, consists in concealing under the table a person who directs the moves. He has constructed a machine representing the table, and the drawer in which the pieces are kept, in order to prove that the real player may lie concealed in a recess behind that drawer, while the interior of the table is exposed to public view, and quit his hiding place as soon as the doors of the table are closed; and it is declared that he has, by repeated exhibitions, convinced thousands of persons of the practicability of such an arrangement.

THE VAMPIRE.

The celebrated story of the Vampire, which has been successfully dramatized at Paris, has supplied materials for one of the best melo-dramas, we have ever seen at this or any other theatre. The superstition on which it is founded, is one of the most appalling at which the blood has ever curdled with a chill and mysterious pleasure. A being in whom death and life are strangely mingled—with all the coldness of the grave and all the seeming immunities of existence—sustained by the blood of female victims whom he first is permitted to fascinate—has a spell far more fearful than ordinary spectres.

The piece opens with an introductory vision—not a miserable allegory, as the title would lead us to fear—but an excellent preparatory explanation, which at once renders the plot intelligible, and prepares our feelings for all which is to follow. Lady Margaret, the daughter of Lord Ronald, Baron of the Isles, betrothed to the Earl of Marsden whom she has never seen, after chasing the red-deer among the woods, falls asleep in the tremendous cavern of Fingal. While she slumbers, two spirits of the haunted spot appear, from whom we learn that her intended bridegroom is a vampire, the spirit of Cromal the bloody, whose tomb is in that cavern, but who has existed by draining the life-blood of numberless virgins, and who now has marked her for his prey. To warn her of her peril, they call up the phantom in its old form, which rises slowly from the grave, pronounces her name, and vanishes in fire. She returns terrified to the castle, where Lord Ruthven soon arrives to claim her as his bride. To the astonishment of Lord Ronald, he discovers that the visitant is no other than his beloved friend, whose apparent death he had witnessed, while travelling in Greece. He is, however, satisfied with his story of sudden succor and revival; and is filled with delight at finding that he will see his godlike friend the husband of his child. When, however, Lady Margaret sees him, she is horror-stricken—for his form is that of the spectre in dream. His spells, however, change this hostility to a strange attachment, which she can resist nor explain. At his earnest solicitation a wedding is fixed for that evening; but, in the while, he is touched with pity for the youthfulness of the lady, and being requested to delay the marriage of one of Lord Ronald's daughters, he releases the daughter of his own steward, he releases the lowlier damsel his victim. To this she rises her off—but is pursued by her intended husband—wounded—and staggers in to die. The incident does not, however, very materially affect him. He requests Lord Ronald to send him a ring which he gives him, into the sepulchre of Fingal, and that he will wait until the moon, then riding in meridian, shall sink beneath the horizon. The Baron on returning to the castle, finds her again, and his daughter resolutely evening. The horrible truth bursts into passionate exclamation, interrupts by reminding him of his daughter not to marry until she is given, by Ruthven, into the hands of the insane. The hour approaches—the bride and bridegroom once more rushes in, and insists on a delay until the moon is full. He knows that if the ceremony must perish for ever, growl at him—the casement throws its dipping in the sea—he is repelled—feels the horrors stricken by lightning, and the astonished and joyful this piece fascinates like the being whom we have seen in the shape and form—giving and receiving with all the blessings of existence on the completion of the thrilling sensation with tales of wonder.

BIOGRAPHY.

DR. JENNER.

Dr. Edward Jenner the discoverer and indefatigable defender of Vaccination, expired at Berkeley, on Sunday the 26th ult. in his 74th year.

This illustrious man, was the youngest son of the Rev. Stephen Jenner, M. A. Rector of Rockhampton, and Vicar of Berkeley, and was born May 17, 1749. At the age of thirteen, he was placed under the care of Messrs Ludlow, Surgeons of Sudbury: and subsequently became house pupil to the celebrated John Hunter, with whom he took an active part in the formation of the Hunterian Museum.* Declining a partnership with his eminent preceptor, Mr. Jenner returned to Berkeley, and in a short time distinguished himself, by a successful practice.

Dr. Jenner's attention was first turned to the cow-pox, in 1776. Finding, from experience, that some persons, who, had been affected with the cow-pox,† were secure from the small-pox, even though inoculated with the latter; whilst others who had also been affected with the cow-pox, were still susceptible of the small-pox, without inoculation, he pursued a laborious course of observation and experiment, until he satisfactorily ascertained that the cow matter in an active state, is a sure preservative against the small-pox; and, that, when the latter takes effect upon one who has had the cow-pox, it is owing to the cow matter having lost its more active property prior to its application.—Hence, a necessity for the utmost care in this particular!

This is the discovery which immortalizes the name of Jenner!—A discovery which has already saved the lives of myriads; and which in its rapid progress from pole to pole, produces the one uniform effect—by a MILD AFFECTION, preserves from the MOST DANGEROUS MALADY that ever raged amongst the human species!

That jealous, malignant, and interested creatures should oppose the efforts of this benefactor of mankind, we can readily admit; but that their sophistry should be borne with, on a subject so open to enquiry, and correct decision, is equally strange and infelicitous. However, the facts were ultimately demonstrated; the eyes of the world enlightened; and whilst his opponents shrank into contemptuous oblivion, he was congratulated and honoured by the crowned heads, and all the great and liberal minds of Europe!

We add a few illustrations from contemporary pens.—

Vaccination was introduced into the army and navy, and honours heaped on the head of its great founder. The physicians and surgeons of the fleet presented Dr. Jenner with a gold medal and suitable address. The medal represents Apollo, the god of physic, introducing a seaman recovered from vaccine inoculation to Britannia; who, in return extends a civic crown, on which is inscribed—JENNER. The motto is peculiarly happy—ALBA NAUTIS STELLA REFULSIT.

On the reverse is an anchor, above GEORGIO TERTIO REGI; below SPENCER DUCE; expressing the reign and the naval administration of the sovereign and peer under whose auspices this valuable improvement of the healing art was introduced into the navy of Great Britain.

The Empress Dowager Mary of Russia, and several foreign potentates, now sent gratulatory addresses to

Dr. Jenner on his discovery, which has been rapidly gaining ground in every quarter of the globe. A few instances are worthy of being recorded.

When Dr. Wickham was made prisoner in France, our philosopher was applied to as the fittest person for addressing to Bonaparte a petition soliciting that physician's liberation. This was at the time of Napoleon's greatest animosity to this country. It happened thus: the emperor was in his carriage, and the horses were being changed. The petition was then presented to him. He exclaimed, 'Away! away!' The Empress Josephine, who accompanied him, said, 'But, emperor, do you see whom this comes from? Jenner.' He changed his tone of voice that instant, and said, 'What that man asks is not to be refused;' and the petition was immediately granted. The ex-emperor also liberated many others, from time to time, at the request of Dr. Jenner, even whole families. Indeed, he never refused any request made by Dr. Jenner, who, of course, observed proper delicacy in not applying too often.

When the foreign potentates arrived in this country in 1814 they all expressed a wish to see Dr. Jenner; he was first introduced to the Grand Duchess of Oldenburg, when the conversation continued upon philosophical subjects, and her imperial highness astonished the doctor by the extent of her information. Dr. Jenner requested her imperial highness, when she wrote to her august mother, to have the goodness to say that he had a grateful remembrance of the kind attention which she showed to him. 'When I write?' she replied, 'I will write this very evening!'—At parting she said, 'Dr. Jenner, you must see the emperor my brother, who is expected here soon,' Dr. Jenner bowed acquiescence and withdrew.

The emperor arrived, and the promised interview took place in the most gracious form. The doctor was ushered into a room, which soon after his imperial majesty entered alone. He pronounced the words 'Dr. Jenner!' (which was returned with a respectful bow), and then advanced and touched his right shoulder. Alexander shortly commenced a discourse upon the astonishing effects of vaccination in Russia; and Dr. Jenner had the pleasure of hearing him declare that the vaccine had nearly subdued small-pox throughout that country. Dr. Jenner then told the emperor that he had the highest gratification at hearing such an important fact from his majesty himself. Dr. Jenner then presented the monarch with a volume of his own works upon the subject; and added, 'that in whatever country vaccination was conducted in a similar way to that which his majesty had commanded in the Russian empire, the small-pox must necessarily become extinct.' The emperor then made some observations which were highly complimentary to Dr. Jenner.

In a few days afterwards Count Orloff, with whom he had been long acquainted, from attendance on his countess, waited on Dr. Jenner, and asked him if a Russian order would be acceptable to him, should his majesty be graciously pleased to confer it. Dr. Jenner replied, that he thought this exclusively belonged to men of perfect independence. The count expressed his surprise at his not possessing a pecuniary independence. Dr. Jenner answered, that he possessed a village fortune, though not what came under the general acceptance of the term independence.

By appointment Dr. Jenner waited on the King of Prussia. And the king made, as did the other sovereigns, a general acknowledgment of the obligations of the world to Dr. Jenner. Either a child of this king, or of the Emperor of Austria, was the first royal child inoculated in Europe. After the king was gone, the crown prince, and many others of the illustrious foreigners honoured Dr. Jenner with particular notice, and gave him a pressing invitation to Berlin.

Dr. Jenner's next presentation was to Blucher. He was very polite, and rather facetious. The next interview was with Platoff. To the astonishment of Dr. Jenner, who was accompanied by Dr. Hamel (a physician born on the banks of the Don, and acquainted with the Cossack language), the count proved to be quite a polished gentleman, had a knowledge of vaccination and practised it. He said, 'Sir, you have extinguished the most pestilential disorder that ever appeared on the Don.'

Naturally, Jenner loved seclusion, and a small circle of friends. He was singularly cheerful among those to whom he could freely unbosom himself, and was 'a boy' (like Wyndham) at the age of 60. He was fond of music—and when some one urged to be favored with a sight of the magnificent diamond ring, which the Emperor of Russia's late mother had given him—'Come, come,' replied Jenner, 'let us take a stroll in the garden, and hear 'the drowsy hum' of the beetle.' He did so, and played at the same time one of his favorite airs on the flute—which he blew with a singular felicity of embouchure. He was as philosophical an ornithologist as Buffon. His essay (yet in MS.) on the music of birds, is perfectly original; and his 'Dissertation on the Cuckoo' is one of the richest gems in the collection of the Philosophical Transactions.

While you were conversing with him, or staying in his house, you could not imagine that he was a MAN, with whose fame 'all Europe rang from side to side.' He never talked of his success—of his reputation—of his numerous and great friends—of his correspondence or encomiastic letters; but would much rather converse on the fruits of the earth, or the properties of animals. He had the true test of greatness of character—inasmuch as he was SIMPLE and NATURAL.

We need not say that science has lost in the death of Dr. Jenner, a great man, but nature permitted him to complete his grand discovery, and to render his measure of service to the world—a service which will benefit all succeeding ages, who will bless the name of JENNER.

EPITAPH ON DOCTOR JENNER.

Within this tomb has found a resting place
THE GREAT PHYSICIAN OF THE HUMAN RACE,— IMMORTAL JENNER; whose gigantic mind
Brought life and health to more than half mankind!
Let rescued infancy his worth proclaim,
And list old blessings on his honour'd name;
And radiant beauty drop one grateful tear,
For beauty's truest friend lies buried here!

Charles Hutton, L. L. D. and F. R. S. died on Monday the 26th ult. at his house in Bedford-row, in the 86th year of his age.

Dr. Hutton was born of humble parents at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in the year 1737. His scholastic attainments were considerable; and at the age of eighteen he opened a school in the vicinity of his native town. Amidst the toils of this profession, his application to Mathematical science was considerable; in this department the 'Ladies Diary' was generally the stimulus, and also the receptacle of his labours. In 1764 he published "A Practical treatise on Arithmetical and Book-keeping," and in 1768 a copious treatise on Mensuration.—The latter brought him into considerable note. The magistrates of Newcastle employed Dr. H. to make a survey of their town about 1771. The destruction of the old bridge attracted his attention to the construction of arches, and brought from his pen a valuable little book on "The Principles of Bridges," in 1772.

* This Museum was bought by government for £15000, and presented to the College of Surgeons, under the stipulations of its being open to public inspection, and of their delivering annual lectures explanatory of its contents.

† The genuine cow-pox appears on the teats of the cow, in the form of vesicles of a blue colour, which are surrounded by inflammation." This matter Dr. Jenner transferred to the human subject, and then from each to his fellow.

Mr. J. L. Crowley about this time resigned the Professorship of Mathematics at the Cadet Academy, at Woolwich, and Dr. H. after a strict examination, became his successor. His talents were now displayed to advantage, and occasioned his election to the Royal Society. On the resignation of Dr. Hersley as Secretary to this body, Dr. Hutton was elected one of the Council and Latin Secretary; but on the appointment of Sir Joseph Banks to the Presidency, a misunderstanding arose, and Dr. H. went out of office. In 1807 he retired from his Professorship at Woolwich, and obtained a liberal pension from Government.

Besides the works already mentioned, Dr. Hutton published The Diarian Miscellany, 5 vols. 12mo;—a Selection of useful and entertaining Parts from the Ladies' Diary, of which he was for a long time editor; Elements of the Conic Sections, 8vo. 1777; Tables of the Products and Powers of Numbers, folio, 1784; Mathematical Tables (Logarithms), 1785—five editions to 1811; Tables of Interest, 8vo. 1786; Tracts Mathematical and Philosophical, 4to. same year; Compendious Measurer, 12mo. id.; Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary, 2 vols. 4to. 1796; and many other Treatises on Mathematics, Projectiles, and Philosophy, translations from Despin, Ozanam, and Montucl; and (in conjunction with Drs. Shaw and Pearson) an Abridgement of the Philosophical Transactions, to which he was a valuable contributor, in 18 vols. 4to.

Dr. Hutton was exceedingly cheerful in his conversation and manner, and deliberate in expressing himself. His voice was agreeably clear and firm, with a slight northern accent.

"In the spring of the year 1822 (a gentleman writes) I called upon Dr. Hutton at his house in Bedford-row. After the Doctor's usual kind reception, I told him my object in the visit was twofold,—after the pleasure of paying my respects, to take the opportunity of requesting his assistance in procuring either a mathematical master, or school, for a young friend to devote his time exclusively to that branch of study, preparatory to his joining the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, as a cadet.

"I prefaced by saying, the lad was the son of a deceased Royal Engineer Officer, and it was on behalf of the widow that I solicited the Doctor's recommendation. 'Yes, Sir, (was the reply,) I know a good many mathematical schools, and more mathematical masters; before I specify either, tell me what the widow can afford to pay, that expense may regulate us in our choice.' I replied, I could not answer that question without reference to the widow. 'Well, Sir, perhaps then the shortest way will be, (for you will have my say to make to the widow, and doubtless the widow will again have her say to make back to me,) to send the lady herself to me, when it can at once be despatched; that will leave us now, Mr. —, the agreeable opportunity of talking upon some more interesting subjects.'

"After a short pause, and looking to the centre of the room, I observed to the Doctor, 'You have there, Sir, a very fine and interesting portrait of Sir Isaac Newton;—has it not lately come into your possession?'—'Yes, Sir, it is a very fine, and as you say, interesting portrait of that illustrious individual, Sir Isaac Newton, and it has lately become mine. That picture, Sir, was the last for which Sir Isaac sat to any painter; it was painted by —, and in the very last year of Sir Isaac's life—he was then in his eighty fifth year. The picture was executed for the grandfather of the present Earl Stanhope. When the late Earl Stanhope died, a few years since, he kindly remembered me in his last will, and bequeathed me that picture, which I greatly value. It was always deemed a fine and good likeness of Newton, and a pleasing resemblance it is.' After a few words more, I observed the Doctor's eyes were directed (and as I thought evidently with a wish of attracting mine also) to a print hanging by the fireplace, a portrait of Mr. Charles Hutton, from Cosway's well-known and admired picture of that gentleman, dressed in black, with a three-cornered hat upon his head, and an ear-trumpet in his right hand. Looking immediately at the print, the Doctor said, 'Doubtless, Mr. —, you know the picture from which that print was taken; it was done by Mr. Cosway. Charles Hutton, Sir, was a man of very considerable abilities—he was a relation of mine; and you shall hear a story most flattering to myself. Charles Hutton's mother, Sir, and my mother were sisters; and his grandmother and the mother of Sir Isaac Newton were also sisters. So you see, Sir, (pointing to the print, and looking at the picture of Newton,) through that man I am myself connected with that great and extraordinary person whose effigy we are contemplating.' The solemn earnestness with which the last sentence was uttered, and the complacency of his countenance, strongly marked the Doctor's great and inward satisfaction.

"Referring to the pictures, I said, 'I hope, Sir, you will leave to the world some such memorial of yourself, which our posterity may admire with as much gratification.'—'I do not know, Sir, if I ever shall be admired in this way after I am dead; but you shall see what Gabagan has done for me,' uncovering a bust on a corner table. He continued: 'There, Sir, is a bust of me by Gabagan;—my friends tell me that it is like me, but that it is too grave for me, though gravity is part of my character. For the likeness and expression I cannot myself be the judge; but I can vouch for the accuracy, for I have measured it in every point with the callipers.'

"Upon my taking leave, the Doctor insisted he would accompany me to the door in the street of Bedford-row. I remarked to him the place was broad, light, and very airy. He stepped two or three paces on, and pointing to the end of the street, said, 'Yes, it is a very agreeable place to walk in. From the chair in my study to that post at the corner is just forty yards; and from that post to the post at the other end of the Row is exactly the eighth part of a mile: so that when I come out to take my walk, I can walk my eighth part of a mile, the quarter of a mile, half of a mile, or my mile, as I choose. When I return to my seat, I know what exercise I have taken. I am in my eighty-sixth year, and, thank God, have my health in a remarkable way at such an age. I have very few pains, but am a little deaf.'"

BACHELOR'S FARE.

Funny and free are a Bachelor's revelries,
Cheerily, merrily passes his life;
Nothing knows he of connubial devilities,
Troublesome children and clamorous wife.
Free from satiety, care, and anxiety,
Charms in variety fall to his share;
Bacchus's bilases, and glances of misese,
This, boys, this is the Bachelor's fare.

A wife, like a caister, chattering, clattering,
Tied to a dog for his torment and dread;
All bespattering, bumping, and battering,
Hurries and worries him till he is dead;
Old ones are two devils haunted with blue devils,
Young ones are new devils raising despair,
Doctors and aurres combining their curses,
Adieu to dull purses and Bachelor's Fare.

Through such folly days once sweet holidays
Soon are embitter'd by wrangling and strife;
Wives turn jolly days to melancholy days,
All perplexing and vexing one's life,
Children are riotous, maid-servants fly at us,
Mammy to quiet us growls like a bear;
Polly is squalling, and Molly is bawling,
While Dad is recalling his Bachelor's fare.—

When they are older grown, then they are bolder grown,
Turning your temper, and spurning your rule,
Girls through foolishness, passion or malice,
Parry your wishes, and marry a fool.
Boys will anticipate, lavish and dissipate,
All that your busy pate hoarded with care;
Then tell me what jollity, fun, or frivolity,
Equals in quality Bachelor's Fare?

THE HOUR-GLASS.

(FROM THE LATIN OF AMALFI.)

The dust that here, with motion true,
In silence tells the waning hour,
Once glow'd with vital heat, and knew
The pride of honour, wealth, and power—
Was one, who, lost in pleasure's maze,
Relentless beauty's charms admired;
He saw, but withered in the gaze,
And in a fatal flame expired.
Still in this glass his ashes move,
Proclaiming to each pining breast,
That he, who knows the pangs of Love,
May never, never, hope for rest!

INTERESTING ACCOUNT OF A SOM-NAMBULIST.

(Concluded from our last.)

"The Somaambalist directs himself with unerring certainty through the most intricate windings, and over the most dangerous precipices; and, without any apparent assistance from the organs of sense, has been known to read, write, and compose."

BISHOP PORTER.

The next day, while Negretti was yet awake, the Marquis received company in his chamber; a circumstance which rarely happened. As the visitors increased, so increased the demand for chairs. Negretti, having in the mean time fallen asleep, rose up, after a short nap; and, after blowing his nose, he paid his respects to his tobacco box, and hurried away in search of chairs. What is the most remarkable, is, that while he held one chair with both hands, he came to the door, which was shut, when, instead of knocking at it, he let go one hand from the chair, opened the door, took up the chair as before, and carried it to the very place where it ought to be. This done, he went to the breakfast, searched for the key, and seemed vexed that he could not find it: he took a candle, and examined every corner of the apartment, and every step of the staircase, walking about with great quickness, and groping with his hands in hopes of finding the lost key. The valet-de-chambre slid it into his pocket, and Negretti, soon after putting his hand there by accident, found the key. Enraged at his folly, he then opened the breakfast; when, after taking out a napkin, a plate and two rolls, he shut it again, and went into the kitchen: there he dressed a salad, producing from a closet every thing necessary for that purpose, and when he had done, sat down in order to eat it. This dish they presently took from him, and in its place, gave him one of cabbage, highly seasoned. Of this he eat freely; and for cabbage they afterwards substituted a cake, which he swallowed in the same manner, without appearing to know any difference; a circumstance which leads one to think that he had not relished the salad by the organ of taste, but that the soul alone enjoyed this sensation without the intervention of the body. While he ate, he now and then listened, thinking he was called; and once persuaded himself that he actually was. Accordingly he went down in great haste to the hall; and finding no one, he stepped into the ante-chamber, and asked the servants if he had not been wanted. Rather peevish at being disturbed, he returned to his supper in the kitchen; and having finished it, he said, in a half whisper, that he should like to go to the next public house to have a draught, if he had any money; and he examined his pockets, without success: at length he rose from his seat, saying he would go, however; that he would pay the next day, and they would not scruple to trust him. With great alacrity he ran to the public house, which was at the distance of two gun shots from the house. He knocked at the door, without trying whether it was fast, as if he had known, that at so late an hour, it necessarily must be so. On gaining admission, he called for half a pint of wine; instead of which the landlord gave him the same quantity of water; this he drank, insensible of the difference, and, at his departure, said he would pay for it on the morrow. With all haste he returned homeward, and, on entering the ante-chamber, asked the servants if his master had wanted him. He then appeared in high spirits, and said he had been out to drink, and was the better for it. On this, a person forcibly opened his eyes, and he awoke.

In his sleep, one Friday evening, he recollected that the family tutor had said to him, that if he was seized with somnambulency that night, and would bring him a basin of soup, he would give him some drink money. On this he arose, while fast asleep, and said aloud, that he would plan a trick for the tutor. He accordingly went down to the kitchen, and repairing thence to the tutor's chamber, as directed, he reminded him of his promise. The tutor gave him a small piece of money; on which, Negretti taking the valet by the arm, carried him along with him to the public house, and, as he drank, related to him in a very circumstantial manner, how he had duped the tutor, whose money he thought he had received when he was awake. He laughed heartily, drank repeatedly to the tutor's health, and returned all life and spirits, to the house.

Once, while Negretti was in this state, a person hit him on the leg with a stick: he imagining it to be a dog, grumbled; and, as the person continued to strike him, he went in search of a switch, (and pursued the supposed dog,) brandishing it about with all his might. At length he fell into a rage, and in despair of finding the cur, he poured forth a load of abuse. He then produced a morsel of bread from his pocket, called the dog by a name, and kept the switch concealed; a muff was thrown down, which he took for the dog, and upon it he discharged his fury. Mons. Pigatti, in the course of his repeated observations upon Negretti, remarked, that every night he did something new. He likewise observed, that while his fit lasted, he did not perfectly enjoy either the sense of seeing, hearing, smelling, or tasting. We have seen that he would eat victuals of different sorts, without perceiving the change; he heard no noise, however great; he perceived no candle, though it was held near enough to scorch his eye-lids; he felt no feather, though his nose was tickled with one; yet his touch was sometimes tolerably acute, but at other times exceedingly dull.

DINNER COMPANY TO LET.—A CARD.

Messrs. Clack and Caterer respectfully invite the attention of the dinner-giving department to the following statement of facts.

It happens in London, every day, that gentlemen mount to sudden wealth by Spanish bonds, fluctuations of English stock, death of distant relations, and what not. When this event occurs, a carriage is bespoken, the ladies go to the Soho Bazaar, the father takes a house in Baker-street or Connaught-place, and the sons get blackballed at all the new clubs in the environs of the Haymarket. Yet still something is wanting. Like the Greek or Persian king (Messrs. Clack and Caterer will not be precise as to the nation) who pined to death in the midst of plenty, gentlemen thus jumping into high-life, from the abysses of Lower Thames-street and Saint Mary Axe, lament the lack of good dinner company. If they rely upon coffee-house society, their silver spoons are in jeopardy; and if they invite their own relations, they are ruined: nobody will come twice to such society. An uncle with an unpowdered pigtail, who prates of pepper and pimento: an aunt in a brown silk gown, who drinks every body's health; a son from Stockwell, who is silent when he ought to talk, accompanied by a wife, who talks when she ought to be silent, compose a species of society which may do very well at Kensington or Camden-town, but which, Messrs. Clack and Caterer confidently predict, can never take root west of Temple-bar. The consequence is that gentlemen thus circumstanced must "cat" their own relations, or nobody else will "come again."

Singers may be hired at so much a-head: every body knows, to an odd sixpence, the price of "Non nobis, Domine," "Hail, Star of Brunswick," "Glorious Apollo," and "Scots wha ha." Good set speakers for charity dinners may also be obtained, by inquiry at the bar of the tavern. These latter go through the routine of duty with a vast deal of decorum. They call the attention of the company in a particular manner to the present charity, leaving a blank for its name. They ascribe half of its success to the worthy treasurer, and the other half to the noble chairman, whose health they conclude with proposing, with three times three: and the accuracy of their ear enables them to cry "hip, bip, bip," nine times, interlarded at the third and sixth close with a burrah! aided by a sharp yell which Messrs. Clack and Caterer have never been able to distinguish from the yelp of a trodden lapdog. All this is very well in its way, and it is not the wish of the advertisers to disparage such doings. Far from it; "live and let live" is their maxim. Many gentlemen by practice qualify themselves for public speakers; but good private dinner company is still a desideratum.

Impressed with this truth, Messrs. Clack and Caterer, at a considerable expense, have provided, at their manufactory in Leicester-square, a choice assortment of good diners out, of various prices, who, in clean white waistcoats, and at the shortest notice, will attend to enliven any gentleman's dull dinner-table. Messrs. Clack and Caterer are possessed of three silver-toned young barristers, who have their way to make in Lincoln's Inn. These gentlemen respectively and anxiously enquire after the health of any married lady's little Charlotte: ask when she last heard from Hastings; think they never saw curtains better hung in the whole course of their lives; tenderly caress the poodle that occupies the hearth-rug; and should its front teeth meet in their forer-finger, will, for an additional trifle, exclaim, "Pretty little fellow! I don't wonder he's such a favourite." Messrs. Clack and Caterer are also provided with two unbenevolent clergymen, who have guaranteed a short grace, and undertake not to eat of the second course. These gentlemen tell a choice collection of good jokes, with a rigid abstinence from Joe Miller. They have various common-places at hand, which they can throw in when conversation flags. The one of them remarks that London begins to look dull in September, and that Waterloo-place is a great improvement; and the other observes, that Elliston has much beautified Drury-lane, and that Kean's voice is apt to fail him in the fifth act. This kind of talk is not brilliant, but it wears well, and never provokes animosity.

Messrs. Clack and Caterer beg also to acquaint the nobility and gentry, that they have laid in a couple of quadrillers and three pair of parasites; who take children upon their knees in spite of tamarinds and Guava jelly; cut turbot into choice parallelograms; pat plain children on the head, and assure their mamma that their hair is not red but auburn; never meddle with the two long-necked bottles on the table; address half of their conversation to the lady of the house, and the other half to any deaf gentleman on their other side, who tilts his ear in the hollow of his hand. Should either of these personages be so far forgetful of his duty as to contradict a county member, introduce agricultural distress, or prove the cause of the present low prices; wonder what happened at Verona, or who wrote the Scotch novels; gentlemen are requested to write "bore" upon his back with a piece of chalk (which the butler had better be provided with), and then to return the offender to the advertisers, when the money will be paid back, deducting coach-hire. Cheap goods rarely turn out well. Some dinner-giving gentlemen have hired diners out at an inferior price; and what was lately the consequence at a Baronet's in Portland-place?—A Birmingham article of this sort entered the drawing-room with a hackney straw adhering to one stocking, and a pedicular ladder ascending the other. He drank twice of champagne; called for beer; had never heard that the opera opened without Angrisani; wondered why Miss Paton and Brahan did not sing together (forgetting that all Great Russell-street and a part of the Piazza yawned between them); spilt red wine on the tablecloth, and tried to rectify the error by a smear of salt and Madeira; left the fish-cruets as bare as the pitchers of the Celides; and committed various errors, which Messrs. Clack and Caterer scorn to enumerate. All this proceeds from not going to the best shops and paying accordingly.

Messrs. Clack and Caterer beg likewise to acquaint a liberal and candid public, that they have an unexceptionable assortment of three-day visitors, who go by the stage to villas from Saturday to Monday. These out-of-towners know all about Webb Hall and the drill-plough; take a hand at whist; never heat their host at billiards; have no objection to go to church; and are ready to look at improvements on being provided with thick shoes. If up hill, or through a copse of the party's own planting, a small additional sum will be required. For further particulars enquire at the warehouse in Leicester-square. If Messrs. Clack and Caterer give satisfaction, it is all they require; money is no object. Letters, post-paid, will be duly attended to.—New Mon. Mag.

EPIC SCINTILLATION.

MR. EDITOR,—The following bombastic lines, penned during a leisure hour, (and original every inch!) are respectfully submitted.

Liverpool, Dec. 28th, 1822.

JUVENIS.

CANTO FIRST.

Away, ye highly fam'd poetic class,
Cried Momus, as he rais'd the sparkling glass;
With wine elate he grasp'd his doggerel pen,
And thus a daring rhapsody began:
"Ye worthless scribblers of poetic lore,
Pollute the peerless Parnassus no more;
Pope, Milton, Byron, Waller, all depart,
Nor move the passions—nor inform the heart.
Hence poor plebeians—Ay this sacred land,
Nor dare the efforts of my muse withstand;
She, far beyond thy vulgar herd shall rise,
And nobly soaring pierce the distant skies:
If in mid-air, her progress should incline,
To yon bright comet of the northern sign;
Round his devoted head, her shafts shall fly,
And hurl him lawless through the yielding sky.
Then o'er the clouds, by Pegasus swift led,
To where Parnassus rears its lofty head,
The sacred nine, her spirit shall inspire,
And warm a kindred soul with epic fire;
Touch with promethean hand, her colder clay
And call each latent faculty to day!
Foll'p'd—the paltry bards of ancient days,
Shall shrink to dust, and hide their feeble rays;
Virgil and Horace,—Homer,—all will die,
And their dull works in one sad ruin lie!
Yet, her bright page will not condemn them all,
From memory, and the roll of time to fall;
But—as the noble lion spared the bound,
Which whin'd for mercy, as it ticked the ground;
Embrace'd the trembling catfish as his friend,
Until the luckless hour that brought its end;—
So shall my muse extol great Tully's fame,
With verse sublime immortalize his name;
In doleful epigram his end deplore,
And bode him forth, till time shall be no more."
'Twas thus our ranting hero tun'd his string,
Whilst thus a rival rhymster 'gan to sing:
"And art thou, mighty Momus—rapt, inspir'd?
Is thy dull scound with admiration fir'd?
Has Rome's great genius—Tully's flow'ry page
Filled thy exalted soul with Grub-street rage?
Forbear—forebear, that meddling hand employ,
To beat the booby—or to cane the boy!
Leave panegyric to some abler hand,
Nor join the legions of the scribbling band.
Curb thy aspiring muse, nor let her soar,
To foreign skies unknown to thee before!
Should borrow'd pinions lift her high in air,
And her dark merit's prejudice declare,
Some truth, to check her progress will be found,
To dash th' aspiring mimic to the ground.
Let truth's bright fascinating form appear,
It strikes the bolder muse with panic fear;
Nor can smooth-tongu'd deceit prolong her stay,
With shades of night, she murm'ring shrinks away.
Offspring of heav'n, fair equity! descend,—
From caustic calumny my name defend;
Aid my just cause—nor let ambitious pow'r,
Oppress the weak—or o'er the helpless tow'r!
For thy strong hand detraction can restrain,
Or slander check,—the source of all my pain;
Stem the foul current of calumnious lies,
Or shoot the swift wing'd falsehood, as it flies!
Alas! nor heav'nly truth—nor justice can Convince of error self-approving man;
Still through the mask of candour is desecr'd,
The child of passion, and the tool of pride,
Whatever plausible forms are framed to hide!

• A contemporary bard.
† Momus is a schoolmaster.

Behold the fox each thorny thicket try,
To gain that shelter which his holes deny,
A short security in ditches find,
Till deep-mouth'd thunder echoes from behind,
Then starting forth—he panting licks the ground,
And falls a victim to the vengeful hound:
So, mighty Momus mars his neighbour's fame,
And triumphs o'er the ruins of his name:
But should pure justice interpose her hand,
And he convicted, in her presence stand,
How then would mighty Momus quake with shame
And shrink beneath the terrors of her name:
"How long (ah'd cry) vile creature wilt thou brave
My potent arm,—and haunt the Stygian cave;
Must I through all thy mazes still pursue,
Nor hold thy vices up to publick view?
No—vildest being of the vilest race,
Go—and thy path to Radamanthus trace;
He will consign thee to Tartarian gloom,
Ordain thy punishment, and fix thy doom!
Thou' slow my pace—what once I seize is fast,
Thou' long in coming—yet I come at last;
And thou vile caltiff—even thou shalt feel,
If lead my sandals—still my hands are steel!"

CANTO SECOND.

Now did our hero, to enrich his rhyme,
Attempt Parnassus' flow'ry steep to climb;
And straight determined, by presumption led,
The confines of the sacred groves to tread,
Like thirsty Satan, vaulting o'er the bounds,
Spurn'd at the gate that opens to the grounds:
Vampyres, and harpies, now inspire his strain,
A thousand furies hover in his train.
Scared by his discord,—startled at his cry,
Peace, friendship, happiness and virtue fly;
His murd'ring instrument he boldly draws,
To furnish morsels for his mighty jaws!
Wide op'ning these emit with horrid roar,
A rabid poison from ægean store;
The vip'rous squall cuts every social tie;
Whilst fame and reputation, wounded lie;
Dryads, and nymphs, affrighted quit the woods,
Distracted sylphs tremble in the woods;
And all bright tenants of the holy place,
Momus avoid, and fly before his face.
He eager stoops his ample paunch to fill,
With purest water from the limpid rill.
Now from the skies, with darkness dire o'ercast,
In horror dumb our hero stands aghast;
Forked lightnings play—the dreadful thunders roll,
And shake the misty air from pole to pole;
Hoarse deaf'ning peals, throughout the hill resound,
The caves re-echo—and the rocks rebound:
Not the fell wolf can greater terror feel,
Who trembling lies beneath impending steel,
Than seized our hero's perturbed frame,
His vaunted courage shrunk into a name:
Congealed his blood—and fix'd his vacant stare,
Upraised with dread, appear'd his horrid hair;
When arm'd majestic, issued from the wood,
A guardian genius of the sacred flood;
And, slow advancing, with indignant look,
Thus to the panic-stricken Momus spoke:
"Presumptuous mortal!—offspring of the shades,
Why with thy furies thus disturb our glades,
By what satanic power hast thou been led,
To thus defile, with sacrilegious tread,
These hallowed groves, from all the world confin'd,
Except the friends of genius and mankind?
Hence, monster hence—thy impious train restrain,
Nor with foul demon touch our spring profane;
Or by Alcides' arm shalt thou be hurl'd,
To seek for rivers in the nether world.
To haunt the gloomy borders of the Styx,
Where kindred harpies on thy soul shall fix;
Inflame thy breast with pandemonian pride,
And make thee pant for truth, yet truth deride:
Teach thee to cherish passions that deprave,
And make thee frequent the stygian cave!—
There, dark Alecto reigns in murky state,
And rules thy destiny, and guides thy fate!—
She—not the nine—thy barren genius fires,
And each mad bantling of thy pen inspires!
The hiss of Hydra from the Lernean strand,
When great Alcides smote with igneous brand;
The crash of battle echoing from afar,
And fierce Pelides thund'ring to the war;
When from the camp the Grecian stentor goes,
To bid defiance to the trembling foes;
The blinded Polyphemus on the shore,
When 'gainst Ulysses, he the rocks up-tore;
The raging Titans, when thy Pelion move,
And hurl Olympus 'gainst the angry Jove;
When from their han's, the pond'rous mountains rise,
And cleave with vengeance through the liquid skies;
Those hideous sounds commixed are not so dire,
As frightful din of thy discordant lyre;
Nor the rough bark of Cerberus more hoarse,
Than the harsh torrents of thy doggel verse;
Hence, babbling hence!—nor dare presume to implore;
Haste thy vile progress to the stygian shore;
Else my strong arm shall hurl you from the light,
To realms of chaos and eternal night!"
Thus spake the guardian form with mien severe;
And frowning vengeance, seized a massive spear:
With awful front in stern position stood,
To thrust the monster from the sacred flood:
When—as some thirly pard in bloodshed bold,
Fearful of brave defenders of the fold,

Straight shrinks from sight, his thickets to regain,
And swiftly bounding flies across the plain;
So, when great Momus view'd the mighty dart,
High way'd in air, to pierce his fainting heart,
His eye-balls glaring fiercely in his head,
To the four winds, his sail-broad vans he spread,
And howling, with the tempest's swiftness fled.

THE CLUB.

No. XXVII.—FRIDAY, JANUARY 31, 1823.

"Domestic Happiness, thou only bliss
Of Paradise that has surviv'd the fall:
How few now taste thee unalloy'd and pure—
Or tasting, long enjoy thee." COWPER.

OUR readers will no doubt remark a degree of similarity between the letter from Hezekiah Treacle, which appeared some time ago in 'the Club,' and that which makes so considerable a part of our paper to-day. Both these letters relate to the domestic unhappiness of the writers, but the cause of that unhappiness is, in the two cases, extremely different. The complaints of Mr. Treacle are occasioned by the alleged want of order and method in his wife's conduct; while those of Mr. Dimity result from the absurd, yet expensive education, which had been bestowed upon his spouse. Mr. Dimity is so fully aware of this difference, that his letter was accompanied by a request, that we would introduce it by some remarks on the folly of those persons who give to their daughters an education too expensive and fashionable for their circumstances. We omit to do so for no other reason, but because we think the subject too important to be dispatched in a few sentences; and shall probably, before long, consider it more at large.

The publication of Mr. Treacle's letter has considerably increased the number of our female correspondents; and we take this opportunity of assuring them, that, even before we were favoured with their letters, we were fully convinced that the ladies, generally speaking, had much more reason to complain of domestic infelicity than the gentlemen. Some of the details which have been sent to us, and which we shall certainly publish, will place this fact in a very striking and affecting light; and will, we hope, have a salutary effect upon certain persons whom they particularly concern. The writers of these accounts must, however, excuse us if we do not immediately present them to the public, but appear to give a preference to such communications as those of Mr. Treacle and Mr. Dimity. Had we no other reason for this apparent preference, than a wish to render the loveliest part of the creation still more amiable, that alone would be sufficient to account for our hastening to acquaint them with every particular in their conduct, which it is desirable they should amend.

We shall not any longer detain our readers from the perusal of Mr. Dimity's letter, except to observe that the unstudied, and somewhat abrupt manner, in which it is written, is, in our opinion, precisely that which would be adopted by a plain man, not accustomed to composition, when writing upon a subject in which he was personally and deeply interested.

MR. MEDIUM,

SIR,—My father was a respectable tradesman in this town, and bestowed upon me, his successor in business, an education which, although not so liberal and expensive as parents are now accustomed to give their children, he considered sufficient to qualify me for my station in life.

In our conversations upon the subject of marriage, his advice was, that I should not look too high for a wife, but marry a female of my own rank, as he judged it probable I should find such an one more capable of domestic management.

I married as I fondly thought, according to these directions. My wife was the daughter of a tradesman. Her parents had lavished money with unsparing hand upon her education, but it proved to be more expensive than useful—more glittering and showy, than solid and substantial. She was mistress of every polite accomplishment, and in addition, I supposed her to possess those domestic qualifications which gain the esteem of all, and which, in particular, render home more attractive to the married man. Vain supposition! my hopes have been completely disappointed, and the relation of my case is perhaps all the consolation I have now left.

The first years of our marriage were passed over without any occurrence of material consequence. We had discovered faults in each other, which we formerly fancied had no existence. This is undoubtedly the case with all married persons, but there exists in the human mind a capability of gradually becoming so accustomed to unpleasant objects or emotions, that they no longer produce uneasiness, and the faults, formerly so dreaded, become, from their frequency, scarcely noticed. The defect in my wife's education, became, however, in a few years, too apparent to be concealed. It was seen by every visitor possessed of common observation. Surrounded by a young and numerous family, instead of devoting her time and attention in endeavouring to contribute to their immediate comforts and pressing wants, her object has always been avowedly opposite. She entrusts them to the care of a hireling, to one who is destitute of maternal affection, or solicitude: apparently careless of their treatment, if they are kept from intruding upon her privacy. I contemplate the result of this treatment with the most unpleasant feelings. The children are so awed by the tyranny of the nurse, that they are afraid to give way to those lively and winning caresses which render childhood so attractive. Their look is demure and prim, totally unlike the unconstrained and joyous expression which is at their age so natural and pleasing; and I regret to add, that they have imbibed many vulgar prejudices which are common among the ignorant and uninformed. My remonstrances are urged in vain; my wife, I am sure, possesses maternal feeling, but her misdirected education, renders her insensible to the baneful effects of thus abandoning her children to mercenary care; and she declares she will not sacrifice her ease and pleasure to what she terms my ill-judged complaints, and I have, therefore, no other than the melancholy prospect, that the minds of my children will become imbued with low-minded prejudices, which will hinder them from acquiring those liberal principles which, in adult age, should form the basis and support of their conduct, and which should stimulate them to the performance of honourable and virtuous actions.

Other grievances also occur. My wife possesses a taste for reading, which she indulges in an immoderate degree. This taste, by being diverted from its proper and correct channel, has become vitiated. Historical books, or those upon general literature, have no attraction. Works of fiction alone, possess irresistible charms, and engross a great portion of her time; she peruses a new novel with all the avidity of a girl of sixteen, and sometimes deprives herself of sleep, in order to ascertain the catastrophe, or concluding incident of these pernicious works.

If not occupied by studies of this kind, she is either engaged in paying and receiving formal visits, or in accompanying a friend to lounge away her time, in the Square, or at an auction. This produces serious inconveniences. Mercers bills pour upon me from all quarters, which I am obliged to discharge, lest my credit in the market should be injured. The adage "Buy what you have no need of, and ere long you shall sell your necessities," has no effect. If an article is in her estimation cheap, it must be bought, for cheapness is, with her, the most convincing argument for the purchase. It is in vain for me to declare, that I could buy it much cheaper, for she constantly tells me that I am prejudiced, and that I am determined never to give her credit for judgment in any thing.

Her household duties are equally neglected. The entire management of the culinary department is given up to the servants, who act quite independently, and by their ignorance and carelessness, either waste or spoil most of the articles entrusted to their care. Remonstrance is here, also in vain; she has never been accustomed to manage the affairs of the kitchen, and she will not, therefore, interfere with the servants.

I have repeatedly represented to her the necessity of strict economy, and the importance of adopting plans more suitable to her station. I have pleaded the uncertainty of my present trade, and the gloominess of the future prospect, the enormous expense of housekeeping which such conduct has caused, and the exposure which must unavoidably be made, should my efforts in business prove unsuccessful, but all appears useless; she ridicules my arguments; insists upon the necessity of keeping up a genteel appearance, and with peculiar pertinacity, continues in her usual career. As a last resource, I have therefore adopted the expedient of Hezekiah Treacle, and hope that this public appeal will prove more successful than my private remonstrances. I remain, Sir,

Your obedt. Servant,

JOHN DIMITY.

NATURAL HISTORY.

LEVIATHAN.—The strange New Jersey monster, which was taken by the citizens of New Jersey, denominated a fish, has arrived in Baltimore, for the examination of the curious. What strikes us with peculiar surprise are the two legs, terminating with claws from the palms, and situated near the tail. They appear to be not much larger than a man's arm, and the question is, what they could be intended for, so little capable as they must have been to support a weight so unwieldy. An intelligent friend has suggested, that this animal must have derived its sustenance from the bottom of the sea; that these legs would serve to propel the body forward, where the water was too shallow for his fins. On such points conjecture is endless, and often so totally various from fact, that it only serves to confuse and perplex, instead of illuminating the subject. The six rows of teeth, with which the mouth is fortified, are remarkably small, but sharp. It has likewise five gills, folding one over the other, from which it has been conjectured, that the animal could live a long time under water. The body is perfectly free from scales, encompassed with a rough skin, somewhat resembling that of the seal. We shall not undertake to describe this phenomenon; it may well be remarked, how little we still know of nature, notwithstanding all the researches of science. This animal is welcomed by the scientific world, as a stranger, whose habits and properties we have yet to learn, and who appears amongst us just to excite, without gratifying, curiosity. Perhaps, from the time of his creation, this is the first time that one of his species has ventured so near the abodes of inhospitable man, and this solitary adventurer pays his life as the forfeit. This sub-marine Columbus went in quest of a new world; he has found it, and met with the reward of his more celebrated predecessor—persecution and ingratitude. Shakespeare was right when he said, that there are more things in heaven and earth than were ever dreamed of in our philosophy.

FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

EVENING DRESS.—Pomegranate colour crepe lisse dress: corsage to fit. The stomacher is composed of double rouleaux of satin, rather more than an inch apart, and is continued over the shoulder to the bottom of the waist behind, and is trimmed with fine blood, the same as the tucker. The band, or sash, is of crepe lisse edged with satin, and the ends of the rosette trimmed with blood. The sleeve is formed of three rows of small festoons of crepe lisse, edged with satin and blond. The skirt is decorated with an elegant net-work of pomegranate and white chienne, surmounted with a row of steel beads; a steel bead is introduced at each angle of the net; beneath is a tasteful trimming of crepe lisse in double reversed plaitings, intersected with ornamented semicircles of satin, united by a circlet composed of four satin rouleaux, with a row of small steel beads between each; a broad satin rouleau at the bottom of the dress. Urtling's lace is adopted in almost all dresses.

HEAD DRESSES.—1. Bolivar hat of black velvet; the brim narrow and equal width, is continued from the right side above the satin band of the crown, forming a double front, which is finished on the left with a small gold tassel; the centre is tasselled: small gold beads entwine the edge, and form an elegant spiral ornament. On the left side is placed a panache noir Aladdin, which falls gracefully to the right.

2. Cap of tulle; the crown covered with three satin tulip-leaves, edged with a small rouleau and double crepe lisse and blond beginning with a satin bow on the left side; between each leaf is generally introduced a demi-wreath of fancy flowers of a ruby or cherry colour.

3. Circassian turban of silver muslin, with a bird of Paradise, beneath which is a rich ostrich feather falling very low on the left side.

4. Bonnet of ponceau velvet; round the front is a rouleau of gros de Naples of the same colour; the velvet trimming is also edged with gros de Naples, and interspersed with variegated roses. This bonnet is very fashionable in black velvet and satin, with pomegranate-blossoms.

5. Bonnet composed of gros de Naples of two colours; the crown, which is round, and rather low, is of lemon colour; the front is of lavender colour, and very full, but confined by four flat straps, which are continued withinside, which is plain, and has a bunch of ranunculus on the right side. A high trimming of lavender colour nearly surrounds the crown, and is edged with a satin rouleau, as are also the three large paufs or bouillons in the front.

MATHEMATICS.

Solution of No. 58, by Miss Agnes.

First, suppose each quantity variable and the rest constant:—then will, $xy - 2yz = 0$, or $y = \frac{x}{2}$; also

$$xz - 3z^2 = 0, \text{ or } z = \sqrt{\frac{x}{3}}$$

Let $x = 40$; and substitute in the given equations these values of y and z , and we shall have $(a^3 - x^3) \times \frac{2x^3}{3\sqrt{3}} \times \frac{x^2}{4} = \frac{a^2x^3 - x^6}{6\sqrt{3}}$, a maximum by the question.

$$\text{Hence, in fluxions, } 5a^2x^2 - 8x^2z = 0 \text{ and } 5a^2x^4 = 8x^2, \text{ or } 5a^2 = 8x^2; \text{ therefore, } x = \frac{a}{2}\sqrt{5}; \text{ and } y = \frac{a}{4}\sqrt{5} = 17.09; \text{ also } z = \frac{a}{2\sqrt{3}} = 19.73.$$

Neat solutions have been received from Amicus; Mr. Jones; Mr. Williams and Mr. Hill.

Question No. 60, by Arithmeticus.

Two travellers, A and B, 100 miles distant from each other, set out to meet. A travels 3 miles in the first hour, 4 in the second, $5\frac{1}{2}$ in the third, and so on, increasing each hour's journey by $\frac{1}{2}$ of the distance gone in the preceding hour.

B sets out 3 hours later than A, and goes 10 miles in the first hour, 9 in the second, $8\frac{1}{2}$ in the third; decreasing each hour $\frac{1}{2}$ of the distance gone in the preceding hour. Where will these two travellers meet?

THE CONCENTRIC FRIENDS.

MR. EDITOR,—The Liverpool Concentric Friends are grateful for your very polite private communication; and, as soon as the different corresponding members can be apprised of the intention of publishing their papers through your Miscellany, you shall, agreeably to your desire, receive a parcel every other week. At present, I merely premise, that punctuality is a characteristic of the Concentric Friends; and that at their appointed meetings, epistolary communications are uniformly considered, before any other matters can be entered upon. I am authorised to furnish you with a report of the last meeting; and such of the subjects enumerated, as may be permitted by the respective writers, shall be occasionally forwarded. A few stanzas of my own, penned on hearing of the demise of the never-to-be-forgotten Jenner, are enclosed; they have no connexion with the Concentric Friends, but are purely the effusion of a grateful individual.

I am, yours, &c.

In the Reading Room, precisely at six o'clock, P. M. were assembled, F. Medicos, President,—C. Man, Secretary,—and, H. Constant,—P. Paradox,—and C. Trueman, Members. Simon Lightfoot arrived with a note from Friend Ashbury Frivolous, assigning as the cause of his non-attendance—"A dangerous cold already indicating influenza." At ten minutes after six was entered, and letters and packets presented from corresponding Friends N. NOL,—L. REVIL,—and E. BURGH.

The communication of Friend BURGH related to the Theory and Practice of Physic; and, by mutual desire, was handed to the President for his particular opinion against the next meeting. That of Friend REVIL contained a hint for the getting up of four sixpenny tales, each of which should possess a greater portion of Historical fact, and prove more interesting in incident and narration, than the entire Peveril of the puffing Sir Walter! And Friend NOL transmitted a monthly parcel of strictures. Viz;—a few upon some of the last year's papers of the Green Dragon Club,—a few upon Matrimony,—several upon the comparative merits of the Manchester Iris for 1822,—and a lengthy article upon Mr. Abernethy's wish for certain facilities towards the practical study of Human Anatomy.

LINES TO JENNER.

Jenner! Immortal Jenner! how Shall we our gratitude proclaim?
Before thy shrine shall nations bow,
And sound to Heav'n thy hallow'd name!—
Thy name already spread afar,
O'er sickly realms a healing star!

Shall we the sculptur'd marble raise?—
By Chantrey's art and skill, combine
Thy form, thy country, and thy praise,
Thy infinite and blest design—
Giving to countless myriads, health!—
To friends, delight!—to Kingdoms, wealth!

Shall we thy portraiture suspend
From infant breasts, and teach them how—
Illustrious Jenner was their friend—
To lip thy name with reverent bow—
And when matur'd, the same to do
With all their young—redeem'd by you!

Yes! on the scroll of time behold
Thy honours and thy deeds sublime
Emblazon'd with the molten gold,
Radiant and durable as time!—
With mankind only to decline,
And then but for a crown divine!

WEEKLY DIARY.

FEBRUARY.

REMARKABLE DAYS.

TUESDAY 11.—Shrove Tuesday.

Shrove Tuesday (observes a lively writer) is a relic of the carnival, and is more properly called, in some parts of the country, Pancake Tuesday, the shroving or confession of sin taking place in the Shrovetide or Lent, which follows it. It was the interval between flesh-eating and fish-eating, and so they judiciously filled up the time with pudding. The making of the pancakes used to furnish as much amusement in the kitchen as their mastication did in the parlour, the operators piquing themselves on tossing them skilfully in the pan.

WEDNESDAY 12.—*Ash Wednesday.*FRIDAY 14.—Saint Valentine.

The custom of choosing Valentines is of very long standing, and, like many others of a popular nature, is no more than a corruption of something similar that had prevailed in the time of Paganism. At the celebration of the Roman Lupercalia, amidst a variety of ceremonies, it was the custom to put the names of several young women into a box, from which they were drawn by the men as chance directed. The pastors of the early Christian Church, who endeavoured to eradicate the vestiges of Pagan superstition, substituted, in the present instance, the names of particular saints, instead of those of the women: and, as the festival of the Lupercalia had commenced about the middle of February, they appear to have chosen Saint Valentine's Day for celebrating the new feast.—The following amusing article, on this day, is extracted from the London Magazine for the present month:—

VALENTINE'S DAY.

Where is the village to which Valentines are unknown?

What terra incognita is there—what Ultima Thule (barren of love) to which the sun that rises on this day brings no joy—where the postman's double knock was never heard?

The air may no more be free from birds or summer-sporting flies, than the earth from its gay and gaudy missives (its butterflies) the February-haunting Valentines.

When letters shall cease to be written (but not till then), when love shall be no more,—then shall this amorous holiday darken and grow common: then shall it be a mere vulgar root (now, how full of rare and sweet flowers!) in the wilderness of days—a grain in the deserts of time,—Valentines pervade all space, like light.

Good-morrow, 'tis Saint Valentine's Day!

Thus singeth the mad daughter of the wise Polonius. That a wise man should have a mad daughter! 'Tis odd, and smacks of human infirmity. Not the madness, though, that savoureth of the infirm, but the madness coming from the wisdom, the tainted current from a clear source. What say the rills to this, the springlets, the founts, the ever-noisy ever-talking brooks? Is it not contrary to good descent, to effect and cause, to the lex natura, and so forth?—But hear her, the pining and mad-melancholy maid:—

Good-morrow, 'tis Saint Valentine's Day,
All in the morn bedtime,
And I a maid at your window
To be your Valentine.

And thou shalt be mine, Ophelia; and I will gather pale snowdrops and the sweet-smelling violet for thee. Thou shalt have a fair nosegay of winter flowers, thou rose of the northern desert; and, if they can be had, daisies (but not the rue), fennel and columbines, as of old; and, if thou wilt,—the willow.

Yet this day was meant for merrier things, perhaps. It is a red-lettered day, half-holy; no feast, no fast; but held free of care by a gentle charter, invested with a rich prerogative,—the power of giving pleasure to the young. If the tradition be true, that on this day each bird doth his mate, what work hath the carrier pigeon! What rustling of leaves; what chattering and singing in the woods; what billing by the clear waters!—Methinks, on this day should Romeo have first seen the gentle Capulet. On this day should Orlando have first glanced at Rosalind; Troilus at the sickle Cressid; Slender (oh! smile not, gentles) at Ann Page. The jealous Moor should have told his first war-story to-day; and to-day Prospero should have broken his spell, and made holiday in his enchanted isle, and crowned the time by giving to the son of Naples his innocent and fair Miranda. Fain would I have Valentine's Day the origin of love, or the completion, an epoch writ in bright letters in Cupid's calendar, a date whence to reckon our passion, a period to which to refer our happiness.

Once, it is said, our "vulgar ancestors" used to draw names on Valentine's eve, and such drawings were considered ominous: as thus—if Jacob Stiles drew the name of Sally Gates, or vice versa, Jacob and Sally were henceforward considered "as good as" man and wife.—I can well fancy how the country couple would look, flying at first in the face of the augury: Sally manning and blushing, half proud and half shamed, turning to her neighbour Blossom, and exclaiming, "nonsense!"—Jacob, on the other hand, at something between a grin and a blush, leaning on his shooting companions, or expanding a mouth huge enough to swallow every written Valentine in the village. I see him look (for help) from clown to clown; upwards and downwards; he whistles, he twirls his smock frock, he stands cross-legged, like the nephew of Mr. Robert Shallow, when the maiden Page invited him home-wards. 'Tis all in vain. The prophecy is upon them; and 'tis odds, but the name of Gates will sink and be merged in some three or six months into the cognomen of Jacob.

The diffusion of learning, and the "schools for all," have done a great deal of good. We are not, I thank my stars, reduced now to these annual or verbal Valentines. We shut up our blushes (with our verses) in a sheet of foolscap, and trust them to the protection of the twopenny post. At C— (where I spent some years) good Mrs. Baily used to go to "the box" at stated periods of the preceding evening, and relieve it from time to time of its too great burthen of love. You might see, towards dusk, girls (in pairs) or straggling youths, dropping their indiscretions into the yawning chasm; sometimes this was boldly done, but oftener timorously, and the quickened step of the amorist retreating from the letter-box, or passing, with an air of indifference, onwards, betrayed all he (or she) wished to conceal. Then the next morning! There was an additional postman employed—the ordinary man, grey-headed, and sure, but slow, was deemed insufficient. The "London letters" were not delivered at the accustomed time: and on asking the maid-servant, she would reply, with a tinge on her cheek, that "she believed it was Valentine's Day." Oh! well believed. She was never mistaken. But the postman comes. "Three for Miss L—, four for Miss C—, seventeen for Mr. —" Hush! it will never be believed. It cannot be: it is a jest—a fable—a monstrous, impossible—it is the truth—or near it. Oh! those were careless days. They were, but they are gone. No Valentines come now, as Crockery would say. I must bid farewell to all those pleasant periodicals—the pierced hearts, and the quaint rhymes, which showed my twopenny well spent—

—Oh! farewell!
Farewell the billing doves and the bent bow,
The gilded arrows, the aye-furning torch,
The crooked lines, the letters huge and wrong.
And oh! you painted jokes (of man or maid)
Who humblest love's had spelling counterfeited, Farewell! Omega's occupation's gone.

The first Valentine I ever opened was at C—. I had but lately left school, and was then a fair, young-looking, active boy of seventeen. I had read all the poets, but the style of this love-letter puzzled me. It compared me to the rose, and the violet, and the curling hyacinth (I had always been anxious that my hair should curl)—my eyes, I was informed, were like a diamond, and my teeth like pearl or ivory. It certainly seemed odd—odd, but agreeable. I was like the bishop who doubted the authenticity of Gulliver's Travels. To say the truth, I thought the writer must be somewhat partial. That she was generous was quite clear, from the expense of which she had been guilty. The Valentine was radiant,—all gold and gay colours, red and yellow, and blue, and embossed, and glittering with devices, all of love. It was like a dream,—so fine. I had never seen any thing like it, except the last scene of a pantomime. I was like Belinda, when

—if report say true,
Her eyes first open'd on a billet doux.

In short, I was satisfied,—delighted—what is the word? enchanted!

As I received the first Valentine at C—, so also I wrote there my first Valentine, my first verse. The writing was disguised, the wax was dotted with a fork, the paper crumpled; and, so misused, the soft sheet of "Bath post" was committed to the letter-box. The next day how I laboured to arrive at a look of indifference. How I hoped and feared, and was perpetually hovering on a blush when the subject was mentioned. At last, I heard that "Miss — had received a very pretty Valentine." Indeed?—Yes, and by no means a common one." Oh! heart, what rich and delicious palpitations were thine. I trod on air; I bounded like a fawn: I was wild with joy. I had sent my love-verse to my fair neighbour, (at the next door) and about seven o'clock, I laid my "evening ear" to the thin partition wall, and actually heard part of the verses recited on the other side.

The advantage of Valentine-writing is, that it pleases giver and receiver, while it becomes both. It is not like a letter of business,—nor that which passes between a dun and his debtor, or between master and servant, or Editor and Contributor—nor even between lovers on ordinary occasions, for sometimes there is a firefulness even in those, a dispute to be made up. This, on the contrary, is a prize, a pleasure without alloy.

Who would not have a Valentine? Is there any one so unprofitably wise as to decline it? Let him stay at home and be thankful. Let him rail at the quick-jarring knocker and the frequent bell. They can have no delights for him. Yet the chiming of the brass is musical to my ear, and the twanging of the wire harmonious. Oh! lads and lasses, and holiday-loving sages, is not this a delightful day,—this day of Bishop Valentine? His diocese is the air, and he, so with good Dr. Donne (mark, reader, what a fine line! reveal to thee)

—Marries every year
The lyric lark, and the grass-embowering dove.

and fills the winds with melody, and life with hope and satisfied love that never cloy. Bright Love! Methinks I could splinter a lance in his behalf, or mark out a measure of verse.

I own that I am somewhat of a devotee. I love to keep all festivals, to taste all feast-offerings, from firmly (or frumety—frumentum) at Christmas to the pancakes of Shrovetide. These things always seem better on those days; as the bread "in the holidays," is ever better than the bread at school, though it come from the same oven. Then it must be the same! By no means—to us. Freedom and home plant a different relian upon the tongue, and the viands are transmuted, sublimed.

What is the + on a Good Friday's bun,—is that nothing? What is the goose at Michaelmas? What is the regale at a harvest home,—is that nothing? Are the cups, the kissing, the boisterous jollity, the bubbling on the fragrant hay, the dancing, the shouting, the singing out of tune—nothing?

Why then, the world and all that's in't is nothing;
The covering sky is nothing; Bohemia nothing.

It is WE who make the world. It is our imagination which lifts earth to heaven, and robs our women is the garb of angels. And is this not better and wiser than if we were to measure with the square and the rule, and to fashion our enjoyments by the scanty materials (the clay) before us, instead of subliming them to the uttermost stretch of our own immortal capacity?

So it is, that Valentine's Day, which with the Laplander and the Siberian is clad in a cold grey habit, is with us rose-coloured and bright. We array it before-hand with hues gayer than the Iris. Our fancies, our hopes, are active. Custom has decided that it shall be a day of love; and though Custom is but too often a tyrant and spurned at, in this case he has always willing subjects. A Valentine—who would not have a Valentine? I ask the question again.

Hark! the postman is sounding at the door. How smart is his knock, how restless his tread upon the pavement. He comes burthened with gay tidings, and he knows it. Door after door is opened before he knocks. The passages are filled with listeners, and the windows thronged with anxious faces. How busy, how expectant are the girls. Observe, the copper is parted from the silver, and ready for immediate payment—or the solitary sixpence is brought forth, with a doubt (between hope and fear) as to its being required. The carrier of letters is pitied, "because he has such a load;" the neighbours are noted,—those who receive Valentines, and particularly those who have none. If you look from an upper window, you will see the parlour crowded. You may hear the loud laugh, and see the snatch, the retreat, the struggle to get a sight of the Valentine. In general the address is in a feigned hand; sometimes it is very neat, and written with a crow quill; but oftener the letters are so staring and gaunt, that the serious postman forgets his post and almost smiles. The giver, the receiver, the messenger, are all happy for once. Can a victory by land or by sea do as much? Can a dinner—a dance—a coronation? No; some of these are sensual, and all have their drawbacks. It is only on Valentine's day that enjoyment is pure and unalloyed. Never let us permit the spleenetic to rail at it without defence. Above all, never let us allow its pleasant privileges to fall into disuse or decay.

FINE ARTS.

REMARKABLE FOREIGNERS

The attention of the professors and lovers of the Fine Arts in the metropolis has been directed, during a few weeks past, towards three remarkable foreigners, M. Cleisse of Berne, M. Roussel of Lille, and M. Debrayat of Lyons, who have lately arrived amongst them. The first-mentioned person has distinguished himself as a teacher of gymnastic exercises, and is his own best example of their beneficial effects in improving the health and increasing the strength and beauty of the human figure. M. Roussel has been long known on the Continent by the appellation of "L'Hercule du nord," and Debrayat (although more recently) by that of "L'Hercule du Midi;" and both have exhibited themselves, and sat as models to artists of great reputation abroad, and at various continental academies of the Fine Arts, from which they have brought very flattering testimonials of their excellence, so far as regards the beauty and grandeur of their forms, and the spirit and genius with which they display them in attitudes, similar to those of the finest of the antique statues which have descended to us, and in others of a great and energetic character.

In the story of Roussel there is something highly interesting. Like an invincible Pancratiast of ancient Greece, who had finally retired, amidst the plaudits of the spectators from uninterrupted victories which he had gained at Olympia, or Delphi, to his native country, he returned to his loaded with honours, and, what is more useful to himself, with wealth sufficient to enable him to purchase in the neighbourhood of his native city a farm of many acres, which he carefully cultivates. His strength infinitely surpasses that which usually falls to the lot of man, and no longer suffers the imagination to be astonished at the prodigies attributed to the hero whose name he takes. It is reported of him, that he has stood under a weight of 2000 lbs. supported by a board on his back; and has walked round the Halle au blé at Paris, carrying on his back two sacks of corn, and a man bearing another sack, making altogether a load nearly equal to eleven hundred weight!

M. Roussel having been led by curiosity and the fame of this country to make it a visit, has, with great complaisance and liberality, consented to exhibit the athletic powers and excellent proportions of his figure to our artists for their study and improvement. For that purpose he appeared at the rooms of Mr. Henry Sass, in Streatham Street, on Monday last and the preceding Thursday, before his scholars and many other persons who had assembled there, including, on the day first mentioned, several Members of the Royal Academy of the Fine Arts.

Although his figure is below the middle stature, being only five feet two inches in height, yet that defect, if it is one, is immediately forgotten on a view of the grand and powerful expression of his muscles, and the agility and suppleness of his movements. He successively placed himself in the attitudes of fighting and dying gladiators, of the Hercules farnese and other antique statues, as well as in that of the Atlas of Michael Angelo; and then rapidly threw himself into numerous postures of his own invention, representing athletes or warriors engaged in combat or expiring; and into others of an equally fine character, which excited the admiration of the judicious and enlightened assembly, and merited the applause which was bestowed on him.

As the room is surrounded by plaster casts of many antique statues, a fair opportunity was afforded to the company of comparing his form with that of several of those so much celebrated; and it is but justice to observe, that although he might in some instances appear inferior in that which has been named ideal beauty, yet he excelled in energy and expression; which naturally led to this serious reflection, that perhaps too much had already been sacrificed by the artists of modern Europe to the slavish study of that part of antique sculpture which had hitherto held the first rank in the galleries of Italy.

The feats of strength and activity of M. Roussel are unexampled, of which the following are an instance or two:—He sat on the ground with his feet extended, and by the mere strength and elasticity of his muscles, he sprang on his feet, holding at arm's length a half hundred weight in his right hand; and again resuming his place on the ground, he bore two men in his arms, stretched out, and without a rest, and sprang in like manner on his feet with that great load.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

This year's Prospectus of Lectures, beginning this day, at the Royal Institution, offers much of promise to science. Those on Experimental Chemistry, including the principal operations of Chemical Analysis, are by Mr. Brandle; those on the Improvements and Discoveries that have taken place in Natural Philosophy, and particularly in the subjects of Optics and Magnetism, by Mr. Millington; those on Comparative Physiology, comprising an examination of the Structure and Economy of the different classes of Animals, by Dr. Roget; those on the Scientific Principles of Arithmetic (considered as a branch of the Mathematics) and the Elements of Algebra, by Mr. Walker; and those on music by Dr. Crotch.—Feb. 1, 1823.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—You will much oblige a constant reader by inserting the following remarks on the science of Magnetism.

Having attended the philosophical lectures of Mr. Clarke in Manchester a few weeks ago, I was highly gratified by his theory of Magnetism, as it was altogether new to me, and at the same time seemed very plausible; but being partial to the old term attraction, I determined to put it to the test.

Mr. Clarke's theory was, that an emanation flowed from the magnet, and displaced the atmosphere between the magnet and the steel: and that the pressure of the atmosphere on the opposite side of the steel forced it to the magnet. That the magnet did not throw out invisible hooks to pull the steel to it, for, that he had employed an highly magnifying power and could see none, that he had put his finger between and could feel none; and that if any thing tangible passed between them, it must be sensible to the sight or touch.

Now to examine this theory I employed a steel needle ballanced on a vertical pin, and placed it under the exhausted receiver of the air pump, and found that the needle was attracted and repulsed exactly the same as it was before exhaustion, and that iron filings and other bodies were attracted in the vacuum the same as before.

As there was no air in this case in the receiver to push the needle to the magnet, I cannot conceive that the air influences it.

Mr. Clarke allowed that glass is impervious to electricity and air. But it is not so to magnetical influence; to this I gave a fair trial and used two receivers one inside the other, and the magnet acted through all.

Mr. Clarke's theory, in my opinion, implies many contradictions; for, if the emanation be sufficient to displace the air, how does it happen that the air being weaker forces the steel against the superior stream?

I hope some of your more able correspondents will take up this subject, and that one of Sir Isaac Newton's fundamental laws shall not fall to the ground unless better supported. Yours, &c.

[In the letter of Veritas in our last, for materials, read material; and for obscurity read obscenity.]

A GENTLEMAN.

MR. EDITOR,—Your correspondent Veritas wishes to "ascertain the point, distinction, or qualifying material which constitutes the gentleman;"—I shall endeavour to give him the distinguishing marks of one, as when an artist would express any remarkable character in sculpture, he endeavours to work up his figure into all the perfections his imagination can form, and to imitate not so much what is, as what may or ought to be.—I shall follow his example, with the idea that I am going to trace out a true gentleman, by assembling together such qualifications as seem requisite to make the character complete.—And in order to this I shall premise in general, that by a gentleman I mean a man completely qualified, as well for the service and good, as for the ornament and delight, of society. When I consider the frame of mind peculiar to a gentleman, I suppose it graced with all the dignity and elevation of spirit that human nature is capable of. To this I would have joined a clear understanding, a reason free from prejudice, a steady judgment, and an extensive knowledge. When I think of the heart of a gentleman, I imagine it firm and intrepid, void of all inordinate passion, and full of tenderness, compassion, and benevolence;—when I view the true gentleman with regard to his manners, methinks I see him modest without bashfulness, frank and affable without impertinence, obliging and complaisant without servility, cheerful and in good humour without noise. These amiable qualities are not easily obtained; neither are there many men that have a genius to excel this way. A finished gentleman is perhaps the most uncommon of all the great characters in life. Besides the natural endowments with which this distinguished man is to be born, he must run through a long series of education. Before he makes his appearance and shines in the world, he must be principled in religion, instructed in all the moral virtues, and led through the whole course of the polite arts and sciences:—he should be no stranger to courts or camps; he must travel to open his mind, to enlarge his views, to learn the policies and interests of foreign states, as well as to fashion and polish himself, and to get clear of the natural prejudices, of which every country has its share. To all these more essential improvements, he must not forget to add the fashionable ornaments of life, such as are the languages and the bodily exercise most in vogue; neither would I have him think even dress beneath his notice. It is no uncommon thing to meet men of probity; there are likewise a great many men of honour to be found;—but a true gentleman is what one seldom sees!—As the great poet animates all the different parts of learning by the force of his genius, irradiates all the compass of his knowledge by the lustre and brightness of his imagination; so all the great and solid perfections of life, appear in the finished gentleman with a finished gloss; every thing he says or does is accompanied with a manner, or rather a charm that draws the admiration and good will of every beholder.

ECYOB.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I did not intend to have addressed you again so early had not the intemperate zeal of an individual signing himself "A Lover of chaste acting" led him to put questions, which, however foreign from the subject of my last letter, your justice will not deny me the privilege of answering.

The 1st question is—Does V. P. mean to place upon a par Mr. Vandenhoff and the person who now assumes his characters? I answer certainly Yes, in despite of prejudice and many years favoritism on the other party.

Your correspondent asks "am I endeavouring to detract from Mr. V.?" and then he talks about the empty benches. Why Sir, I could not mean to detract from Mr. V. when my letter merely went to expose the misrepresentations of the Scotch paper with respect to that gentleman, and to state in reply the plain truth; and yet your correspondent has thought proper in his angry effusions to introduce foreign matter, and indulge in odious comparisons and unprovoked remarks.

With respect to the hackneyed charge of playing to empty benches, it is well known that Mr. Vandenhoff (as well as others) has often experienced the same unhappiness. Mr. V. last season at Liverpool, with all the "pomp and circumstance" of a newly embellished theatre, and after two years absence, played "Brutus" to £15; and his other characters to very trifling receipts; nor does this in the least detract from Mr. V. for it is the common fate of all provincial and most London actors till their benefits take place; and does not even the lady who performs leading characters in tragedy here, and who is universally admired, frequently play to empty benches?

In conclusion, your correspondent states "in his judgment that in the performance of Mr. V. we witness something like a classical taste, a correctness and propriety of pronunciation, a grace and dignity of gesture, a suitableness of person, FACE and action, which we in vain look for in the present usurper of his parts."

This is so preposterous and absurd an attack on a performer who has acted nearly three seasons in a theatre with general approbation, that it requires and deserves no further answer, and must recoil on the anonymous censor.

If Mr. V. had come here and driven his respectable successor from his situation in the manner he has done at Liverpool, who would be then and who is now the usurper.

I am, Sir, yours &c.

LITERATURE.

HIS MAJESTY'S LIBRARY.

Some difference of opinion prevails as to the fate of this immense and invaluable collection. Several illustrious foreigners have used their utmost efforts to purchase it; and the reputation of our Monarch depends in no slight measure upon his decision. It is stated by some to contain 50,000, by others 90,000, and many hesitate not to affirm that it comprises 120,000 volumes!—It was chiefly formed by Mr. G. Nicol, our late King's Bookseller.

We, however, have reason to believe that the King has written to the Earl of Liverpool presenting this unequalled collection to the BRITISH NATION; and that the British Museum will be altered and enlarged for its reception.

VARIETIES.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—This structure was 36 years in building, and cost 736,722l. sterling. It is 500 feet long, and 250 feet wide: the summit of the dome is 340 feet high. St. Peter's at Rome was 135 years building: it is 729 feet long, 364 wide, and 437 feet high to the summit of the cross.

PEVERIL OF THE PEAK.—We have just seen a letter from Edinburgh in which it is stated, that the first edition of Peveril of the Peak consisted of 30,000 copies. The work sells at two guineas. From these data it has been estimated that, after a handsome allowance has been deducted for all possible expenses, the author will not clear, by this single edition, less than £20,000. The Author had another work in the press before Peveril was published.

SINGULAR WILL.—An inhabitant of Montgaillard lately deceased, left the following testament: "It is my will that any one of my relations who shall presume to shed tears at my funeral shall be disinherited; he, on the other hand, who laughs the most heartily, shall be sole heir. I order that neither the church nor my house shall be hung with black cloth; but that on the day of my burial, the house and church shall be decorated with flowers and green boughs. Instead of the tolling of bells, I will have drums, fiddles and fifes. All the musicians of Montgaillard and its environs shall attend the funeral. Fifty of them shall open the procession with hunting tunes, waltzes, minuets." This singular will created the more surprise, as the deceased had always been denominated by his family, the Misanthrope, on account of his gloomy and reserved character.

CARLSRUHE.—Dr. Tiedemann is publishing a great work, under the title of Representations of the course of the Arteries of the Human Body, in their regular and irregular state, designed from Nature, of the size of Life, with explanations in Latin and German. It will be completed in 4 Numbers, each containing 18 plates, engraved on stone, and the arteries colored. The work is the result of 16 years labor, and the dissection of above 500 subjects.

RESURRECTION MEN.—Mr. Abernethy, it is said, has addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, on the absolute necessity of repealing the late Act of Parliament which subjects Resurrection Men (as they are called) to severe punishment for violating the sanctity of the tomb. Under the present restrictions dead bodies are become very scarce in London, and some of the dissecting rooms are absolutely without an adult subject.

UNFORTUNATE PRIZE.—In the Scotch rebellion of 1745, at the battle of Falkirk, Major Macdonald having dismounted an English officer, took possession of his horse, which was very beautiful, and immediately mounted it. When the English cavalry fled, the horse ran off with the victor, notwithstanding all his efforts to restrain him; nor did it stop till it was at the head of the regiment, of which, apparently, its master was the commander! The melancholy and at the same time ludicrous figure which poor Macdonald cut, when he saw himself the victim of his ambition to possess a fine horse, which ultimately cost him his life on the scaffold, may be easily conceived.

UNIVERSAL CEMENT.—To an ounce of mastic add as much highly rectified spirit-of-wine as will dissolve it. Soak an ounce of isinglass in water until quite soft, then dissolve it in pure rum or brandy, until it forms a strong glue, to which add about a quarter of an ounce of gum ammoniac, well rubbed and mixed. Put the two mixtures together in an earthen vessel over a gentle heat; when well united, the mixture may be put into a pial and kept well stopped. When wanted for use, the bottle must be set in warm water, when the china or glass articles must be also warmed, and the cement applied. It will be proper that the broken surfaces, when carefully fitted, shall be kept in close contact for twelve hours at least, until the cement is fully set; after which the fracture will be found as secure as any part of the vessel, and scarcely perceptible.

PIG AND HORSE RACE.—We have heard of a gentleman in this town who has betted that in two months he will produce a pig to run against a horse for the distance of 100 yards. The race is to be in an open field, and the pig is to run to its meat. The odds are in favour of the pig.—Glasgow Journal.

BENGALÉE NEWSPAPER.—The Bombay papers contain a notice of a new weekly paper, published in the Bengalee language, the first attempt of the kind, and edited by a learned Hindoo. In the first and second numbers were articles on the liberty of the native press, and on the trial by jury, which had been purchased with so much avidity that both were out of print. It appears under the title of 'Sungbaud, Cow-muddy,' or 'the Moon of Intelligence.'

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The philosophical query of 'A Constant Reader,' is inadmissible for two reasons,—first, because it is stale and vapid; and secondly, because the discussion would prove wholly devoid of interest, and (demonstrative solution being out of the question) interminable. If our Constant Reader is really ignorant of what has been written on the subject, we refer him to the notes on Randolph's Sermons.

J. T. K. S. not having forwarded the arguments of the Members alluded to, he must excuse us for declining to insert his letter.

J. C.'s Acrostic is good as relates to intention; but the composition is incorrect and inelegant. The same answer must be given to a constant reader.—His Lines are, however, more interesting; but equally susceptible of emendation.

J. B. M.'s VI, and last No. on The Augustan Age; together with Myself on the Waverley Novels; and J. P. W.'s Translations from Horace, shall be given in our next.

No. I.

In the Reading Room, precisely at six o'clock, P. M. were assembled, Friends Medicos, Constant, Frivolous, Paradox, Trueman, and Man; and at five minutes after six, the

Deliberation Chamber

was entered, and a letter opened from Friend Nol;—Contents—

MY DEAR SIR,

The Concentric Friends have unrestricted controul over all my contributions; their pleasure has the entire sanction of

Yours, &c. &c.

To C. MAN, Esqr.

N. NOL.

Moved by Friend Trueman, and Seconded by Friend Constant—"That the Strictures of Friend Nol upon the attempt of Mr. Abernethy to obtain Human Bodies for the Dissecting Rooms, from Hospitals, Poor Houses, &c. be now read, and considered."—Agreed, and read as follows:—

"A paper (by Mr. Abernethy) has been circulated in London, in which the writer remarks—'It is true, indeed, that Medical men have by degrees converted the hospitals of this country into schools of Medical Instruction.'—that is, into THEATRES OF ANATOMY. 'But,' (proceeds Mr. A.) 'this has often been done in opposition to the wishes of the benevolent directors of these charities.'

"Mr. Abernethy as a Lecturer on Anatomy, is deeply interested in this matter; unquestionably his students would be more numerous were Human Bodies in a sound state more easily obtained, and at a less expense. No doubt Mr. A. is slightly influenced by these considerations when he says—'There are unhappily in this, as in other countries, numbers who die without friends or relations to mourn their loss. If, then, the superintendants of Prisons, Poor Houses, and Eleemosynary Establishments, would but consent that the remains of those who die in such circumstances, or are unclaimed, should be made the subjects of anatomical instruction,' &c.—he would no longer bribe Resurrection Men to plunder graves!!! This is, indeed, an undisguised, a bold avowal! Mr. A. also endeavours to promote this object, by adulatory insinuation; he says,—'I know of no instance, except the present, in which the Governors of an hospital have, of their own accord, established and patronized a school of medical instruction, [dissecting rooms] in connexion with the practice of the institution [the care of diseased poor]. Surely then this act must be considered honourable to the Governors [How many of these Governors were medical, or the relations of medical, men?] It claims my especial gratitude.'—This cannot be at all doubted—for how much more grateful must it be to Mr. A.'s olfactories, to be engaged over a sound, than over a putrid, subject?

But, there is a more decisive tone assumed in the anomalous address of this presumptuous man, which cannot be passed over; we are told, that—'In other countries, hospitals have been founded and supported by the government, with a view to their becoming schools of medical [anatomical] instruction.' And again, that,—'In other countries the police can direct that to be done, which is contributory to the public good, THOUGH CONTRARY TO THE FEELINGS AND WILL OF THE PARTIES IMMEDIATELY CONCERNED.'

These are the avowed sentiments of Mr. John Abernethy!!

"Five hundred human bodies are obtained annually for the London Dissecting Rooms; and, as for these the Lecturers are chiefly dependent on disinterment, we can easily conceive that their students are frequently obliged to accept of quarters and members of subjects, which are, almost literally, masses of putridity and filth! Indeed, Mr. A. states, that they are obliged to depend 'upon a precarious supply of bodies which have been suffered to BECOME PUTRID,' even before interment! Then what condition must they be in when taken from the grave? This revolting consideration leads us to inquire—Is human dissection an indispensable requisite for the medical practitioner? It appears indispensable, inasmuch, as a student cannot obtain his diploma without exhibiting a certificate from his Lecturer, specifying that he has carefully dissected the human body. For what purposes is this complete course of actual dissection essential? Why must every muscle, from its origin to its insertion, every gland, and veins, arteries, and nerves, in all their ramifications, be traced and examined with the knife? Why have Munros, Bellis, Hunters, furnished such elaborate and exact representations from many thousand dissections, if these dissections can never be superseded by plates models, or museums? Were they, with Boerhaave, Haller, Cowper, Cheselden, Albinus, and others, urged on in these terrible investigations, by purely an insatiable propensity? Or, did they act the part of nefarious impostors, in professing, that pursuits and labours would prove useful to society, which were only calculated to enrich themselves? These queries require distinct and particular solutions!

"It is, indeed, a poor museum that does not contain subjects which are sufficient to convey as much, and as accurate, information to the student, as he can possibly obtain from the actual dissection of a human body, in which, from putrefaction, there is a general dissolution of continuity. Mr. A. would do well to consider this;—he should also fully and unequivocally explain what benefit can possibly result to society from an actual dissection of the trunk or extremities, every bone, muscle, gland, nerve, artery, and vein, nay, almost every fibre and particle of which may be now correctly shewn in plates, models, and natural and artificial subjects? Why should not lectures upon those parts be confined to these mediums? Were all the burial grounds and all the hospitals in Europe open to Resurrection Men and Lecturers, could they possibly ascertain more than that muscles, nerves, veins, &c. answer such and such purposes? Can they hope to explain the cause of muscular motion? To identify the active principle of nerves, or the nature of sensibility? Why then this disingenuous sophistry? To increase the pecuniary resources of Mr. A., Mr. B., with the entire host of dissectors, and resurrection men, must we still submit to violations of the grave? Nay, must our charitable efforts be made subservient to their duplicity, by law? Shall our chambers be opened perforce, and shall those remains which nature instinctively holds precious, be torn from us, under the most fallacious pretences? Surely, it cannot be!

"Alas!—the grave is no longer the resting place—the sanctuary—the last, the hallowed home of the mortal remains of humanity! Diabolical wretches invade it—it is robbed of the flesh and bones we loved, we embraced, we cherished!—And they are seized by Anatomical Lecturers, to be hoarded up in museums, or mangled and dispersed in rivers, ditches, and common receptacles of filth! Is this to be borne? Can the Clergy allow the consecrated ground to be thus despoiled of its sanctity? If they do we must find burial places elsewhere!

Why do not these Abernethys, these anatomical-pseudo-philanthropists bring forward their own deceased relations? Why do not they, as in the contemptible fiction of a pretended opium eater, bequeath their own carcases to hospitals and private dissecting rooms?—Then, and not till then, can we accredit them! And until then, they must (however elevated in fellowships and professorships) expect to be treated as knaves, ever remembering, that—'Specto ad utilitas respublica ut improbus punio!'

"This is an interesting subject; it contains many important considerations and queries—queries to which it behoves civilized man to attend! Anatomical Lecturers must be observed, and where they appear, if our places of sepulture are not secure and entrusted to men of virtue and fidelity, we must seek others; and should these be also invaded, we have no other resort than that of reducing the remains of our parents, children, and bosom friends, to earth, and consigning them, literally, dust to dust!"

Friend Medicos now moved "that the thanks of the Liverpool Concentric Friends be conveyed to Friend Nol, for his judicious and very interesting paper."—The motion was supported by all present.

"On mature consideration I am of opinion," observed Friend Paradox, "that dissections cannot be safely abolished; it is necessary that medical men should be instructed in the use of the knife, and how to operate dexterously." "True," replied the President, "but operations are not demonstratively studied in the dissecting rooms; neither, if the practitioner be well informed as to the construction, situation, and connexion of the several parts,—is it absolutely necessary that this dexterity in flesh cutting should be acquired in a human body—flesh and bone generally, will answer the purpose. The parts and structure of the human body, as well as the entire circle of comparative organization, are now well understood, and general dissections might be very safely abandoned: a morbid state of some of the viscera may occasionally arise, of which we are not accurately informed; but surely in such cases, persons having in charge the lifeless body, will never withhold a boon from themselves and the world, by refusing to have it examined. The observations of Friend Nol are very just, and were practitioners candid enough to declare the truth, they would admit that their subsequent practice owed very little to initiatory dissections. Self-interest is the chief object; and Lecturers advocate demonstrative instruction from the identical feelings that urge Spaniards to prosecute the slave trade, and Resurrection Men to the stealing of inanimate bodies."

"Every trade and profession aims at monopoly," observed Friend Trueman, "and many have obtained, by parliamentary enactment, some exclusive privileges. This appears to me a grievance; why not allow the human mind full exercise, and human ingenuity unrestricted scope? The paper of Friend Burgh is in point, and places this particular in a very just view,—I am fully of his opinion, and hesitate not to attribute many medical abuses, to immunities which have been injudiciously granted, and which are collusively exercised."

The paper of Friend Burgh was now referred to, and some discussion arose, in which Friend Medicos took a considerable part. By the next meeting the decision of Friend B. will have arrived.

THE AUGUSTAN AGE.

No. VI.

POPE has remarked, that 'poetry is by no means the universal concern of the world, but only the affair of idle men who write in their closets, and of idle men who read there.' If we except the affectation of contempt with which he speaks of his favourite pursuit, this definition must be allowed to be, in the main, correct. Mankind in general are but little interested with the visionary and unsubstantial joys of the poet. He is neither revered as the instructor nor as the guardian of the world: it is for amusement only that he is prized: he is seldom called upon but to beguile the listlessness of an idle hour.

Hence it is that a poet especially requires the decorations of taste and fancy,—and that his style and language should be graceful and fascinating. In spite of prolixity, dullness, and a score of other faults, the historian or the philosopher are read with eagerness. In search of knowledge, we do not regret the fatigue of scrambling over rugged, and unbeaten paths: but where pleasure alone impels, we soon grow tired of so unpromising a pursuit. The poet who cannot charm with the graces of elegant composition,—whose style is not clear and perfectly intelligible, must not expect any great forbearance. His work will be immediately thrown aside; and himself consigned to oblivion.

The poets of the present day are not likely to obtain, in future ages, an exalted and permanent station. But their failure will not be the consequence of the want of genius, so much as a want of the right cultivation and direction of it. Byron has been pronounced not inferior in genius to the greatest poets of any age or country. His imitator, Moore, is perhaps equal in this respect, to any English poet of the last century. Montgomery certainly possesses all the feeling and sentiment of Cowper. Milman, Dale, Rogers, and some others have more strength and fire, though not equal tenderness. But we fear that few of these great names will ever occupy the highest rank amongst the poets of Great Britain. Their works are a strange medley of strength and weakness. Stars of intense brilliancy are seen here and there; but the great expanse is dark and dreary. Their ideas are frequently beautiful or even grand in the extreme; but scarce an effort seems to have been made to bring them out with elegance or precision. We are continually reminded of the contrivances of Robinson Crusoe. In every joint the workmanship is visible; every thing, in short, is badly contrived and clumsily executed.

We do not intend to enter deeply into the discussion of LORD BYRON'S character as a poet: no doubt our readers have long been weary of this subject. Whether it be owing to any real or supposed falling off in his late productions, we do not pretend to know; but his Lordship's popularity seems to be already on the wane. Several satisfactory reasons may be assigned for this, independent of the intrinsic merits or faults of the poet. Few—very few of his readers, or even of his admirers, can possess many feelings and sentiments in common with him. Raving misanthropy may attract a crowd and a stare of wonder, but it cannot long hold the bystanders in subjection.

Maufred and Childe Harold are characters which none but a man bent on suicide can fully enter into. The rest of the world—that is, all the sane part of it—look on from a fearful distance with a mixture of terror, contempt, and pity. On their first appearance these, and some other works of a similar character, had a great effect upon the public mind. They threw it into a raging fever; and for a while it could relish nothing but what was loaded with super-numerary horrors. But a more correct feeling soon returned; and nature was reenthroned in men's affections.

The Atheistical tone which pervades the works of Byron must, in the end, prevent their success. The great majority of the reading world are too well informed to be much hurt, and of too correct sentiments to be greatly pleased, with his sophistical and blasphemous suggestions. And we should think that the man who seeks for arguments or abuse directed against the Christian faith, would turn elsewhere than to the pages of Cain or Don Juan.

With far less original genius MONTGOMERY has obtained and deserved higher honours from the muses. He has not by any means so much sublimity as Lord Byron, but his style is more highly laboured, his ideas generally better expressed, his subjects more adapted to the state of society, and his manner of treating them more just and natural. He is tender and engaging; full of sentiment and feeling; and yet does not betray a want of strength.

Byron irritates, terrifies, or perhaps disgusts; Montgomery soothes, captivates, and delights. The chord he touches vibrates in the heart of his reader. Sympathy is aroused; esteem and admiration are excited. Still, he is not altogether free from the weak and story-telling character with which almost every living poet is deeply tinged. Let any of our readers compare him with Pope, Gray, or Cowper,—or indeed with any other masterly poet of the last century,—and he will then be able to enter fully into our meaning. He will immediately discover that—when contrasted with them—the works of Montgomery assume a dull, monotonous appearance. There is often a degree of weakness in the expression, or perhaps we should say in the conception of his ideas. His verse, though not so careless and unpolished as most of his contemporaries, is not sufficiently easy. An effort is required to read it so as to render it distinctly intelligible. Sometimes he is abrupt; at others languid; and he always wants compression.

CAMPBELL'S 'Pleasures of Hope' is one of the most elegant poems of which the present day can boast. It well deserves the eulogium of Lord Byron—that it is the best didactic poem given to the world since Pope's Rape of the Lock. In poems of this description, we are, at present, very deficient. And yet this is a fine field for the exercise of genius. Here incident and precept are alike allowable; and a judicious intermixture of them, can hardly fail of being highly successful. The unnatural, over-charged, and blood-thrilling romances, which have lately been dressed up in the garb of poetry, and thus palmed upon the world, cannot be read with pleasure, much less with profit, after the unfolding of the plot is made known. But the plain, and unpretending record of the poet's own feelings,—the transcript of his own mind,—is ever sure of success. Goldsmith's 'Traveller' is a work of this description. Here we are presented with the workings of the author's mind. We have an unvarnished picture of his own feelings; and to this we return with increased delight. Nature presides in the poet's sentiments as well as his descriptions; and nothing can long please without this powerful recommendation;—with this, success is certain. It must not be supposed that the highest efforts of genius cannot be successfully exerted in descriptive and didactic poetry. Sublimity lies not in the subject, but in the manner of treating it. As in real life, so in poetry, the actions of the man, and not the dress he wears, must stamp his character.

With the poetical works of WORDSWORTH and SOUTHEY we are not well acquainted. Both these characters affect an eccentricity by no means favourable to them. This is displayed in the hexameters of the Laureat's 'Vision of Judgment'; and in the child-like simplicity of 'Peter Bell.' Perhaps both of these writers are most successful in their sonnets. Some of these display an exquisite delicacy of feeling, together with great poetical fervour.

MILMAN and DALE—both young men—are inferior in poetical talent, to few, if any, of their competitors. They have wisely chosen for the display of their talent, the most striking incidents of sacred writ. Here was a rich mine perfectly adapted to their genius, which had long been totally neglected. And the manner in which they have handled their respective subjects, proves at once the correctness of their judgments in the choice, and the powers of their genius in the execution. We are not inclined to draw a comparison between these two rival candidates for the poetic wreath; nor indeed would it be an easy task to do so. Both of them display a more than common acquaintance with the human heart. Hence their success in engaging and delighting it. They have, with more effect than we have often witnessed, combined the delightful with the sublime.—In short, they may soon stand in the very first rank of British Poets.

If in a few words we must give a summary of the prevailing character of our living poets, we should say,—that they have more genius and less judgment than the poets of the last century. There is throughout their productions, a continual aiming at embellishment,—a light, frivolous and gaudy character, which outweighs their superiority in point of talent. With regard to poetry at least, we seem to be rapidly hastening to that absurd, unnatural taste, which was predominant at Rome just before the extinction of the arts,—which event it not only indicated, but produced. Some passages in MOORE'S 'Loves of the Angels,' and BYRON'S work on the same subject, forcibly remind us of the celebrated figure of a Roman poet, (of the age to which we have just alluded,) in which the giant Typhon is represented carrying a vast mountain on his back, and a river flowing from it down his shoulders! Rant and bathos are scarcely marked more strongly in this instance, than in the productions of our two leading poets.

We now draw our remarks on British literature to a close. We have endeavoured to select as the subjects of criticism, those writers who are most deserving of attention, as well as those who have already obtained a decided popularity. Doubtless many, very many, have been omitted equal in talent, if not in fame, to those enumerated. But enough, it is hoped, has been done to give a correct idea of the present state of literature among us. For ourselves, we look with far other feelings than those of unmingled, or predominating pleasure, on the taste and literary character of the present day. We are yet young,—have no antiquated feelings to humour or to suppress,—and cannot with justice be accused of the very common partiality of old age to the years of childhood. Like the works it has been our lot to review, we ourselves are but the creatures of yesterday.—But on the score of youth and inexperience, we neither expect nor desire the forbearance of our readers. We wish to stand upon equal ground with those who may see fit to differ from, or oppose us.—With this sentiment, we take leave of our readers, and conclude our remarks upon 'The Augustan age of England.' Neve hæc nostra spectentur ab annis quæ ferimus.

THE AUTHOR OF "WAVERLEY," &c.

Of all the canes which are canted in this canting world—though the cant of hypocrisy may be the worst—the cant of Criticism is the most tormenting!—STARRS.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The merits and defects of the "great unknown" form subjects of controversy and criticism for every species of writers, from the ingenious scholar to the snarling, invidious, hyper-critic. We can find a Zelus snarling at Plato and Homer, where we cannot meet with a Persius, correct and generous in his opinions.—The author of Waverley has unquestionably conferred a great and lasting benefit on his country; he has, to all intents and purposes, combined the utila dulci of Horace—

Profit and pleasure, then, to mix with art,
To inform the Judgment, nor offend the ear,
Shall gain all votes.—FRANCIS.

Need I reiterate the public opinion of the novels written by this author? Need I say what has been said for years, and which the people of this and other countries know already, that he has "gained all votes," for blending useful instruction with innocent amusement? To become acquainted with the history of any country or nation, how perspicuous soever in style, or faithful in narration of events, we must have some idea of the language, customs, manners, &c. of such nation. Now the history of Scotland is greatly involved in doubt and obscurity, so that no chronicle could have so effectually (and at the same time pleasingly,) elucidated the local manners, &c. as these novels; and who can charge the author with partiality to his country? Has he not portrayed the various traits of English manners, with the same masterly skill, with the same ingenious pencil as he has done his own countrymen's? Has he not fascinatingly sketched the numerous situations in life, from the "swine herd" of the "proud Saxon Chief," to the Royal Courts of John and Elizabeth? True, he has left the sons of the "Emerald Isle" in neglect as yet, though report says that he is busily employed in combining materials for a "luring mirror" of the "sweet isle of the ocean,—Erin-go-Brah."—But, we are not deficient in this respect; Miss Edgeworth has produced admirable pieces, whose brilliancy of wit, originality and moral tendency justly rank them with the first novels of the day. The novels of Waverley are not (properly speaking) novels or romances; they have the descriptive charms of the former, without their frivolity; and the sublime pathos of the latter, without their terrific incredulity: superadded to this, are excellently entwined historical facts, finely polished, as it were, which we had but formerly in the rough. It is with mingled sentiments of surprise and regret, that I find many critics of the day endeavouring (it can never be any thing else!) to deteriorate the merit of these productions: some write from the opinion of others, without perusing the novels themselves; others deliver their opinion with all the stentorian eloquence imaginable, because the author has written so much! A third class of people, more egregiously ignorant, if possible, than either, unhesitatingly deliver their judgment on finding the taste of a friend or two similar to their own! The first of these classes has no critical stability, because it yields to every one's opinion; the second is too narrow-minded to allow the author a more than ordinary fund of variety; the third is composed of puerile opinionists, whose futile arguments demonstrate the extent of their knowledge.

I am sorry to find, by your last number, that your elegant and often judicious Essayist, J. B. M. has derogated, (I greatly fear) so much from his usual candour and equity of criticism, as to require a few good-natured hints from a reader of the novels of Waverley. He says, (Augustan Age No. IV.) that, "the fondness for the barbarous idioms of Scotland's rudest peasants, strongly argues against the taste of the present age;" and that "the works of Ossian and Burns introduced a rage for the scenery, dress, manners, &c. of Scotland, which was amply satisfied in these novels."—By the bye, the former quotation is subsequent to the latter. But, Ossian and Burns could not have introduced this rage, if their works were written in "the barbarous idiom of the rudest peasants of Scotland."—Yet such was the fact, Burns's "Halloween," and "Cotter's Saturday-Night," are written in the barbarous idiom of, and describe the innocent local amusements of the "rudest peasants of Scotland." Dr. Currie, the amiable biographer of Burns, thought that "Burns wrote the genuine feelings of his own heart, in a language that (though common to the peasantry of Scotland) was excellently adapted to poetry, on account of its harmonious flow, &c."—Professor Stewart and others class it with the Italian for beauty in song. Ossian was written in barbarous, though sublime language, the Gaelic; but England got it in its own elegant language, and since, in Latin and Greek,* France, Germany, and Italy, have it in their several tongues. The celebrated Dr. Blair, professor of Belles Lettres, has not only classed Ossian with the German Epic Poets; but compares it to Homer himself; and surely there is no one bold enough to assert that the eloquent strain of Homer has introduced a rage for the idiom of barbarous Grecians, or the uncouth manners of the Trojans, more than the taste of ages and literature can bear! To return to the productions of Waverley, J. B. M. says that "they will not be allowed the lasting triumph of Milton and Shakespeare's works;" this is true, though I think Waverley will find as many readers in after ages, as he does now, and certainly he now gets more than either Milton or Shakespeare; the former of these owes his fame and popularity to the exertions of the amiable Addison, and the latter, greatly to Johnson and Stevens. The Author of Waverley's productions are no less esteemed on the stage, than they are in the library; add to this that if they had not intrinsic merit to support their popularity, they would not be found in the best private libraries. To read Ivanhoe, which is half-romance, we become acquainted with many historical traits, which Hume and Smollet could never have depicted—to peruse Kenilworth, we wish to know more of the minute transactions of the Elizabethan reign:—This author has done a public service; he has withdrawn the veil which for ages clouded individuals, and he has broken down the strong prejudice which we entertained towards Scottish literature and Scottish manners. Waverley, or 'Sixty years Since,' will as assuredly yield the same gratification to the fancy, and instruction to the mind, Sixty years hence, as it does at this day. The author has been compared to a "meteor;"—I can only say, I wish we had our horizon constantly full of such "rare and intelligent luminaries." Like Roderick Random and Tom Jones, these Novels will be always read, because they will be always new; they will ever please old age and gratify youth.

What your correspondent has said of the Lancashire dialect may be true, though I never knew that it had the fluency and copiousness of the Scotch language; notwithstanding my having compared the celebrated "Tim Bobbin," with the admirable Burns.

If I have in the least asserted any thing contrary to truth or analogy, or been led for a moment to give sophistical opinions, I shall be glad to stand corrected.

I am, Sir, your constant reader

MYSELF.

Liverpool, Jan. 6th, 1823.

* A gentleman of one of the Northern Universities of Scotland translated Ossian into Greek heroic verse; I never saw a copy in Liverpool. The Novels of the Author of Waverley have been translated into French and German, I believe.

ODE TO SOLITUDE.

Oh thou celestial maid who lov'st to dwell,
And list upon some high impending rock,
To the hoarse madden'd surge
Lashing with foam the shore!

What time the fragrant morn on beauty's wings,
Spreads o'er the meads her heavenly gifted charms;
While all around appears,
A paradise of sweets.

When up-borne to the sapphire of the east,
The lark on airy wings of fancy roves:
Soft, o'er the ambient air,
Her richest music pours:—

Beside yon dazzling streams meand'ring course,
Where myriads flow'rs the velvet banks bedeck,
And to the heav'n's high vault
Their grateful incense breathe,

His lot how blest with thee sweet maid to sit,
While thus from human turmoil far remov'd,
And with enraptur'd soul
List to thy soothing voice:—

Or when pavilion'd on her ebon car,
Eve, fair-eyed goddess, her grey mantle spreads;
Gives to the varied scene,
Her peaceful, soft delights;

When countless myriads of orient stars,
From the ethereal their bright lustre shed,
And in Elysium,
Wrap the wond'ring soul.

With thee, enchanting maiden, let me haste,
To where yon grove its front fantastic rears;
Where echo warbles back,
The night bird's tender tale.

While Cynthia from her silver fretted throne,
In majesty of sweetness beams sublime;
Luring the pleased eye,
To gaze upon her charms.

Then let me think of fairest dreams destroy'd;
Visions of joy and bliss for ever fled;
And Hope's balm-breathing smile,
Chac'd hence by lean despair.

As some pale wild flow'r rears its pensile head,
Alone and friendless on the barren waste;
Till winter comes, and then,
It with'ring droops and dies.

Oh nymph ador'd, if that a muse so young,
With earnest suit can move thee to attend;
Can woo thy lovely form
To list unto her pray'r.

Instruct her in thy dear and tranquil hour,
Thy bosom's peerless happiness to gain;
Upon thy tender breast,
Hush unto her cares to peace.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION GALLERY.

Adam and Eve entertaining the Angel Raphael, J. MARTIN.—The first look at this picture gives the impression of strongly chequered colours, light, and shade, like the sudden approach to a bed of variegated tulips, together with that of a profusion of graceful and noble objects and immense distance, with an angel and two naked persons in discourse; altogether producing the beautiful and the grand, especially as prodigious mountains, rising in light, terminating the distance. We are next struck with the foreground, an open, undulating lawn, or, as MILTON well and more simply terms it, "green," where the blissful pair and their guest sit in front of a bower, consisting of a cool and caverned recess, overgrown and nearly surrounded by flowering shrubs and beautiful and various trees, and bright clustering flowers. This and the shady wood that immediately borders the enclosed plot, and the multiplied objects beyond, give by contrast an openness, a felicitous expansion, to this soft and verdantly-heaving bosom of sequestration, this mildly-cheerful and wisdom-loving spot, delicious to the eye, the heart, and the fancy. Beyond the wood the scene again opens among other lawns, slopes, campaigns, sudden and steep ascents, rocks, mist-mantled waterfalls, and trees of numerous kinds, colours, and forms, rising straight, or spreading sideways with Asiatic grace and umbrageousness, or bending circularly and pendantsly. Beauty and variety, grace and grandeur of shape, delicate smallness and astonishing vastness, mingle among the sunny openings and shadowed coverts, among the glades and waterfall-environing rocks. All is elegant, romantic, or magnificent. SPRING'S irriguous hand moistens the greater part with a clear green, and, in the distance, a blue lustre, and strews about her flowers; and Summer, in this region yet unvisited of evil, hand in hand with her's, ripens to glowing profusion her fruits. Nature buds, blooms, and matures at once. A river, spacious and calm gliding, reflects the sapphire sky, and looks like a bright tincture girding the earth, which appears in the cheerfulness of its various features through the serene air, and in the light that fringes with celestial embroidery the valleys and mountain sides, conscious of its peaceful condition; while the leopard is seen lying down with the hart, and the gentle deer and stately horse pluck the herbage in placid enjoyment. Mantling the whole is the unsullied sky, part in still and sublime blue, and part shining with the sun's best rays, or as if the Angel in his flight from Heaven had tracked it with unwonted light. Let no one say that these are mere overweening fancies, more becoming the romancer than the critic. They are realities—real appearances and imaginings, which the finest appearances of Art, as in Nature, create in all but callous breasts.

MORE MISERIES!

Some screaming peacock*, great or small,
Is perched on every garden wall.

MR. EDITOR,—I never suspected that attention to order, even if excessive, could be twisted into crime, until I read Mrs. Treacle's letter in your last number. And, although she is so dissatisfied with her worthy husband, "I wish kind heaven had sent me such a man," instead of the one I now have. Her's is tolerable, mine is bad. Though I am an experienced matron, and know the difference, you shall judge between us.

My first husband was an industrious tradesman, who made it his study to accommodate himself to the supposed frailties of our sex, so as justly to deserve the name of a woman's man. His leisure hours were devoted to such conversation as renders a husband agreeable to his wife, never attempting subjects above her capacity, nor descending to vulgarity; maintaining a happy medium between abstruse matters, and familiar topics. We passed ten years very happily together, and then Providence saw it proper to separate us; and I doubt not he is now at rest. About a year after his decease, a gentleman of equal personal accomplishments, and of superior mental abilities, engaged my affections. I expected much happiness with a man of his good sense and great learning: but, how illusory are our fondest hopes! We had not been long married before he secluded himself in his library, where he generally spends twelve or fourteen hours out of every four and twenty. Knowing that he was very fond of reading, for some time I did not interrupt him, nor intrude upon his sanctum sanctorum, his attention was so taken up with books, and experiments in philosophy. And though I wished to be looked upon as something more than a piece of household furniture, I endeavoured to accommodate myself to his humour, and attempted to engage his conversation by all the address of which I am capable, but without any success. If he now and then vouchsafes to leave his studies, for half an hour, he does it more to oblige me than from inclination, or rather more in condescension to my weakness than from any pleasure he expects to reap from my company; for every topic I introduce appears trifling to him, and as I am not capable of conversing with him about geometrical figures, innate ideas, occult qualities, liberty and necessity, &c. all my attractions have not force sufficient to engage his attention. I find myself therefore bereft of that man's company, from whom I expected to derive so much happiness; and am obliged to mingle with my servants, or pass my days alone, unnoticed by him who ought to take the utmost notice of me. When I prevail upon him to go out with me to visit a friend, (which is very seldom,) before he has got far from our door, he forgets that I am with him, and either gazes stedfastly on the clouds, or fixes his eyes on the earth, lost in deep reveries, so that he will not speak many words in a mile, but run against posts without seeing them, or stand stock still as if he were seized with a fit. He takes no more notice of those who salute him than if they were puppets: and if I were not at his elbow, he would be run over by carriages, for his attention is so absorbed, that he does not hear the rattling of a stage coach, nor see a dray till the wheel passes within an inch of his shoulder. Indeed he is so much of the child, as well as the philosopher, that it is not safe to trust him alone, any where but in his study, for the absent man is so apparent as to suggest the strongest temptation to thieves. A friend of mine once caught one thief with his hand in my husband's pocket, and another going to snatch off his hat and wig, while he was attempting, about the dusk of evening, to read through his glass, an inscription on an old pedestal; which scene was afterwards humourously set forth in a print called a caricature. We cannot pass a bookseller's shop without stopping to read the label of every book in the windows, nor the ruins of an old house without poring over its brick-bats, in hope of finding some relic of antiquity to carry home, which he values more than new gold. His gloves and handkerchiefs he leaves at any house where he stops, and sometimes comes home without his cane and pocket-book: in short, the whole tenor of his conduct is so extravagant, that strangers take him to be an idiot or a lunatic. "Let no such man be trusted" with a wife, say I. I had somewhere read, that few philosophers make good husbands, and to my sorrow I find there is much truth in the observation; but I had no idea that they were such unsocial beings. If they cannot be cured of this philosophical delirium, they would be better companions for bedlamites than sensible women. What a pity that such abstract geniuses should ever marry! Our sex naturally expect to find, in a husband, sources of connubial and domestic felicity. Dry and tedious lectures on soul and body, matter and spirit, have no soul nor spirit in them to a wife: however profound they may be, they afford no entertainment to her, nor can they in the smallest degree contribute to the edification of a family, where more useful strictures, on social life and manners, may be needful. When a philosopher therefore determines to take a female partner for life, let him lay aside NEWTON, BERKLEY and BOYLE, and act like other men, in a world that is common to both sexes, so that his wife may have domestic pleasure in his society, and accompany him in his peregrinations without being pointed at by every body they meet.

Now, Mr. Editor, he pleased to decide between Mrs. T. and myself, who has most cause for complaint: but first tell me candidly, do not you think Mrs. Treacle's grief sits too lightly upon her to be real; and that she has been making herself and her friends merry at her good man's expence? Perhaps I am blameable for following her example, and for describing my husband so minutely: but, in sincerity have I done it, (not to make sport of him,) in order that he, seeing himself in your paper, may amend his manners; for he regularly reads the mathematical parts, which he says, are the only good things in it; all the others, he considers as mere trumpery. Whereas, in my humble opinion, begging your pardon, those parts my husband approves of, are the worst trumpery they contain, being so much above my comprehension.

If you approve of this scrawl, use me as well as Mrs. T. by placing it in a conspicuous part of your next number, for in doing so you will oblige
JANE NUBIUS.

THE WEARIED BACHELOR.

"Gallop apace, ye fiery footed steeds," whirl round your courses in rapid succession, until that hour when I shall hear from my charmer, until that fondly anticipated day when I shall again behold the sweet radiance of my adored Selina's eyes, and press in delightful mood her beauteous hand.

But what means all this rhapsody? for, thus I ran on as Goodwill, last night, sat by my side, after delivering a note, which has given me more pleasure than all the invitations of the present season!—It was to meet her I adore on an early evening; an evening in which I may perhaps lead her down the mazy dance, and enjoy a sweet and prolonged tête-à-tête! But how, you may ask with Goodwill, can an old bachelor think of joining in the dance? will not he look so ludicrous as to offend Selina, whilst he is the innocent cause of merriment to the youthful assemblage? No; though I am out of my teens, and my head has recovered from the giddy evolutions of the fiddlestick, I flatter myself I can caper on the light fantastic toe with as much ease, grace, and good manners, as any professor of the present century!

In high good humour with myself and friend, I ordered a fresh barrel of London oysters to be produced; which, with a brim-full jug of good October, and the usual paraphernalia of a supper table, formed the evening repast. And, were Goodwill as satisfied as myself, no two princes ever sat down to a meal more contented than we two. Very few words passed between us during supper, and, not till the tankard was exhausted, did Goodwill attempt to break a silence, which was observed as rigidly as if we had been spell bound. The tray removed, we entered into a light desultory conversation, which favoured me with a recurrence every ten minutes to my favorite topic—Selina!—Surely there never was beauty equal to hers! I will attempt a faint sketch;—Rather little, but of exquisite symmetry—she carries one of the finest busts imaginable; her eyes and hair are dark, and the former luxuriantly fringed by delicate eyebrows which hang over them like guardian angels, and seem to shroud them from the piercing eye of vulgar curiosity! But, whilst I am drawing this outline of one, whom Canova might in vain have strove to equal, I only do her injustice; too feeble is my pen to sketch her beauty, too feeble my eloquence to pourtray her character; lovely, mild, and forgiving—with the sweetest intelligence and most unruffled temper, she is a faithful picture of youth, benignity and grace!

But has she yet received my epistle? Does she yet know the intensity of my passion? This has been one of our chief consultations: she has sent me by Goodwill her album, a blank leaf is reserved for me, and before we meet, it must be finished. I have already begun five hundred times, and as often destroyed what I had written—at length the following was carefully transcribed. I feel as though my whole life depended on it!

TO AN ALBUM.

Emblem of Man! each clear and unstain'd page,—
A year; thy whole complete,—his life! An age
Of blanks,—most dark and joyless scene!

Hope leads us quickly on
To coming years, we soil them! and when gone,
We would recall and vainly hope to mend them!

And must I soil
Another leaf! my thoughts and hands recoil
From the dread task! Yet must my name remain
Upon it, fix'd for ever! O how fair
Would I decline, and leave this vacant space
For one more skillful; one more learn'd to grace
With poesy, or the sweet painter's art,
Or sweetly season'd wit!—but now we part,
Fair book, for ever! yet my name shall stay
When I, and thy possessor, long have pass'd away!

The happy evening approaches; when I shall follow up my recital, in the mean time, I earnestly solicit the prayers of the fortunate votaries of Hymen!

TRANSLATION OF THE NINTH ODE OF THE THIRD BOOK OF HORACE.

Horace.

I shed no tear, I heaved no sigh,
As long, as thy soft beaming eye,
Upon me shone, with radiance clear,
For then no rival did I fear;
But oft around thy neck I'd ring
My arms, nor envy Persia's king.

Lydia.

Oh! Horace, whilst no other fair
Possess'd thy every thought and care,
My charms did not to Chloe's yield,
Nor was thy breast to Lydia steel'd,
I, Lydia, of far-sounding fame,
Envied not Ilia Rome's great dame.

Horace.

Now Chloe, skilled upon the lyre,
My bosom fills with love's keen fire;
Much she excels in sweetest strains,
O'er me she rules, o'er me she reigns;
If but the fates her charms would save,
For her, I'd sink into the grave.

Lydia.

The son of Ornithus inflames,
My breast, and my affection claims,
For him I would resign my breath,
For him I twice would suffer death,
For him would bid adieu to joy,
If but the fates would spare my boy.

Horace.

What if our former love return,
And with fresh fire our bosoms burn?
What if it bind us with a tie
That dies alone when we shall die?
If gold lock'd Chloe's loved no more,
And 'gain to Lydia open the door?

Lydia.

Though he be brighter than a star,
Yea lighter than the cork by far,
Though you more boisterous should be,
Than Adria's rough unsettled sea,
With you I'd live, with you would dwell,
With you would bid the world farewell.

J. P. W.

LOVE'S PHILOSOPHY.

The fountains mingle with the river,
And the river with the ocean;
The winds of heaven mix for ever
With a sweet emotion;
Nothing in the world is single;
All things by a law divine
In one another's being mingle;—
Why not I with thine?

See the mountains kiss high heaven,
And the waves clasp one another;
No leaf or flower would be forgiven,
If it disdained to kiss its brother;
And the sunlight clasps the earth,
And the moonbeams kiss the sea;
What are all these kissings worth,
If thou kiss not me?

THE BACHELOR'S CARE

(In answer to "Bachelor's Fare" in our last.)

Many and great are a Bachelor's sufferings.
Wearily, drearily pass all his days;
Stranger is he to the bosom's soft offerings
That rivet affection when beauty decays.
Friend to ebriety, oft to impiety,
Foe to society, foe to the fair,
Vexation unceasing, and gloom his heart seizing,
Are ever increasing the Bachelor's Care!

See the poor devil, who joins not the revel,
Now crawl to his desert-home weary and sad,
No one to meet him, to smile, or to greet him,
Or tenderly treat him, to make his heart glad!
See the unsocial drone, eating his bit alone,
Stirring the fire up to cheer his despair,
Though burn the fire brightly, yet all goes not rightly,
For who e'er bore lightly a Bachelor's Care!

Behold here another less cynical brother,
Who reels to the tavern to banish his pain,
There like a fish drinking, is freed from all thinking,
And dozing till morning, then tipsles again.
Thus bravely he swindles, while property dwindles,
And leans on his spindles from want and hard fare,
Till you hear him confess, in a tone of distress,
How devoid of redress is the Bachelor's Care!

Elate or dejected he's little respected,
His brow and his forehead distemper'd with gloom,
His intellect clouded, his eyes are enshrouded
In horrors as baleful as those of the tomb.
He ne'er knows the blisses of conjugal kisses,
That when aught amiss is console a fond pair,
Nor wife's kind embraces, nor children's sweet faces,
But all one can trace is,—a Bachelor's Care!

MY SPORTING-BOX.

[This amusing article is taken from The Album, a London quarterly publication, which, for talent, elegance, and chaste entertainment, is, unquestionably, one of the best periodicals of our age.—Ed.]

I am a man of gentle habits and kind affections, and not at all given to violent antipathies; but never again shall I behold the bird called a magpie, without bestowing a hearty curse upon him. I have no doubt that this bitter hostility to such a respectable body of the feathered community will seem somewhat unreasonable, until I explain the extent of the provocation which I have received from an individual belonging to it. Nor, indeed, am I sure but this explanation may, primâ facie, appear rather insufficient to apologize for my extreme rancour, for all that I can allege against him, in this early state of the proceedings, is the crime of having made an error in judgment, respecting the proprietorship of a certain cherry-tree; but the consequences therefrom have been such as will justify my utmost malison. Had he never been addicted to cherries, I should never have sent him to his long account; consequently, I should never have felt the thrill of a sportsman;—consequently, I should never have left my peaceful home at Islington, to look out for a Sporting-Box;—consequently, I should have escaped all the miseries which I am about to relate.

"It is quite impossible," said I to my wife, "that I can endure the air of the suburbs any longer, and I shall take a house with a manor, and so forth, and turn sportsman without delay."

"My dearest love," she replied, "take time to consider, or take another shot at another magpie, for I am persuaded that you overrate your talents for a country life; you look just like what you are, and not at all like a sportsman."

This allusion to the counting-house was rather grating to my feelings, but I must freely own that there may be a certain mercantile cast in my physiognomy, which might in some degree justify my wife's waggery, and I sat very passively while she recounted to a posse of friends, how I had watched a whole week in the cow-house with the blacksmith's gun, peeping through the crannies at my unsuspecting foe,—how he hopped from twig to twig, without suffering me to take a level at him—how he at last hopped upon the muzzle of the gun, which had been all day protruding from the cow-house, like the spout of a tea-kettle, and how I was a full half hour before I could summon resolution to pull the trigger. The laugh was against me, but my mind was made up; and the next day, when I mounted my nag, at the usual hour of attendance at my office, instead of turning towards the city, I ambled away very complacently to a celebrated house-agent's. "Pray, Sir," said I, "have you such a thing as a sporting-box to let? I don't want it very far from town—only just a pretty distance, so that I can run down and kill my three or four brace of birds, and then return to my—hem!—to the opera." A book was immediately handed to me, containing the descriptions of about twenty, which seemed precisely calculated for my accommodation. Were it not rather foreign to my present purpose I should direct the notice of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice" to this identical book, for it was written with a flow of language and depth of poetical feeling, which gave a semblance of truth to fictions of a most injurious tendency. The residence which particularly struck my fancy was, "An elegant cottage, at the extremity of a delightful village, with beautiful lawn, surrounded with odoriferous shrubs and exotics of all descriptions, stables, and stable-yard, pig-sties and pig-yard, coach-house, and hot-house, and green-house, and tool-house, and hen-house, and various other appurtenances, too numerous to mention. Over and above, a manor well stocked with game, and the right of fishery on one bank of the river Mud." Was ever any thing so totally and altogether entrancing? I instantly demanded a ticket of admission, walked off to the White-horse Cellar, and mounted the coach for this fairy-land without delay. It never struck me till I got half way, that my wife would be waiting dinner for me; but "hang it," thought I, "sportsmen never care for their wives—she's beneath my notice."

When I arrived at the delightful village, I immediately proceeded to the elegant cottage, which, if I must speak the truth, was not quite so elegant as I had been taught to expect. The beautiful lawn could not possibly accommodate above one quadrille at a time, (for, be it known, I had cogitated over a fête champêtre, to celebrate my entrée,) the green-house was of about the dimensions of a cucumber-frame, and from a small stove in the middle I concluded it was to answer the description of the hot-house likewise. The rest of the premises were in proportion; but I will not enter into particulars. "A sportsman," I thought, "should never care how he is housed, by the side of a 'well-stocked manor, and the river Mud.'" I rang the bell with a heart full of expectation, and was answered by a brace of pointers, and a man with a ram-rod. The sight augured well, and I stalked into the presence of my future landlord with the importance of a dead shot. He was a tall thin man, and wore a shooting jacket, red face, and spindle shanks, and altogether presented just the wiry appearance of an old sportsman. Having laid aside his gun-barrel, which he was in the act of washing, he wiped his hands, and received me very politely. My errand was soon told, and his politeness increased. He assured me that, "if I was fond of shooting and fishing, there was not a place in the country which would suit me so well. To be sure the house was a little out of repair, which was partly owing to his being a bachelor, and living like Robinson Crusoe, with only his man Friday; and partly to his excellent sport, which scarcely left him leisure to observe what was going on within doors." The house was indeed, as he observed, a little out of repair, the walls being somewhat tattered, the ceilings a little stained with the damp, and the furniture sinking into the vale of years; but every observation which I made on these heads was instantly overpowered by some seemingly careless enquiry which he made of the man

Friday respecting the abundance of the game. "I am afraid, Sir," said I, "that this parlour will require fresh papering!" "Oh, say no more about it, my dear Sir, my man shall patch it up. By-the-bye, (turning to Friday,) how many covies are there in the three turnip fields?" "Thirteen, Sir," says Friday. "And these chairs," I continued, "are rather rickety." "Very true, very true, my good Sir,—they shall have a nail or two.—By-the-bye, do you see that old oak tree yonder, by the side of the Mud? That is where I watch for the ducks in the winter-time.—How many ducks did I kill at a shot there last winter?" "Sixteen," says Friday. I expressed my astonishment, but my landlord-to-be merely answered with Hotspur, "A trifle—a trifle, Sir." The conversation kept twisting so continually from the subject of the house to that of the game, that I soon totally forgot all the objections to the first, to listen to the astonishing feats which had been performed by this Robin Hood and Little John; for at that time I knew so little of old sportsmen, that I had no conception of the master and the man being aware that they were dealing with a cockney, who, of course, is fair game all the world over. I am a little surprised, however, that I was not let into the secret, when Robin "presumed that I was a good shot;" for when I put on a look of becoming mystery, and replied with a nod of the head, "that I brought them down now and then," I saw him decidedly wink at Little-John, who grinned outright.

The fishery was by no means an unprofitable subject. There were trout, and there were carp, and there were tench, and there were perch, and there were pike. In short—there were all things, and there was every thing, from minnows and tittle-bats, to turbot and lobster-sauce. How I fancied I felt my rod bending with the own brother of the twenty-six pound pike which Robin caught last Saturday week! How I sniffed at the glorious pudding in his belly!—and how I triumphed in anticipation over my cockney friends, whose sports were confined to the bobbing for white bait at Blackwall!

Before I had been an hour in Robin's company, we were bosom friends. He showed me all his rods and his lines, and his guns, and his dogs, and told me all the secret super-excellencies connected therewith. He gave me a beef-steak of Friday's cooking, and a bottle of port from the Red-Lion;—and moreover, he gave me the refusal of a brace of celebrated pointers, and a notoriously known gun,—for in the course of conversation he had discovered my deficiency in these respects, and drawn from me the candid confession that my kennel was not quite so staunch as it ought to be, and that my patent detonator was certainly not upon the most approved principle. "Look there, my dear Sir," said he, "there is a brace of dogs which cannot be matched; and you, who are so good a judge, are the only man for whom I would part with them, for you know how to estimate them.—Look there, Sir,—when did you ever see a sporting dog with such a famous thick stern as that?—why, his tail is as big as a sheep's, and bends over his back like a bugle-horn! And look at the other,—he is none of your lop-eared, heavy-headed ones:—that short bull-nose of his will find you more game than all the dogs in the county,—and then that natural grin shows at first sight what an excellent temper he has.—But his ears, Sir,—his ears are the handsomest point about him;—they stand bolt upright, like a brace of sentry-boxes!"

The gun had no reason to complain of the character which its affectionate owner bestowed upon it; but I shall say nothing of its merits, save and excepting that it would kill a goose at an hundred yards, and that its make was so extremely delicate and beautiful, that the barrel was absolutely not thicker than a sixpence. Of course, I became the happy purchaser both of dogs and guns; likewise of all the hooks, flies, nets, fishing-rods, and other piscatory apparatus; likewise of all the ammunition, flints, turn-screws, powder-horns, and shot-belts;—and finally, I became the proprietor of the man Friday, who, in consequence of his master's secession from business, and intended trip to the Continent, would otherwise have found himself a gentleman at large.

"God bless you, my dear Sir," said he, as I wished him good afternoon, after having arranged to take possession of my new abode for one year, commencing from that day se'nnight,—“God bless you, my dear Sir, I shall not be here when you come, but Friday will show you the bounds of the manor, and will, I am sure, take care that you have good sport.—Take my word for it, you have the best bargain to be met with.”

I was in high spirits to coincide with my landlord,—shook him heartily by the hand,—bade my game-keeper look sharp after the poachers, and jumped upon the stage-coach again to astonish my wife.

It was past nine o'clock when I arrived at home, and I found the partner of my past joys and future afflictions consoling herself for my unaccountable absence with a coterie of insatiate tea-drinkers. I found them all in high glee, of which it appeared that I was the subject, for, as I advanced up stairs, I could plainly distinguish my name in conjunction with that of the cursed magpie.

My heart burned to relate the feat which I had performed, but somehow I was puzzled how to begin. I felt like a mean fellow who has accidentally achieved a great action, and finds himself ashamed of it. At last, when the merriment had a little subsided, and my wife began to enquire seriously the cause of my absence all day, I gained courage to demand how long she thought it would take us to move house.

"Move house, my love! and where are we to move to?" "To our residence in the country," I replied; "it is not above twenty miles from town, and is really the prettiest thing in the world." My wife looked in amazement.—“What, then, have you positively taken a sporting-box?” I answered in the affirmative, and, having fairly embarked in the subject, determined upon swaggering it out, and manfully described my bargain, item by item. At every period, when I expected the astonishment due to my surprising good fortune, I could distinguish nothing but a sort of smothered titter, which I thought extremely ill-bred. But when I came to the eulogy upon my dogs and game-keeper, the mirth would really have been past the endurance of ordinary minds. In this generalisation, however, I beg not to be included, for the only mode in which I condescended to show my indignation, was giving them timely notice that all trespassers on my property would be prosecuted as the law directs.

Of all the blessings in the world, there is none so calamitous as the attentions of your worthy friends and sagacious advisers. It has been my happy fate to inherit the kind counsel of all my kith and kin, together with that of all the friends, relations, and acquaintances of each and sundry, ever since the day of my christening, on which joyous occasion there goes a legend of my having been bugged into convulsions. It is no wonder, therefore, if, after having finished my tale of triumph to a circle which included three generations of maiden aunts, I incurred a due share of tender solicitudes, respecting the perils I was going to encounter. Every misfortune which had been occasioned by fire-arms for the last forty years, was raked up as a precedent for what was likely to befall me; and though I endeavoured, with great vehemence, to assert that my patronage of a simple fowling-piece could not possibly have any thing to do with the bursting of a Tower gun, or the wilful explosion of my uncle Tom's pocket-pistol,—it was out of the nature of things to allay the fears which my desperation had occasioned. I cannot remember half the catalogue of my predicted woes.—My gun burst—my dogs went mad—my river overflowed,—and I was doomed to undergo the various operations of amputation, dipping, and reanimation;—my skull was trepanned,—my wits were bewitched—my arm was be-crutched, and, altogether, I cut a more glorious figure than any battle-battered pensioner since the foundation of Chelsea Hospital. Such was the opinion of my friends, and so firmly was it expressed, that I really believed any failure in their predictions, would cause them sincere disappointment.

I will not dwell upon the regret, which, in spite of my happy destination, I could not help feeling at my departure from dear, romantic Islington. I will not enlarge upon the compunction which was almost rising to my eyes, as, after having carefully disposed my powder and shot, and re-folded my new shooting-jacket, I looked back and saw the last twig of the cherry-tree which had been the scene of my first ex-plot, vanishing in the distance. It was not long, however, before I re-manned myself. The day was fine and the country delightful, and our road, moreover, lay by the side of the Thames, into which the river Mud empties itself, so that I felt the pride of a sort of joint proprietorship in every fish that jumped. My wife, indeed, was not quite so aristocratical in her notions; she was not excited by the expectations which throbbed in the bosom of her lord, and appeared to be in a very abstracted reverie respecting the means of subsistence in our new abode, which, she maintained, would be very precariously supplied if my gun and fishing-rod were to be the only resources. For, it was not to be denied that, independently of my lack of practice in the use of these weapons, and the possibility that the removal of that deficiency might leave me pretty nearly as skilful as before, the fish were not always willing to bite, or the partridges to be shot. In the event of these dilemmas, she only hoped and trusted that our neighbourhood would furnish a poulterer and fishmonger, for, it was quite impossible to suppose that the numerous friends whom we had invited to stay with us, would consent to be fed entirely upon mutton. I bade her be of good cheer, and promised to supply the table in such a manner as to obliterate the above-named tradesmen from our weekly bills altogether.

It was evening when we finished our journey. One of those soft dewy evenings when the breeze speaks of nothing but love and honeysuckles. The little dilapidations of our cottage lay hidden in the friendly twilight, and the banks of the Mud, which were somewhat too appropriate to the name, had melted into a cloud-like blue. It was just the hour for a first entrée, and my wife confessed that the bargain was "not so bad after all," considering that she had not been consulted in it. I had an idea, however, that the readiness with which she praised every thing that I showed her, seemed rather dictated by an amiable resolution to be satisfied, and an unwillingness to damp my delight, than by a thorough conviction of our good fortune. But whether this was the case or not, I had not leisure to enquire. Mine was the real unsophisticated cottage contentment; and the romantic complacency with which I accompanied my man Friday to trim the night-books and set the eel-pots for the next day's supply, will never depart from my memory. This event occurred in the first hour of my domination.

Having placed all these engines of destruction in the most destructive situations, I retired early to bed that I might be enabled to reply to the summons of the man Friday, who had orders to call me at four o'clock next morning, which I thought was the proper hour for a sportsman to rise; besides which, I was anxious to procure a good show of fish for breakfast.

I was already awake when the flat of Friday beat four o'clock upon my door. I had passed a restless night. About the mid-watch I hooked a mighty jack, who had played me till half past three, when I landed him amidst the shouts of an immense concourse of spectators. The agony of my nerves during the dubious contest was indescribable. Sometimes the stupendous animal shot from his element into upper air, as though he meant to take wing; sometimes he bounced downwards as deep as the Bay of Biscay; and, then he ran me along the banks, till I had well nigh dropped from fatigue. At last I brought him to the shore, and, seizing him with the Herculean grasp of despair, flung him victoriously upon the grass. I awoke in a profuse perspiration, and in the act of tossing my wife out of bed. "My dearest love," said she, "what is the matter?" "Bless my soul," I replied, "I beg a thousand pardons—I took you for a fish."

Our first care was to examine the night-lines, which, from some strange cause which Friday was unable to define, had, each and several, nothing at the end but the bait we had placed there the preceding night. The fish were evidently more knowing in this river than in any other; and Friday assured me that it required a very clever fellow to catch them. I began to think so too. We next had recourse to the eel-pots. The river Mud was full of eels, I had been told; but, however this might be the case, it was not so with the eel-pots. One after the other, we hauled them into the punt, till I was over the shoes, and up to the elbows in mud, but the eels had not gone in, and all the grigs had got out.

"Why, Friday, what can be the reason of this?" "Very odd indeed, Sir," said Friday, "I am afraid you have come rather too late in the season." My thoughts again coincided with Friday's, and I considered it high time to produce the infallible tackle which I had purchased from my landlord. It was impossible that this could fail, for I had heard it eulogized till I almost believed that it would catch fish where fish were not. It did fail, however; and, though my game-keeper boldly volunteered to be responsible, that when I could catch one, it should be a bouncer. I own I felt somewhat chagrined that I could not take a few of the small fry in the mean time.

At eight o'clock, my stomach being as empty as my basket, I desired to be put on shore, and arrived at home in excellent time to hear the departure of the fishmonger, who had been cavalierly informed that his future attentions would be unnecessary.

"My dearest love," said my wife, as she met me at the door, "I have been waiting breakfast for you—come in—and, Friday, take the fish to the cook." Friday looked quite crest-fallen, and so did I, as she continued with a very mysterious smile: "The fishmonger has left a message for you, my love. He says, with his kind compliments, that if you have any mode of passing your time besides fishing, he would earnestly recommend you to have recourse to it; because that, in consequence of our landlord and the owner of the opposite bank of the river having drawn off the water three days ago, and sent all the fish to market, it is unlikely your success will be equal to your exertions. He advises you likewise to give permission to any one who may apply for a day's angling, because it is not civil to be too tenacious." I was petrified!

"Twas strange, 'twas passing strange.
'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful."

But what was I to do? I turned all my wrath upon my game-keeper. "Friday," said I, with a reproachful look, "why did you not tell me this?" Friday said I had never asked him, and persisted that there were still three or four very fine fish in the river. Pardon me, reader—my choler rises, and I can say no more upon this subject.

(To be concluded in our next.)

PERCY ANECDOTES.

The 39th part of this interesting little work, consists of Anecdotes of Eccentricity—we select the following:—

POLITE APOLOGY.

In October, 1747, his majesty's ship Dartmouth, of fifty guns, commanded by Captain James Hamilton, being closely engaged off Cape St. Vincent with the Glorious Spanish man of war, blew up, and all the crew, amounting to three hundred men, perished, except seventeen, who were taken up by the boats of the Prince Frederick and Duke privateers, then in company. Of these, none was of any rank, except Mr. O'Brien, a young gentleman of Ireland, one of the lieutenants. He was taken up, floating on the carriage of a gun, on which he had been blown out of the ship into the water, and speedily recovered his senses. He was a gentleman of easy behaviour, and great readiness of wit. On seeing the captain of the Prince Frederick, his first words to him were these: "Sir, you must excuse the unfitness of my dress to come aboard a stranger ship; but really I left my own in such a hurry, that I had not time to stay for a change of apparel."

A PRODIGY.

When the Duke of Sully, in 1603, set out on an embassy for the court of England, he was attended by a numerous retinue of the principal men in France; among the rest, M. Servin presented his young son to him, at the same time earnestly begging the duke, that he would use his best endeavours to make him an honest man. This request gave Sully a great curiosity to search into his character; and he gave the following account of him.

"His genius," says he, "was so lively, that nothing could escape his penetration; his apprehension was so quick, that he understood every thing in an instant; and his memory so prodigious, that he never forgot any thing. He was master of all the branches of philosophy, the mathematics, particularly fortification and designing: say, he was so thoroughly acquainted with divinity, that he was an excellent preacher when he pleased, and could manage the controversy for or against the Protestant religion with the greatest ability. He not only understood the Greek, Hebrew, and other learned languages, but all the jargons of the moderns. He entered so exactly into their pronunciation and accent, to which he joined such a perfect imitation of their air and manner, that not only the people of the different nations in Europe, but the several provinces of France, would have taken him for a native of the country. He applied his talent to imitate all sorts of persons, which he performed with wonderful dexterity; and was accounted the best comedian in the world. He was a good poet, an excellent musician, and sung with equal art and sweetness. He said mass, for he would do every thing, as well as know every thing. His body was perfectly proportioned to his mind. He was well made, vigorous, and agile; formed for all sorts of exercises. He rode a horse well, and was admired for dancing, leaping, and wrestling. He was acquainted with all kinds of sports and diversions, and could practice in most of the mathematical arts. Reverse the medal," says Sully; "he was false, treacherous, cruel, and cowardly; a sharper, drunkard, and glutton. He was a gamester, an abandoned debauchee, a blasphemer, and atheist; in a word, he was possessed of every vice, contrary to nature, to honour, to religion, and society: he persisted in his vices to the last, and fell a sacrifice to his debaucheries, in the flower of his age."

MR. FARQUHAR.

The world, which is ever judging of men by appearances, is for ever forming most erroneous notions of their characters. A gentleman who is possessed of untold thousands, must make a great show of his wealth in every thing about him; he must dress splendidly, and live sumptuously; never sit down to a meal without a dozen servants to wait on him; nor go abroad to take the air without a mob in livery at his heels; he must have his horses, and carriages, and hounds; his town house, and his country house; his marine villa, and his sporting box; and to all these superfluities, he must add a few very superfluous vices, which go by the tender name of follies; otherwise he is set down as a man on whom fortune has showered numerous blessings, a sordid miser, whose sole delight consists in counting and turning over the treasures he has amassed. It is the way, indeed, of the rich to launch into such extravagances; but it is taking a very false view of things, to imagine that there is in all this any thing of a just sense of the true value of riches. With by far the greater number, the ruling motive is nothing but sheer vanity, or a silly compliance with what they are told the world expects from them. Some willingly make themselves a spectacle for the world to gaze at; others reluctantly consent, for fashion's sake, to enslave themselves to a thousand things they would much rather be without. 'I have ten servants,' said an honourable baronet, once in the House of Commons, 'at least, ten persons who call themselves my servants, though, in reality, it is I who am the servant to them.' Your rational man of wealth, is one who in all points differs from the generality of his class. He is the comet of his sphere, and his eccentricity consists in doing only what good sense and good feeling dictate. He dresses plainly, because it is to his taste; he lives frugally, for he wishes to live long; he has no more servants than are absolutely necessary to his wants; keeps not a single house, nor horse, nor hound, that he has no use for; he has his pleasures, but such as are to be traced neither in the destruction of innocence, nor in the spoiliations of the gaming table; it is in pursuits of science, literature, and virtue, in study while at home, and in acts of beneficence while abroad, that his great and sole delight consists. The world resounds with the fame of Mr. Farquhar's vast wealth, and many are the exclamations of surprise at his obscure habits; but there are acts of Mr. F. unknown as yet to fame (for it is one of his peculiarities, to love to do good in secret), which show that he makes a noble use of his fortune, which, by his talents and industry, and not by his mere savings, he has acquired.

A highly respectable individual was in want of a temporary accommodation; he applied to Mr. Farquhar for his assistance, and tendered the most ample securities for any advance he might make. Mr. F. having ascertained the amount requisite to remedy the inconvenience, immediately, in the most handsome manner, presented the gentleman with ten thousand pounds, a sum which formed a considerable surplus of his necessities, and would not accept or hear of even an acknowledgment for it.

On another occasion, as he was taking his daily airing on foot, and in that garb very probably which has caused him, at times, to be regarded as a reduced gentleman, meriting patriotic compassion, he observed a gentleman eyeing very wistfully a house belonging to him, at the west end of the town, which was then to let. Mr. Farquhar, accosting him, begged to know if he wished for such a house? The stranger, indicating by his looks some surprise at a question like this, from one who seemed to have so very little to do with property of any kind; Mr. F. added, that 'because if he did, he was the owner of the house, and would be glad to shew it to him.' The gentleman observed, that 'it seemed indeed a fine house, but it was needless for him to look at it, as he was afraid it was far above his means.' 'Well, but there will be no harm in your just taking a view of it; you can see how you would like it, and we will talk afterwards about terms.' Into the house they went, and all over it; the stranger was loud in his praises; he 'would be happy,' he thought, if he had such an one to live in; but, indeed, it was impossible he could pay the rent that must be expected for it. Mr. Farquhar, who had taken one of those likings at first sight, which some people have the good luck to inspire, enquired with delicacy, into the state of the gentleman's circumstances, and prolonged the conversation by various pleasant digressions, with the view, as it seemed, of drawing out a display of his new acquaintance's character. We will not say what grounds Mr. Farquhar had to be pleased with the stranger, but they were such, that at parting it was in these words: 'You say you like the house, sir, and think you would be happy in it; now, sir, as I think you are a worthy man, who deserves to be happy, I make you a present of the house, that you may be so. Have the goodness to call at Mr. —'s, my solicitor, to-morrow, when you will find a conveyance of it made out in your favour.'

Such is Mr. Farquhar, a man whose 'avarice,' we are told, 'may be considered as a disease which he cannot control!'

MATHEMATICS.

[We are at length favoured with an answer to Question No. 47, and without any comment, we present it to our Mathematical friends exactly as we received it.—Ed.]

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Allow me to hand you a solution of question No. 47, in your Iris No. 28, which I hope you will insert,

Yours,

MUTA.

Solution of Question No. 47, in Iris No. 28, by Muta.

First, refer to the Ladies' Diary for the year 1749. Then, examine carefully the question No. 2, there proposed by the Rev. Mr. Baker, of Stokney, Lincoln; and compare it with question No. 47, proposed in the year 1822, by Mr. W. M. Lawrie, in the Manchester Iris. The questions will appear to be IDENTICALLY the same.

If, then, you refer to the Ladies' Diary for the subsequent year, 1750, and transfer the neat and elegant solution of Mr. Baker's question to the pages of the Iris; substituting for "solution of Rev. Mr. Baker's question," the words "solution of Mr. W. M. Lawrie's question," you may then, without enquiring which of the two gentlemen is the plagiarist, safely stamp your labours with the Mathematician's seal of Q. E. D.

Question No. 61, by Mr. John Hill.

Given $x + y + z = 62$; $3x + 6y + 2z = 190$ and $x^2 + y^2 + z^2 = 1452$; in which equations x , y and z represent my age in years, months, and days—Required my age?

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

Mechanics: New Percussion Lock.—Mr. George Forrest, gunmaker, of Jedburgh in Scotland, has made an ingenious improvement in the Percussion Lock. The chief advantages of his invention are, that the sportsman, before setting out, is enabled to supply priming for eighty discharges of a double-barrelled gun; that the explosions are certain, the lock easily kept clean, and not exposed to damp; and above all, perfect security against accident by the bursting of the magazine. The priming used is the same as in Forsyth's patent, viz. three parts oxymuriat of potash, one sulphur, and one charcoal.

Artificial Slates.—A species of artificial slates have been used in Russia, which are said to be very valuable, as being lighter than common slates, impermeable to water, incombustible, and made of any required form or size. They have been analyzed by M. Giorgi, who finds them to consist of bolar earth, chalk or carbonate of lime, strong glue, paper pulp, and linseed oil. The earthy materials are to be pounded and sifted; the glue dissolved in water; the paper is the common paper pulp, which, after being steeped in water, has been pressed, or it may be book-binders or stationers' shavings boiled in water and pressed. The linseed oil is to be raw. The paper pulp is to be mixed in a mortar with the dissolved glue, the earthy materials then added and beaten up, and the oil added during the beating as fast as it is absorbed. The mixture is then spread with a trowel on a plank, on which a sheet of paper has been laid, and surrounded by a ledge, to determine the thickness of the layer, and is then turned out on a plank strewed with sand to dry. When dry they are passed through a rolling mill, then pressed, and finally finished by a coat of drying oil.

The following are some of the various proportions recommended:

2 parts paper pulp, 1 glue, 1 chalk, 2 bole earth, 1 linseed oil; this forms a thin, hard and very smooth sheet.

3 parts paper pulp, 4 glue, 4 white bole earth, and 4 chalk, 1 oil; produce a uniform sheet, as hard as iron.

1 paper pulp, 1 glue, 3 white bole earth, 1 linseed oil; a beautiful elastic sheet.

When these plates or sheets were steeped in water for four months they were found not to alter at all in weight; and when exposed to a violent heat for five minutes, they were hardly altered in form, and were converted into black and very hard plates.—Tech. Rep. i. 421.

LITERATURE.

HIS LATE MAJESTY'S LIBRARY.

We have now the pleasure of laying before our readers the letter of our Sovereign, relative to this most valuable collection.—

Dear Lord Liverpool,

The King my late revered and excellent Father having formed, during a long series of years, a most valuable and extensive Library, consisting of about One hundred and twenty thousand Volumes, I have resolved to present this collection to the British Nation.

Whilst I have the satisfaction by this means of advancing the Literature of my Country, I also feel that I am paying a just tribute to the memory of a Parent, whose life was adorned with every public and private virtue.

I desire to add, that I have great pleasure, My Lord, in making this communication through you. Believe me, with great regard,

Your sincere friend,

VARIETIES.

INGENIOUS ANAGRAM.—The following anagram on the well-known bibliographer, William Oldys, may claim a place among the first productions of this class. It was by Oldys himself, and was found by his executors in one of his MSS.:—

'W. O.
'In word and WILL I AM a friend to you;
And one friend OLD IS worth a hundred new.

PHENOMENON IN OPTICS.—A lady states that she is frequently visited during the night, when perfectly awake, her room being dark, by luminous appearances on the wall of the alcove in which her bed is placed. A light mist seems at first to float in the air of the room, then the luminous rays collect into a focus, a circular spot, such as a magic lantern exhibits; on that bright spot appear the vivid representations of natural objects; sometimes a landscape, sometimes flowers arranged in a pattern. These visions have never excited any alarm in the person liable to them, but an earnest curiosity as to their exciting cause. Her eye-sight is very good; but she is much distressed by a very strong light; is uneasy when placed opposite a window, and can manage to see to read with much less light than most other persons require. It is to be observed that these visions sometimes appear several hours after the room has been dark, and that they are by no means concomitant with any degree of fever or nervous excitement.

We should be glad if any of our friends, who honor this paper with their perusal, would oblige us by their opinions on this matter.

MORALS.—The sum of a thousand francs (rather more than 40*l.* sterling) has been sent to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Morals in Paris, by an anonymous correspondent, to be divided into two prizes for the best Essays against Gambling and Lotteries.

FROST.—The severity of the late frost has not been equalled since that of 1814. So intense has been the cold, that man, beast, and bird, in many cases, have perished. The birds were so tame that they would suffer themselves to be taken by the hand, a state of submission which generally cost them their lives.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER,

From Monday Feb. 10th, to Friday Feb. 14th, 1823.

Monday.—Brutus: with High Life Below Stairs.

Tuesday.—The Mountaineers: with The New Marriage Act, and The Rendezvous.

Thursday.—A Day after the Wedding: with (first time) Tom and Jerry.

Friday.—Three weeks after Marriage: with Tom and Jerry.

Tom and Jerry, or Life in London, was brought out on Thursday night with elegant, appropriate Scenery. This humorous Extravaganza is taken from P. Egan's popular work of the same title.

The characters were sustained throughout with spirit and humour; and the whole performance was received with unqualified marks of pleasure, and approbation. We must, however, remark, that the departure, of Kate, Sue and Jane, from their homes, as well as their Metropolitan adventures are almost as unfeasible as can be imagined. Few girls possessed of common sense would so risk health, reputation, and security; and none of education and ingenious feeling, could possibly so embark in riot and dissipation.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Son of Erin, or The Cause of the Greeks: a Dramatic Poem in 5 Acts. By George Burges, A. M. of Trinity College, Cambridge.

The Ettrick Shepherd has a new romance in Ballantyne's press, entitled 'The Perils of Woman.'

The subject of the next novel by the author of 'Waverley' is 'The Gunpowder Plot.'

We understand that the author of the 'Entail' and the 'Annals of the Parish,' is engaged in a new novel, in which John Knox will form a prominent character, and that it will be in the old covenanter style. We are glad to see so good a subject fall into such able hands, and we trust that justice will be done to a body of men who have of late years been very unjustly aspersed.

Mr. Henry Neale has in the press a Volume of Dramatic and Miscellaneous Poems.

A translation, in Italian verse, of Sir Walter Scott's 'Lady of the Lake,' by M. Joseph Indelicato, has been published at Palermo.

M. Michele Leoni proceeds at Florence with the publication of his translation of Shakespeare. The Italian critics panegyrize it in high terms.

Account of an Expedition from Pittsburgh to the Rocky Mountains, performed in the year 1819-20; compiled from the Notes of Major Long, Mr. T. Say, and other gentlemen of the party; by Edwin James, botanist and geologist to the Expedition.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The interesting anecdote communicated by our esteemed correspondent S. X.; the Grammatical Query of F.; Selections from our Huddersfield Constant Reader; A Friend on Reptiles, &c.; the Lines by our Leeds Juvenis; and the chief part of E. K. shall be given in our next.

N. W. H.'s "Ode"—"most delectable Ode," is inserted in our present number—we are glad to find our friend in such very good temper; and assure him that his apology for us was perfectly, and to the letter, correct.

R. H. R. should object, from experiment, to the remarks of R. L.—It is simple and unusual to put a string of interrogatories to a man as to the accuracy of his experiments, and the sufficiency of his apparatus, &c.—R. H. R. must show that the experiments of R. L. are inaccurate, by pointing out error or probable inaccuracy; or he must prove that with the aid of a perfect apparatus, the result is different.

The communications of C. T.—J. P. W.—Romeo—Vindicta—R. T.—three Constant Readers, and Philocheerus, are received.

A considerable press of articles more immediately adapted to the nature of our Miscellany, precluded the possibility of inserting the Lancaster document.—Its extreme length is a great objection, and probably abridgment would not be approved by our friend T. K.—We wait his wish.

Essayist shall be attended to—his communications are sure to meet with an impartial decision, and be inserted when eligible.—We wish to elicit talent, and correct taste; but must at the same time study the entertainment of our general readers.

J. T. K. S. is assured that we are not unwilling to insert the pleasing or humorous debates, or conversations of his friends; but we wish for a concise article, or condensed report, rather than an uninteresting outline.

S. X. is informed that Orthography No. VI. has not been received.

REVIEW.

Memoirs of the Private Life of Marie Antoinette, Queen of France and Navarre. To which are added, Recollections, Sketches, and Anecdotes, illustrative of the Reigns of Louis XIV., Louis XV., and Louis XVI. BY MADAME CAMPAN, First Femme de Chambre to the Queen, 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1823. H. Colburn & Co.

ON entering upon the perusal of this interesting work, we meet with a biographical sketch of the writer, who, it appears, was born at Paris in October 1752. M. Genet, her father, was first clerk in the office of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. At an early age this accomplished lady became an attendant on the princesses; on the marriage of Marie Antoinette, she was attached to her suite; and she soon afterwards married M. Campan, whose father was secretary of the Queen's Closet. Madame Campan continued in attendance upon the Queen until the revolution, when she narrowly escaped the fate of her illustrious and unfortunate Mistress. She died in March 1822.

Madame Campan seems to have possessed a mind which was firmly attached to truth; well acquainted with the different events narrated; accustomed to nice discrimination; and fraught with liberal sentiment, and grateful attachment. From such a source of intellectual worth and ability, our readers will readily conclude that her pen must evidently have been directed with judgment, and that the volumes before us are peculiarly interesting—such is really the fact; and we are convinced that their perusal will not only excite much solicitude and sympathy, but also afford much gratification and entertainment.

The unhappy Marie Antoinette Joseph Jeanne de Lorraine, Archduchess of Austria, was born on the 2nd of November, 1755. At fifteen years of age her marriage with the Dauphin was arranged, and her reception at Versailles is thus described:—

A superb pavilion had been prepared upon the frontiers near Kell; it consisted of a vast saloon, connected with two apartments, one of which was assigned to the lords and ladies of the court of Vienna, and the other to the suite of the dauphiness, composed of the Countess de Noailles, her maid of honour; the Duchess de Cosé, her tirewoman; four ladies of the palace; the Count de Saulx-Tavannes, first gentleman usher; the Count de Tescé, first equerry; the Bishop of Chartres, chief almoner; the officers of the body-guards and the pages.

When the dauphiness had been entirely undressed, even to her body-linen and stockings, in order that she might retain nothing belonging to a foreign court (an etiquette always observed on such an occasion), the doors were opened; the young princess came forward, looking round for the Countess de Noailles; then, rushing into her arms, she implored her, with tears in her eyes, and with a heartfelt sincerity, to direct her, to advise her, and to be in every respect her guide and support. It was impossible to refrain from admiring her aerial gait:—her smile was sufficient to win the heart; and in this enchanting being, in whom the splendour of French gaiety shone forth,—an indescri-bable but august serenity—perhaps, also, the somewhat proud position of her head and shoulders, betrayed the daughter of the Cæsars.

The generous and humane disposition of Marie Antoinette; as well as the purity of her character; and the numerous schemes and artifices which had been used to effect her ruin, are well pointed out and strikingly illustrated by Madame C.

In consequence of the fire in the Place Louis XV. which occurred at the time of the nuptial entertainments, the dauphin and dauphiness sent their whole income for the year, to the relief of the unfortunate families who lost their relatives on that disastrous day.

This act of generosity is in itself of the number of those ostentatious kindnesses, which are dictated by the policy of princes, at least, as much as by their compassion: but the grief of Marie Antoinette was genuine, and lasted several days; nothing could console her for the loss of so many innocent victims; she spoke of it weeping to her ladies, when one of them thinking, no doubt, to divert her mind, told her that a great number of thieves had been found among the bodies, and that their pockets were filled with watches and other valuables: “they have at least been well punished,” added the person who related these particulars. “Oh, no! no, madam!” replied the dauphiness, “they died by the side of honest people.”

To shew that the most innocent, nay, laudable curiosity, may be made a subject for very plausible misrepresentation and slander, we quote the following:—

In the excursions to Marly, parties on horseback, and in calashes, were formed continually. The queen was desirous to gratify herself with one very innocent enjoyment: she had never witnessed the day-break; and having now no other consent than that of the king to seek, she intimated her wish to him. He agreed that she should go, at three o'clock in the morning, to the eminences of the gardens of Marly; and, unfortunately, little disposed to partake in her amusements, he himself went to bed. The queen then followed up her intention; but as she foresaw some inconveniences possible in this nocturnal party, she determined on having a number of people with her; and even ordered her women to accompany her. All precautions were ineffectual to prevent the effects of calumny, which even thus early sought to diminish the general attachment that she had inspired. A few days afterwards, the most wicked ballad that appeared, during the earlier years of this reign, was circulated at Paris. The blackest colours were employed to paint an enjoyment so harmless, that there is scarcely a young woman among those that live in the country, who has not endeavoured to procure it for herself. The verses which appeared on this occasion, were entitled “Sun Rise.”

The Duke de Orleans, then Duke de Chartres was among those who accompanied the young queen in her nocturnal ramble; he appeared very attentive to her on that occasion; but it was the only moment of his life in which there was any advance towards intimacy between the queen and himself. The king disliked the character of the Duke de Chartres, and the queen always kept him at a distance from her private society. It is, therefore, without the slightest foundation in probability, that some writers have attributed to feelings of jealousy, or wounded self-love, the hatred which he displayed towards the queen, during the latter years of their existence.

Of Madame de Joulanges, and her sisters,

we have the following painful, yet delightfully-interesting account;—

This excellent woman fell a victim to the revolutionary madness. She and her numerous sisters were led to the scaffold on the same day. While leaving the prison, they all chaunted the Veni Creator upon the fatal car. When arrived at the place of punishment, they did not interrupt their strains. One head fell, and ceased to mix its voice with the celestial chorus—but the strain continued. The abbess suffered last; and her single voice, with increased tone, still raised the devout versicle. It ceased at once—it was the silence of death!

THE CLUB.

No. XXVIII.—FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1823.

Still to ourselves in every place consigned
Our own felicity we make or find.—GOLDSMITH.

UNDER every disappointment and difficulty a person may find some resources, if he will only take the pains to discover and employ them. The events, indeed, which we regard as unfortunate and grievous, may sometimes be made the sources of far greater delight than those which we lament. The person who wisely endeavours to turn all circumstances to good account, cannot be long unhappy.

A man of sense will, in every difficulty, reflect that he is much better circumstanced than he might be; and when any untoward disaster takes place to derange his plans and mortify his feelings, he will find some consolation in the idea that its occurrence may have the effect of preventing some more direful misfortune.

It is recorded of some distinguished man, I believe the Rev. John Wesley, that wishing to cross a part of the sea with his carriage and horses, the animals took fright, in some way or other, and it was found to be impossible to get them on board the vessel. The intended voyager, impatient to reach the place to which he was going, was much mortified by the circumstance, and considered himself in this instance to be very unfortunate. But he had little reason for lamentation. The vessel had not got out of sight before a violent storm arose which rent it in pieces, and the whole crew perished.

In many of the events which chequer human life, we see the evil and never discover the existence of its concomitant advantage. We therefore naturally imagine that the former only has existence. This is, however, a fallacious mode of reasoning. Some of the readers of this paper may recollect the anecdote of the judge who was travelling through South Wales many years ago, when the conveyances were very irregular, and the roads rough and dangerous. His Lordship met with an accident on his journey, which, to his great concern, prevented him from proceeding. He had reason, however, to be very thankful for the misfortune, as it saved him from falling into the hands of persons who were stationed at a little distance in advance, to rob and murder him.

Not only does a small disappointment protect us sometimes from serious misfortune, but even the disappointment itself may often be converted into a source of pleasure.

One of our members, who, during the Christmas recess accepted an invitation from some friends who resided at a considerable distance, was rather unlucky in respect to the road, which, besides being very monotonous, presented for many miles, hardly a single object of interest. The weather too, was rather unfavourable; and he therefore anticipated a dull and tedious journey. He was, however, very soon agreeably undeceived. His fellow travellers turned out to be persons of much intelligence, and of agreeable manners. After a little conversation, it was proposed that there should be a regular debate, in which each person in his turn should take a part. The proposal was readily acceded to, and the necessary arrangements were made accordingly. One of the strangers, who was particularly eloquent, our friend afterwards found on inquiry to be an active member of a distinguished literary institution, and much accustomed to public speaking. A variety of interesting questions were successively discussed. Our travellers examined the popular speculations on political economy, and the baseless and idle reveries of phrenology. The character of the fair sex, which occasionally presents such striking contrarieties, was the topic on which the principal speakers appeared to the greatest advantage; and it may be interesting to our fair readers to hear, that in this party of the other sex, thrown accidentally together, the charms of personal appearance, however heightened by art, were acknowledged on all sides to be a very inadequate compensation where there was a want of a cultivated mind, or an amiable disposition. Our friend assures us, that the journey was finished before he was aware of the circumstance, and that so far from finding it tedious, as he had expected, he has seldom passed his time more agreeably.

Happiness, indeed, depends upon ourselves more than is generally imagined. Many a train of ideas, of a painful nature, might by a little exertion, have been easily displaced at their commencement by lively and agreeable reflections. Nothing is more absurd in many cases than the plea of constitutional melancholy. Where a person's conscience is at ease there is no reason that he should not preserve a decent cheerfulness under all circumstances. Goldsmith has, in his interesting story of the old Soldier, very ingeniously illustrated the maxim which I have placed, in his own words, at the head of this paper. If we give ourselves the trouble to look at the most favourable side of any situation in which we happen to be placed, we shall find that how disastrous soever it may at first appear, it is never without sources of consolation.

I might add something respecting the value of religious impressions in enabling us to support ourselves under affliction; but the subject is so vulgar and unfashionable that a man of spirit would rather endure any consequences than seek for consolation from such a source; like poor Chatterton, in whom the aberrations as well as the splendour of genius were so strikingly exhibited, who, though he had not tasted food for nearly three days, and was upon the verge of starvation, declined a pressing invitation to dinner, under the apprehension that, if his circumstances should chance to be known, he might, by accepting it, be considered as making some sacrifice of his independence. Readers of this temper will not perhaps, think any better of our speculations when they are told that the consoling power of religious principles is a frequent and favourite topic of consolation at the Club. The President, of whose piety we have before had occasion to speak, takes a peculiar pleasure in dwelling upon this subject. His habitually deliberate and measured expression, insensibly gives place, at such times, to a warm and impassioned method of speaking; and he is never so far from being tiresome as when expatiating on those serious and awful themes, which, as they are commonly treated of in conversation, generally serve no other purpose but to increase the number of human calamities, by wasting the time, and exhausting the patience of those to whom the cold and insipid commonplace is addressed.

P. S. The letter of Mr. Job Peaceful is under consideration. All communications intended for the Club should be addressed to Mr. M. Medium, the Secretary, at the Iris Office.

THE SEASONS.

Sweet smiling Spring, thou comest to bring,
Those joys which sweetly charm us;
And Phoebus rays again displays,—
To sooth, and cheer, and warm us.

The chilling blast is almost past,
Cold Winter's fast receding;
And shady bow'r and fragrant flow'r,
Our fancy sees succeeding.

In lively green the fields are seen,
True emblems of life's pleasure;
And budding trees and gentle breeze,
Beguile our hours of leisure.

Sweet season thou dost overflow,
With joys for ev'ry creature;
And cold to thee that heart must be,
Which shows a frowning feature.

The warblers sweet which oft repeat,
Their charming notes in Summer;
With lively joy their powers employ,
To hail thee cheerful-come.

O, gentle Spring, could she but sing,
My muse would tell thy beauties;
But she must now proceed to show,
(Which warns me of my duties.)

How seasons roll—without control;
Vain Man! see thy ambition!
How soon life's bloom's immers'd in gloom,
And think of thy condition!

First comes the Spring on joyous wing,
And blossoms young smell sweetly;
While all things grand the thoughts expand,
And captivate completely.

Then Summer strews refreshing dews,
And all is fresh and bloomy;
Rich scenes adorn each rising morn,
No part of Nature's gloomy.

The orb of day, with brilliant ray,
Shows nature in her grandeur;
Refulgent beams, o'er nature stream,
And clouds of morning squander.

The fruitful trees all blooming, please,
No boist'rous winds to shake 'em;
Serenely fine, no frosts incline,
From chemic course to wake 'em.

Sublimely drest, from east to west,
Revolves the orb of splendour;
And makes us stray where zephyrs play,
And crystal streams meander.

Man's hope and dream from nature seem,
On every side now flowing;
And joys of life supremely ripe,
And ecstacy bright glowing.

But as the tomb fades all our bloom,
However sweet or pretty;
So Autumn comes and slightly numbs,
While we, admiring,—pity.

The blooming flower and rosy bower,
Must fade and fall together;
They sweetly shine while all is fine,
But fly the changing weather.

Orchard and field their produce yield,
And harvest is quite ready;
Whilst mist and cloud, the morn enshroud,
Though eve is calm and steady.

The sinking Sun when he has run,
The course which was intended;
By nature's laws completely draws,
An emblem of time ended.

The herbs and trees now feel the breeze,
Which robs them of their grandeur;
Whilst every gale makes bare the vale,
And leaves, like outcasts, wander.

The Sun, sometimes, bursts out and shines,
And nature then looks bloomy;
As oft the face shows every grace,
When all within is gloomy.

Stern Winter comes and all benumbs!
Nor tree remains to please us;
Keen frost attends the glooms he sends,
And every river freezes.

Within the cot, far-far'd or not,
Man tunes his fav'rite lyre;
Whilst'er descends, the chosen friends,
Sit happy round the fire.

But, hark! without, old Winter's rout,
Are in their fury clashing;
The pebbly shore is calm no more,
Wild waves each other, dashing.

Now looks the eye up to the sky,
But mists and clouds hang round it;
The whole is clad in vesture sad,
No charming scenes surround it.

Though Winter blows, his power shows,
And sways his sceptre keenly;
Yet lovely spring, on spreading wing,
Views all again serenely.

In life she reigns, and keenest pains
Of pale despair soon vanish;
The heart receives, like budding leaves,
Sweet beams which sorrows banish.

Just like the flower within the bower,
Man blooms and fades no weather;
But in his prime, he fades from time,—
Death withers all together!

O, happy ye who live to see,
When this frail life is ended;
That vernal bloom o'er which a gloom,
Can never be impended.

MY SPORTING-BOX.

I now turned my thoughts entirely to the shooting, and determined upon losing no time in ascertaining my confines, and exercising my pointers. My heart misgave me even before the commencement of my pilgrimage, for, when I desired Friday to supply his pockets with a day's provision, he appeared not to understand me; and, upon farther explanation, assured me that there was no sort of danger of our returning too late for luncheon—a reply which, as may be supposed, gave me no very favourable idea of the extent of my dominions. I was likewise considerably daunted by the sight of a very tremendous whip with which Friday had found it necessary to provide himself, which led me to believe that my dogs were rather suspicious characters, and not quite so well educated as they ought to have been. But I said nothing, and determined to trust to nothing but my own observations, for Friday had evidently a hankering kindness for his old master, (with whom, perhaps, he had the promise of being re-established whenever it should please God to make me sick of my bargain,) and seemed totally unwilling to be called in evidence against any little accidental misrepresentations which might have a chance of passing with me.

The region about my chateau de chasse was composed chiefly of rushes and red clay, with, here and there, an interesting variety of swamp, occasionally ornamented with a straggling alder, or stunted willow-tree. The first step I placed upon it was quite sufficient to establish its reputation for wild ducks, for I marched "into the bowels of the land" nearly up to those of a person for whose comfort and costume I have a very high respect. Friday very obligingly helped me out, and kindly advised me to mind where I stepped, or I should certainly get wet and take an ague, for which the marsh was scarcely less celebrated than it was for the ducks. My course was more cautiously regulated, and we marched steadily onward for about half a mile, to the tune of a long story respecting Friday's late master and a certain marvellous wild goose, when our cars were suddenly arrested by a duet on the part of Dido and Ponto, or rather by a simultaneous bravura, which was instigated by an animal of the very species which had been occupying our conversation—save and except that he was not wild—I can safely affirm that I never before saw a respectable gander in such peril.—Ponto had fairly snapped out his tail, and, as he rose in loud expostulation to quit the marsh, Dido made a jump at his long legs, which had well-nigh proved mortal. The sagacious bird seemed to be perfectly aware of this, and increased his altitude to about six feet, which was just high enough for his personal preservation, and just low enough to tempt his assailants to the pursuit which lasted to the next farm-house, (a distance of about a quarter of a mile,) each stretching out its neck to the utmost extent, and apparently using its voice for the purpose of cursing its carcass which could not follow with greater expedition. Friday seemed to undergo considerable perturbation at this little incident. He whistled till he was black in the face, and cracked his whip till he wore out the lash; but Ponto and Dido did not find it convenient to pay him the smallest attention, and continued the sport till dogs and geese were no longer visible. Friday saw my look of astonished enquiry, and hastened to reply to it. It was, he confessed, very extraordinary behaviour for such well-bred dogs, but they wanted practice, and he had no doubt that a few lessons with the whip would make them all-accomplished; in the course of which assurance, he mentioned incidentally that they were two of the best rat-catchers in the country—a branch of the canine profession for which I began to think them peculiarly qualified.

We pursued our pilgrimage for about three miles, through the same delightful interchange of scenery which I have already described, and without any particular event or moving accident, excepting now and then the injudicious deposition of my foot in some meandering mineral stream, which crawled like a reptile across our path, all glittering in its green and yellow filth, and seemed prepared to fly in the face of all improvident travellers.—Friday continued to enliven the walk by expatiating on the sport which this morass would afford me, till we arrived where it was terminated by the turnpike-road, by which he proposed our return home. I bade him be under no alarm lest I should knock up, for I was, in fact, a very excellent walker, and intended, before I returned, to explore the partridge-ground. Friday looked rather daunted as so pointed to the quagmire, and informed me that we had already explored it.—“What,” said I, “would you make me believe that the partridge is an aquatic bird? nothing but ducks and geese could live here! where are the three turnip-fields, and the thirteen covies?” Friday pointed to them on the brow of a hill which ascended at a short distance from the borders of the bog, and I immediately began striding off for a nearer inspection of them.—“I beg pardon, Sir,” said Friday, “but we must not go there.”—“Not go! and why not?” “Because, Sir, you have not got leave.” “You rogue, do I not pay for it?” “No, Sir—only for the ground I have shown you.—Those fields belong to Mr. L.—, and he is a very particular gentleman.” At this information Friday observed my choler rising to a very alarming degree, and did not, as I thought, anticipate any very abundant pleasure from the conversation which was likely to ensue. The result of it went to prove, that the “manor, well stocked with game” which had seduced me from the purlieus of the metropolis, consisted of the bog, and the bog for as. That the three turnip-fields, with sandy coppices and stubbles of various descriptions, belonged to Mr. L.—, who had been some time abroad, and had bequeathed the deputation to my landlord. That Mr. L.— had at length returned to repose his own, which occasioned the advertisement of the “elegant cottage,” and the departure of my said landlord to more auspicious regions.

It was some time before I had sufficient command of myself to trust my voice. This it is, I thought, to run away from one's business, in the vain-glorious pursuit of distinctions beyond one's attainment! How could such an arrant cockney expect to deal with an experienced sportsman without being humbled in spirit, and ruined in reputation. My chief difficulty was how to support myself under the ridicule of my wife, and the friends whose predictions were in such a fair way of fulfilment. My sporting-box would form a tale which would outlive my epitaph. The only expedient I could devise was to confine my calamities to my own breast. To reprove the friends who lay under sentence of sporting with me on the first of September, and to persuade my wife that it was a bad breeding season, and totally unproductive of birds. The thought in some degree patched up my wounded pride, but the wound in my expectations was incurable.—“Friday,” I said, “do you know any one who wants to purchase a fowling-piece, and a brace of thorough-bred dogs?” Friday still persisted that I should have occasion for them; myself, for, that in the heat of the day when Mr. L.— was firing in the turnip-fields, the birds would fly directly for refuge into my “well-stocked manor,” which would sometimes give me three or four shots a-day—and then the winter-shooting! The snipes and the ducks! Friday was an able orator, and used the gift to the best of his ability, whilst I was a disappointed and desponding man, and felt anxious to be reassured. Under these circumstances I suffered myself to be persuaded that things were not quite so bad—walked home as patiently as circumstances would permit—assisted in the castigation of my dogs who had preceded me in my arrival—and met my wife with something like a smile of complacency.

It would be endless to narrate with what alternate hope and despondency I completed my preparations for the first of September. The obagrin which I felt on the sham illness which excused me from the visits of my friends; the exultation with which I inflicted a mortal wound upon the partridge I had chalked against the garden-gate; the dismay with which I contemplated the capacious game-bag which my wife had taken care to provide; and the comfort which I derived from the reflection that fishing was, after all, but a mawkish amusement, and not to be compared with shooting,—all these sensations served to keep me in a continual ferment, till the arrival of the day of slaughter.

It was my intention, when I entered upon this dolorous history, to give a circumstantial detail of the occurrences of this grand epoch of my life, which placed the first of September in the front-rank of days, and made it co-equal with those famous grenadiers, the first of August and the eighteenth of June, who gained so much renown at the Nile and Waterloo. My limits, however, are already overstepped, and I must, perforce spare the feelings of the reader and my own. I will only say, that, during the last night of August, like that which preceded my invasion of the river Mud, my nerves were in a state of considerable irritation. Every attempt which my eyes made to close, and my senses to reel, was disturbed by the buzzing up of a partridge under my nose; and on every such occasion I was startled into a feverish sense of existence by the electric report of my gun. I was in the field two hours before daylight,—took my station in the middle of the bog, to watch Mr. L.'s turnip-fields, and did not return till after sunset. My wife rushed into my arms, to congratulate me on my safety,—the game-bag was unbuckled from my shoulders and examined;—and, oh, ye Gods! what was the result? An empty bottle, the remainder of a half quarter loaf, and the nibbled fragments of a Dutch cheese! What! not one bird! Not a feather,—by all the Gods and Demi-gods, from Jove to the Lord Mayor! The wind had been in an unfavourable quarter, and Mr. L.'s birds had flown the wrong way.

My wife did not upbraid me—she did not ridicule me—she was all kindness and consolation—she told me the best of sportsmen would sometimes have blank days, and bade me be of good cheer, for it happened very luckily, since I had been unsuccessful, that she had just received a very fine bird from London. The vixen!—The cold-blooded insulter of her liege lord! Reader, what bird dost thou think it was? It was the magpie!—The never-to-be-sufficiently-execrated magpie, stuffed and stuck upon the chimney-piece, and looking as vivacious as on the day from which I date my calamities.

This was the most crying shame of all;—I would have been angry, but I found that justice, as usual, had sided with the opposite party, and I knew that any complaint would be answered by an enquiry respecting the divine right of man to transport a poor forlorn woman into a wilderness, and expose her to all the horrors of solitude and starvation. All that I had to do, therefore, was to acquiesce in the opprobrium which was heaped upon me through the medium of epicletic glances and meek congratulations, and to humble myself like a truly repentant sinner.

Days and weeks passed away, and still the rising sun found me upon the large flat stone in the morass, gazing wistfully upon L.'s turnips; but never did the rising moon behold a bird in my bag. The new year came, and still I was as constant to my watch as a broker upon 'Change, or a beggar upon his walk,—but still my game-book exhibited nothing but ciphers. I mean this, however, merely with respect to act of parliament game, for my evil genius knew his trade too well to leave me wholly without encouragement, and led me on from month to month with petty successes, which were few and far apart, till all remedy, in the way of a fresh shade for the sporting season, was too late. Thus, on the 10th of September I administered a few grains of patent shot to an owl, which was sorely troubled with the whooping-cough, and broke in upon the nocturnal harmonies of Dido and Ponto. On the 15th of the following month I inflicted condign punishment upon “two covies,” who were keeping the passover upon a lamb which had been mired in the bog. And on the 5th of November, I particularly distinguished myself, in conjunction with certain bloody-minded boys, in the pursuit of a family of squirrels, who had made a lodgment in a row of chestnut-trees hard by. They afforded excellent sport, and “Ere a blow was struck,

An arrow from my bow had pierced their chief,
Who wore that day the arms which now I wear;”

for I converted his skin into a parae, of which the teeth form the clasp, and the tail the tassel. The 17th of December, however, was the most eventful day of my sporting annals, for as Friday and I were sitting, as usual, upon the large flat stone, just about day-break, our attention was arrested by the approach of a most enormous bird, which appeared to be of the Rock species—better known, perhaps, to the readers of Fairy Tales than the sportsman, or the student of natural history. Such a dish, I thought, never administered to the cravings of an alderman, or flourished at a coronation feast. He spread his broad sails directly over my head, at the distance of about twenty paces, and I placed my finger upon the fatal trigger. The report was like a clap of Jove's thunder,—and he fell like a Titan. In my haste to secure my prize I had well nigh encountered the fate of Lord Ravenswood in the Kelpie-flow. I was, however, only up to the neck, and by dint of a persevering grasp on the bird's windpipe on my right, and the notable exertions of Friday on my left, I emerged without injury. Neither I nor my keeper could divine the species, but we both agreed that it was “Rara avis in terris, nigroque similis cygno.”

It was, indeed, very like a swan; but, of course, it must be something else, for to kill a Thames swan, I had heard, was transportation, and that I should do any thing worthy of such a catastrophe was out of the nature of things. My wife, however, was seriously alarmed, and advised me to call in one or two of our neighbours, who were versed in such matters, to hold an inquest upon the body. One gentleman, who was the oracle of the rest, and known to be infallible, made his appearance with a volume of Buffon under his arm, and assured me that he would at first sight prove fully to my satisfaction, whether the bird was a goose or a swan; or, in other words, whether I was to pass the next seven years at home or in New South Wales. The corpse was laid out upon the dining-table, and the men of science commenced their enquiry. It was measured from head to tail, and from wing to wing, and turned from back to belly, a dozen times—opinions varied, and Buffon was called in as umpire, when the foreman gave his firm decision that the defunct was neither a goose,—nor a hooper,—nor a Muscovy duck,—nor any other bird in the creation, than a tame swan, and moreover, a king's swan, which was made manifest by the royal mark upon his beak. I was advised to akin and devour it without delay, as there was every likelihood of my castle being subject to the investigation of a search-warrant, which might be productive of much inconvenience. But my appetite was gone, and as soon as the inquisitors had departed, I gave Friday a guinea to keep the secret—took a spade from the tool-house,—laid the royal victim, without tomb-stone or elegy, in a corner of the kitchen garden, and dreamt of Botany-Bay and the Tread-mill for a month after.

At last one day, as Friday and I were on the old station, and agreeing, for the twenty thousandth time, that it was very odd, the waters began to rise around me, and place me very much in the predicament of the famous king Canote. The sight verily rejoiced the heart of Friday as much as it dismayed that of his master. The river, he said, had swollen, and the country would be overflowed, and then there would be an influx of snipes and ducks, such as was never known. The snipes would be found on the islets, and the ducks would be swimming round them.

Alas! that ever I should live to say that I have seen as much as Noah! I saw the last spot of land swallowed up in the bosom of the waters, and I saw my abode insulated within a space which gave it all the horrors of an ark. Where now are the snipes to be found? On the islets!—Woe is me, there is not such a thing to be seen within five miles! But the ducks!—True; I can shoot them from my parlour window—when they come.

I went out in the punt every night for the first week of the flood, to take my position under the old oak-tree, from which my wondrous landlord massacred the sixteen ducks,—but none of their brethren ever came to enquire after them during my vigils. If any one is inclined to find fault with the shortness of their duration, I would only invite him to watch one night for about six hours, as I have done, with no comfort but an east wind and a sleet storm.—I have rubbed my frozen fingers till the skin has peeled off like that of a boiled potatoe; and I have stamped against the bottom of the punt till I have well nigh kicked it out, and committed myself and gamekeeper to the mercy of the midnight elements. Sometimes I have climbed the old oak, and lain perdu as cautious as king Charles,—and sometimes I have waded up to the waistband, more fearless than the Old Man of the Sea. I will ask all the sportsmen that ever died of a sore throat, or a broken bone, what mortal could do more;—yet I failed—I never shot a duck.

As all, or nearly all, of the foregoing narrative is written, like Cæsar's Commentaries, in the past tense, the reader will naturally conclude that my griefs are over. It concerns me exceedingly to contradict him. At this present writing Friday is punting himself to the village (in which the houses look less like houses than rocks in a rapid river), for our daily bread. The few trees which enrich my prospect are every moment growing shorter, and the retiring hedge-rows, like experienced lawyers, seemed determined to confound the property of all the farmers in the neighbourhood. In the midst of this external desolation, I am threatened with destruction from within,—for a land-spring has burst in the cellar, and advances every hour a step nearer to the kitchen, from whence it will, no doubt, be promoted to the parlour where I am sitting, in which it will probably take permanent lodgings. If it were not for this memoir, which has occasionally given me something to think of, I verily believe that the next dead shot I should make would be myself. I expected that all my time would be taken up by sporting, and all my wife's by witnessing my skill; consequently, I have no books, but the "Art of Shooting Flying," and no music but the howling of my dogs.—I dare not look out of the window for horror,—I dare not turn to my wife for shame,—and I dare not sit in the chimney-corner for the magpie;—what will become of me, now my paper is finished, I know not. I will subjoin a couple of advertisements, and trust in Providence.

TO SPORTSMEN.

TO be disposed of, considerably under prime cost, the entire equipment of a sportsman, retiring from the field; consisting of a celebrated gun, and brace of bran new pointers, which have never been used; also, of every engine for the capture or destruction of every species of game, wild-fowl, or vermin; likewise, of a variety of mau-traps and spring-guns, for the detection or annihilation of poachers; likewise, a punt, and couple of decoy-ducks in excellent voice; likewise, a considerable store of ammunition of all sorts; and lastly, the most complete collection of fishing-nets, hooks, flies, and rods, that ever were submitted to the public. Should any gentleman have taken a fancy, from the foregoing account, to the advertiser's Sporting Box, he has no objection to under let it for the remaining six months of his lease, which would give the tenant the benefit of the floods, and likewise of all the spring fishing in the river Mad.

WANTS A PLACE,

AS Gamekeeper, a Young Man, who thoroughly understands his business, and can have an undeniable character from his present master, who only parts with him because he has no farther service for him. As a preserver of game, inspector of fisheries, and breaker of dogs, he is perfectly unrivalled, having lately had large concerns of this nature on his hands. Wages not so much his object, as a place, the advertiser having a particular objection to working upon the roads.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I met with the following interesting little story some time ago amongst a collection of short pieces, bound up with a Pocket Almanack which is published annually in Paris, entitled "Almanach des Dames."—It is the production of a Lady. The reading of it gave me so much pleasure, that I attempted a translation, which I venture to send you. It falls far short of the original, but, nevertheless, I trust that your readers will discover some traces of the simplicity and pathos that run through it, and, like me, when they have read it, regret that it is ended.

KYRLE.

THE RETURN.

After an absence of seven years, young Herbert the joiner, was on his road returning to the little town in which he was born. It was his last day's journey; it was not far from noon, and he had yet eight leagues to walk; he had just been taking a frugal repast in a small village, and was resting himself under an osier in a meadow hard by the high-road, to recruit his strength a little. He mused as he sat, on the happiness he should soon enjoy in seeing his relations and friends again, and the tears escaped involuntarily from his eyes; a thousand sweet recollections occupied his soul, and awakened in it a train of peculiar emotions. The season added still further to his sadness; it was the end of Autumn; a cold damp wind blew from the west, and the vapour of his breath had already assumed a visible form. The sky was cloudy, which gave to the picture of destruction and death that the landscape around him presented, a still more gloomy appearance; the corn-fields presented nothing but a dried stubble—the meadows a yellow withered verdure bestrewn with a few solitary colchicums; the woods were becoming transparent; the fruit trees stripped of their fruit let fall their brown leaves one after another; every now and then from the osier under which the young man was seated, leaves of a pale yellow were detached, which, after having been blown about by the wind, fell twirling round into a brook near him: the monotonous gryllus* chirped his farewell; and the sparrow and the wren hopped backwards and forwards through the leafless hedges.

Thus every thing contributed to augment Herbert's pensiveness, but especially the thoughts he cast upon the years that had passed, which had glided by like a dream that leaves scarcely any impression. When we feel sad in reflecting on past time, it does not always imply that it has been ill employed, and that there is cause for repentance, at least it was not so with the young workman, Herbert; this excellent young man had remained faithful to the virtuous precepts he had received in his childhood, from his good, though simple parents; his heart was still innocent and pure; none of the masters for whom he had worked had witnessed his departure without regret; he had always shewn so much fidelity—so much assiduity—so much skill:—he manifested so great an interest in every thing relative to the family—he was so mild—so complaisant, that he was always treated more like a brother, or a son, than a servant. Nor when we think on the time already flown by, with regret, does it always imply that we have an afflicting future before us. This same Time, which has marked our career, which has been a witness of all the changes that have taken place in our sentiments, in our habits, we are accustomed to look upon as a part of ourselves, and we do not separate from it without painful feelings; our heart is oppressed—we are dejected as we contemplate the past, as with the recollection of a friend who was dear to us, and whom we shall never see again. Sometimes we wish to recal some of these hours, and stamp them permanently upon our minds; we regret even our tempestuous days: at other times we seem to be upon the brink of an abyss, into which we have let fall something very precious, and highly prized; we look wistfully some time towards the bottom, where a pitchy darkness reigns, and it is not without a kind of combat with ourselves, that we leave the spot and proceed on our journey; we often turn our head towards the place where that we so much regret is buried for ever. Not much short of this state was the mind of our young traveller when he reflected upon his life. He recalled, as it might be yesterday, the moment of his departure from his paternal roof; he still saw his good mother's tender and anxious activity;—all the little things she had got ready,—and the tears that ran down her cheeks as she made up his portmanteau, into which she kept putting something more;—and the serious and concerned air his father wore;—and the sadness he felt from the joyful caresses of the dog, which, poor thing, did not foresee his departure;—he recalled even the crackling of the kitchen fire, by which he had supped for the last time with his dear parents—even the little dish that constituted the supper, and which was hardly touched;—he recalled also the sound exhortations of his virtuous father, and his mother's fears at the dangers he might meet with.

* An insect of the cricket kind.

These recollections recalled to his mind by turns the different places through which he had travelled,—the towns in which he had made a stay, the impression made upon him by the physiognomy of strangers, and whatever he had seen or heard for the first time; he mused on the delights he had experienced, and the troubles he had undergone in his travels alone or in company—he thought of his friends—his fellow-workmen—the trade he followed—how many beds for newly married couples he had made;—how many cradles—how many coffins had gone through his hands.

After half an hour's repose, spent in vague reveries, he drew from his pocket his mother's last letter, which he had received about six weeks before, and which contained the order for his return: he had already read it more than once; but the course of his reflections gave him a desire to read it again:—It ran exactly as follows:—

"MY VERY DEAR SON,

"I begin by thanking the Almighty for having blessed you with health and strength; you will now be able to undertake the longed-for journey which is to bring you to your paternal roof; your father is anxious that you should be with us in two months at the farthest, we can no longer do without you, I am very much aged, and you'll scarcely know me; I begin to stoop, all my gowns are now too long for me; the old mantua-maker, Marianne, whom you surely have not forgotten, and who begs to be remembered, is busy altering those I mean to wear. I have put on one side all my best to give to your wife; it is to be married that we wish you to come home, and the sooner the better. Your father gets old and infirm, he can no longer use the plane or saw as he used to do; he has frequent attacks of rheumatism, and is very dull of hearing. You know there are always numbers of envious persons, who watch for an opportunity of taking their neighbour's custom; you must come then: your father will give his workshop up to you, you shall take a wife, and we will retire from business; please God you will not want work. A good old nobleman, who knew your father in his youth, is come to settle here; yesterday he came to the shop, and talked a long time with him: he is quite grey, and is so kind—so affable! one would not think he was so very rich, but he is, and wishes us well. He has a grand-daughter who is to be married next spring; he wishes us to make the marriage bed, and all the furniture, that is to say, you; for as he ordered each thing, as your father did not well hear what he said, I always went towards him, and said, making a curtsy, O yes, sure, Sir, our Henry will do that wonderfully well. He laughed, and said, I intend to furnish my town-house also; your son, good mother, shall make every article, and at last my coffin. I could not refrain from weeping as I listened to this worthy man, though I think, sure enough, your father and myself will die before him; but this is a very good beginning. With respect to your wife, we have cast our eye for you on a decent and very pretty girl, who has some little money, and is very economical. You shall marry her, if she pleases you, but I am sure she will please you; and as to her, she'll have some difficulty to find a husband with as much good sense, and as good-looking as my Henry, though I say it. She has lost her mother, and will love me no less for it; she lives with her father, a good and respectable old man, with whom we have already spoken of the matter, and who, from hearing us say what we have of you, is very willing to have you for his son-in-law; you do not know him;—it is not above four years since he came, quite a stranger, to settle in a village two leagues hence; as soon as you are come, we'll go and see them—some Sunday. We are very great friends, and are distantly related—his great-aunt married my grand-father's brother-in-law; I am sure you'll find your great-cousin quite to your mind. She is not a coarse-looking girl; her cheeks are red and white like the bloom of the apple-tree, and her eyes as sparkling as two stars; I assure you she is very pretty, and already with a light I see her decked in the bridal gown, and the wreath of flowers on her head. Only marry her, my son, and you will be happy; I was not half so good-looking as she, and nevertheless your father took me with pleasure, and has not repented of it; as to the rest it will be as God pleases, but I have fixed my mind on this marriage.

"Your father earnestly wishes you to return; if our Henry was only here! he says every day. Dear child, come to us again, you will be our consolation and prop in old age; and God, who has hitherto protected us, will grant me the happiness of rocking your little ones yet: may he bring you back to our arms!—and soon! We pray for you night and morning."

"Your affectionate Mother,

"MARY HERBERT."

With an air of concern, Herbert folded up the letter, put it into his pocket, shook his head, and got up; and resuming his journey, he went some leagues reflecting on the latter part of it. The idea of a handsome young girl should not be painful to a young man who has thoughts of being married, however, notwithstanding the good opinion he had of his mother's intentions, he had some doubt of her judgment in beauty; he thought that a woman, even a mother, was not always the best judge of what will please a man; in the course of his travels, he had seen so many examples of ill-matched unions—of husbands and wives miserable in consequence of their taste not having been consulted, that he had formed the resolution of choosing his companion himself, and of consulting his inclination alone; he thought that this project would thwart his parents' views, and place him with regard to them in a very painful situation.

(To be concluded in our next.)

MR. EDITOR,—From the effect I have always observed, on reading the following Anecdote to different companies of females, and the approbation they have uniformly expressed of the dénouement, or catastrophe, of the narrative, I am persuaded that you cannot afford a higher or better treat to your readers in general, but more particularly and essentially, to the female part, who have it so much in their power to contribute to the happiness of society at large, than by giving it an early and very conspicuous place in your admirable miscellany. Your's faithfully, February, 1823. S. X.

ANECDOTE

Of the late Rev. Samuel Ayscough, many years Assistant Librarian in the British Museum.*

O, Woman! in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
And variable as the shade
By the light quivering aspen made:
When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering Angel thou!

One day, according to the rules of his office, Mr. Ayscough attended, through that grand national magazine of curiosities, a party of

*It may be useful to remark that the mode of admission into the British Museum, was formerly on a quite different system from what it now is. The mode formerly was, to leave your ladies and one gentleman; all of whom, except one of the ladies, were disposed to be highly pleased with what they saw; and really would have been so, if this "uncertain, coy," and capricious fair-one had not continually damped gratification, with such exclamations as these:—"Oh! trumpery! come along:—Lord, I see nothing worth looking at."

This lady, being the handsomest of the group, Mr. Ayscough, who, although an old bachelor, was always a great admirer of personal beauty, at first attached himself to her, as his temporary favourite; but he soon had reason to transfer his particular attentions to another of the party, less handsome, indeed, but far more amiable.—On her continuing a similar strain of exclamations, uttered with correspondent looks and supercilious demeanour, he turned towards her, and said,—“My sweet young lady, what pains you kindly take to prevent that fine face of yours from killing half the beaux in London!” And then directed his conversation, explanatory of the different objects before them, to the rest of the party. So much influence, however, she had over her companions, that, beaten as the round was to Mr. Ayscough, she caused him to finish it considerably sooner than was either pleasant to his mind, or convenient to the state and ponderosity of his body.—Whilst in the last room, just before he made his parting bow, addressing himself to her, with that suavity of manner which was so peculiar to him, he smilingly said,—“Why, what a cross little puss you are! nothing pleases you! Here are ten thousand curious and valuable things, brought, at a vast expense, from all parts of the world; and you turn up your nose at the whole of them. Do you think that, with these airs, that pretty face of yours will ever get you a husband? Not if he knows you half an hour first. Almost every day of my life, and especially when attending ladies through these rooms, I regret that I am still on old bachelor: for I see so many charming, good-tempered women, that I reproach myself for not trying to persuade one of them to bless me with her company. But I cannot fall in love with you; and I'll honestly tell you, I shall sincerely pity the man that does; for I'm sure you'll plague him out of his life.”

During this singular valedictory speech, delivered with such good-humoured pleasantry, that even the reproved could not take offence at it, the gentleman who was also of the party, looked now at the speaker, and then at the lady, with considerable emotion, but said nothing: whilst she called up no small portion of lightning into a fine pair of dark eyes, and some transient flashes of it into her cheeks; and then, with her friends, (who cordially wished their candid and pleasant Ciceroni a good morning,) withdrew.

Somewhat more than a year afterwards, on going the same round again, Mr. Ayscough was particularly pleased with one lady of the party; and that one being the prettiest, he contrived, according to his wonted custom, (as a sailor name and place of residence with the porter, at the gate of the Museum, who told you when you were to call again for a ticket of admission, specifying the day and hour, when you would have an opportunity of joining a party, and of being accompanied by one of the Librarian's, through the different rooms of that extensive and splendid collection of antiquities, books, and natural curiosities.

The regulations since adopted, with respect to the admission of visitors to view the Museum, are entirely changed, and changed, too, for the better. All the open parts of the Museum may be seen between the hours of two and four, every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, (Christmas week, Easter week, and Whit-un week excepted, and the months of August and September,) simply on the visitor's entering his name and place of abode, in a book kept for that purpose, and no other application or form is now requisite.

would say,) soon to near her.—Respectfully inquisitive concerning every object which time allowed her to notice, she asked a variety of questions; and most willingly,

“He taught his lovely fair-one all he knew:”

whilst, in the most engaging manner, she drew the attention of her friends to many curiosities, which they would otherwise have passed by unnoticed. In short, as good old Bishop Rundle says,—she “being disposed to be pleased with every thing, every thing conspired to please her.” Nor was less pleased her worthy and benevolent guide: who, whilst she was contemplating the rare beauties of nature, was contemplating, not only the charms of her person, but also and principally, the superior beauties of her mind.—At length, “the wonders ended,” he was about to make his bow, when the fascinating fair-one, with an arch smile, (looking him somewhat askew in the face,) asked him, whether he remembered her? “No, Ma'am,” said he, “but I shall not easily or soon forget you.”—Then linking her arm in that of a gentleman who was of the party, she asked, in the same engaging manner, whether he remembered him? To which Mr. Ayscough replied, he thought he did; but the gentleman looked better than when he saw him before.—“Now, Sir,” said she, “don't you recollect once, in this very room, giving a lady, who was pleased with nothing, and displeased with every thing, a smart lecture for her caprice and ill-temper?”—“Yes, Ma'am, I do.” Well, Sir; I am that lady; or, I should rather say, I was that lady: for you have been the means, in the hands of divine providence, of making me a totally different being from what I then was; and I am now come to thank you for it. Your half-in-jest and half-in-earnest mode of reproof caused me to know myself, and was of far more use than all that had been done before, in correcting a spoiled temper. After we had left the Museum, (continued she,) “Good God!” said I to myself, “if I appear thus unamiable to a stranger, how must I appear to my friends; especially to those who are destined to live constantly with me?”—You asked me, Sir, if I ever expected to get a husband;—I then had one—this gentleman—who, you may recollect, was present at your just and well-merited reproof; “he spoke not, but earnestly gazed on his bride;” and I dare say he will now join with me in thanking you for giving it so frankly and so successfully.”

The husband then most cordially repeated his acknowledgments to Mr. Ayscough, for having been instrumental in contributing so largely to their mutual felicity; “a felicity,” said he, “which, should any thing lead you, Sir, into our neighbourhood, you will equally gratify both myself and my wife, if you will call and witness.”—Then leaving his address, and he and his lady shaking Mr. Ayscough by the hand, they took their departure.

Here, surely, was an heroic triumph over temper; and, as the wise king observes, greater does this sensible and ingenuous woman appear, in ruling her spirit, than he that taketh a city.

TO ———.

Thou charming maid, oft I survey
The sweetness that adorns thy face!—
And scarce can wrest my eyes away,
From such soul-captivating grace.

When first my eyes those charms beheld,
That lovely and attracting mein,
My heart with strange emotions fill'd,
Though erst from love estrang'd I'd been.

I felt (what I ne'er felt before)
A sweet delight within me glow;
I priz'd (and hop'd to prize still more)
Thee, as my only bliss below.

Thou source of all my earthly joy,
O grant me one expressive smile!
(Benignity without alloy.)
Twill all my tedious hours beguile.

Possess'd of thee, in bliss supreme,
Shall days and years glide sweet away;
And love and joy be all my theme,
From morning till the close of day!

JUVENIS.

LAMENTATION FOR THE DEATH OF CELIN.

(From Ancient Spanish Ballads, &c.)

At the gate of old Granada, when all its bolts are barr'd,
At twilight at the Vega gate there is a trampling heard;
There is a trampling heard, as of horses treading slow,
And a weeping voice of women, and a heavy sound of woe.
"What low'st thou fall'n, what star is set, what chief come these bewailing?"—

"A tower is fall'n, a star is set. Alas! alas for Celin!"—

Three times they knock, three times they cry, and wide the doors they throw;

Dejectedly they enter, and mournfully they go;
In gloomy lines they muster stand beneath the hollow porch,
Each horseman grasping in his hand a black and flaming torch;
Wet is each eye as they go by, and all around is wailing,
For all have heard the misery. "Alas! alas for Celin!"—

Him yesterday a Moor did slay, of Bencerrage's blood,
Twice at the solemn jousting, around the nobles stood;
The nobles of the land were there, and the ladies bright and fair
Look'd from their latticed windows, the haughty sight to share;
But now the nobles all lament, the ladies are bewailing,
For he was Granada's darling knight. "Alas! alas for Celin!"

Before him ride his vassals, in order two by two,
With ashes on their turbans spread most pitiful to view!
Behind him his four sisters, each wrapp'd in sable veil,
Between the tambour's dismal strokes take up their doleful tale;
When stops the muffled drum, ye hear their brotherless bewailing,

And all the people, far and near, cry—"Alas! alas for Celin!"

Oh, lovely lies he on the bier, above the purple pall,
The flower of all Granada's youth, the loveliest of them all;
His dark, dark eyes are closed, his rosy lip is pale,
The crust of blood lies black and dim upon his burnish'd mail,
And evermore the hoarse tambour breaks in upon their wailing,
Its sound is like no earthly sound—"Alas! alas for Celin!"

The Moorish maid at the lattice stands, the Moor stands at his door,

One maid is wringing of her hands, and one is weeping sore—
Down to the dust men bow their heads, and ashes black they strew,

Upon their broider'd garments of crimson, green, and blue—
Before each gate the bier stands still, then bursts the loud
bewailing,

From door and lattice, high and low—"Alas! alas for Celin!"

An old, old woman cometh forth, when she hears the people cry;

Her hair is white as silver, like horn her glazed eye. [ago;
"Was she that nursed him at her breast, that nursed him long
She knows not whom they all lament, but soon she well shall know.

With one deep shriek she through doth break, when her ears
"Let me kiss my Celin ere I die—Alas! alas for Celin!"

ON TASTE, GENIUS, and CRITICISM.

"—There is nothing so certain we take it, as that those who are the most alert in discovering the faults of a work of genius, are the least touched with its beauties."—Edin. Rev.

Some of our modern literati declaim loudly on the inferiority of the present race of mankind, with regard to works of genius, when contrasted with the superior fact of our forefathers. They are ever harping on that old adage,—that 'whatever is good, must derive its name from the ancients,'—implying a sort of sanctity to their productions, which the geniuses of our times, have hardly power to imitate. They further tell us, that the world of letters is rapidly on the decline, and fast degenerating from the purity and simplicity of the "olden time."—that we substitute imitation for invention, and prefer artificial refinement to natural elegance.
We can boast of none of that energy and force of intellect, say our pseudo-critics, which is the very soul of ancient writings,—our genius plays the fool, in endeavouring to exhibit the sober characteristics of our predecessors,—and in adopting their phraseology together with their terse and unlaboured turns of expression, we attain to nothing beyond a sarrago of extravagant and wire-drawn sentiments.—

Allowing that there is a good deal of ill-nature, and dissatisfaction interwoven with this rebuke, we cannot positively deny its justness. For my own part, I am fully persuaded, that there is either some radical imbecity in our genius now-a-days, or that the means used in eliciting its powers are insufficient or absolutely detrimental to a fair development of them. The productions of modern pens, certainly do not possess that vigorous and soul-stirring influence, which characterizes the writings of those golden eras: they are too speculative in the studied graces of art and address, the understanding, rather than the passions. Every aberration from nature may be said to advance one step to deformity; consequently the more ornament that is appended to beauty, the more it blurs simplicity, and destroys excellence. It is upon this scale, I take it, that ancient productions of intellect, are almost unexceptionably superior to modern ones. Native delicacy enriches and recommends the former, whilst the latter only trust to artificial and fading colours.

Another striking feature in ancient works, both of fancy and imagination, and which is paramount to all the beauties of modern composition, is originality.—
With a firm and dignified, as well as a soft and harmonious expression, our predeceutors scribes possessed a rapid creative power,—a raciness of style which played at once on the heart and understanding. There is a freedom of thought, an exclusive range of faculties observable in their writings, which has not yet been realized in modern productions. They placed a confidence in their own powers, and therefore had less recourse to imitation. A writer of the present day, is deficient of this assurance, consequently when he hazards an opinion, it is so stiffly gilded with foreign ornament, that its native force is totally lost. Such is our inferiority in works of pure and legitimate talent.

Nor can we boast of our taste; though acknowledged to be more refined than that of our ancestors, it is in fact perverted and seduced from its proper channel;
it wears a sort of tinsel here, which is easily rubbed off and accommodated to the fluctuations of time and fashion. A man now-a-days can hardly be said to have a taste of his own. He suffers his judgment and opinions to be guided by all sorts of chicanery,—no matter how incongruous with reason and common sense.
Instead of thinking for himself, and drawing substantial inferences on passing events, by the aid of his own reason,—he absolutely buys his opinions, which are at stated periods—weekly—monthly—and quarterly banded to him.

As our taste is adulterated, so will our genius be deprived of that scope, and full play of its powers which is required to give force and brilliancy to its operations.
Besides, there is an unwarrantable restraint laid upon our talent in the present day. It is too soon put out of countenance by the sneers of ridicule, and too easily disarmed of its self-confidence by the cavils of malignity. A man cannot fly off in the random touches of his imagination, or strike out his sparklings of wit,— but he runs the risk of being scouted as loutish or nonsensical:—if he has a turn for the discursive, and ranges the fields of fancy and speculation, he is hunted down by a sect of masterly, pragmatical censors, who are indeed remarkable for nothing, save their puerile and litigious humours.

Many ingenious and ostensible reasons have been severally adduced for this degeneracy of modern talent,—but I am persuaded that none will be found to warrant such effects more certainly than the present System of Reviewing. It is this which blights the budding of genius, and chills the flush of aspiring talent;—this which overawes the simplicity of nature, and compels her to borrow forms less obtrusive, but infinitely more disgusting.—It is to the taste of a few, that a writer must now exercise his pen, or he seldom fails to bring on himself the censure of the public at large. Doubtless many men of rare talent have resigned the offerings of fame, merely to avoid the jargon and invective of a feverish hyper-critic. There are few works of the present day, which exhibit the effusions of an unbiassed and impartial mind; but much less numerous are those which display unbounded talent with a fearlessness of derision.—Works of fancy and humour, which are by far the most numerous productions of modern pens, almost unexceptionably betray a mind labouring under the fear of ridicule. There are, by the bye, a few to be found who hold at defiance the menaces of criticism, and in these few are strikingly illustrated the increased power of the imagination, and the brighter scintillations of fancy, when unshackled by despotic tyranny.—These authors carry through their writings a vein of originality, both in sentiment and expression:—

they desert art to consult nature, and only make use of the former, when it assists in showing the latter to greater advantage.—Without confidence genius is reduced to the level of ordinary capacity—its powers are benumbed,—and instead of an imagination, fervid and expressive, it displays a feeble and rapid influence.
The age which poured forth the happiest effusions of genuine talent, was that in which criticism pointed out the contrast between the realities of nature and her imitations—not that lynx-eyed scrutiny, which is ever on the alert to discover the imperfections of genius—but that criticism where dispassionate survey gave beauty to defect—and support to inaccuracy. When criticism is fairly and impartially awarded to the productions of the pen, it proves an honorable and useful art, and is conducive to the best interests of an elegant and polite literature: but when it is used as a pretext for ushering into being a train of vituperative and scurrious jargon,—when genius is vilified, and its operations derogated through its medium—when it is used as a cloak, under which private animosity seeks to obtain redress, it then becomes highly reprehensible, inasmuch as it discourages rising talent, and warps the youthful aspirations of genius. I blush to say, that much of the present system of Reviewing, is built on this liberal principle. Every absurdity which a compound of ignorance, ostentation, and stubbornness can engender, is unblushingly exercised by the slave of criticism, without regard for either private character, or public welfare. Under such despotism it is a natural consequence that our talent should decline, and that our national literature should dwindle to the lowest state of dignity.—Ridicule is the poison which hangs on the pen of criticism, and it is also the poison which most easily benumbs the susceptibility of genius.

NATURAL HISTORY.

ON THE BENEFITS, &c. DERIVED BY MAN- KIND FROM REPTILES, &c.

Some weeks ago I furnished an account of a singular method of preventing the depredations of Caterpillars; and at the same time promised a few observations on the injuries sustained by man from the creatures by which he is surrounded.

Many insects, reptiles, birds, and beasts, are persecuted by the vulgar from a supposition that they are injurious to man, which to closer observers of nature are known to be his benefactors. The most useful insect possessed by Britain is perhaps the Carrion Fly;
the Bee is not to be compared with it. To butchers and housewives it is troublesome, but for its trifling aggressions we are repaid a thousand fold. Dead animals, &c. which are left exposed in summer, and which are too large to be buried by beetles, are speedily removed by these scavengers, and thus is prevented the formation of that deadly miasma, which but too often fills our houses with sickness and death.
The too great increase of these flies, as well as other insects, is prevented by the Dragon Fly, and by reptiles, and birds.—It is singular that many of our most destructive insects and vermin have been originally imported from hot countries, and that, not like the plants of the tropics, their naturalization has been extremely rapid. The Rat is a well known instance, and I fear the Cockroach will speedily become as notorious. The rapid increase of the Cockroach, its great voracity, eating every thing that is ever eaten, together with its disgusting appearance, render it in some houses more obnoxious than any other vermin. And but for its fondness for damp and warm situations, which confines it to kitchens and to the lower rooms of houses, it would soon become worse than the plagues of Egypt.
It is mostly destroyed by Arsenic; but as there is great danger attending the use of this, I should recommend Quassia, which would perhaps have the same effect on it as on house flies. Another troublesome insect, a native of warm countries, is the Peco-ron, the different tribes of which are so destructive in our gardens. The black kind is very ruinous to beans.
The green is much attached to rose trees. There are of many other colours, brown, yellow, lead colour, and I believe underground species, as lettuce are frequently destroyed by a sort which surrounds their roots.—In the winged state the Puceron is often seen in our windows, in the form of a minute but elegant fly, with wings of extraordinary magnitude, many times the length of the body. In this state it is a most beautiful microscopic object. This insect has been represented as the principal food of the humming bird. We have to thank the botanists for its naturalization, happy could they have naturalized the birds which prey on it. What appears most singular is, that this insect seldom if ever attacks flowers, their fragrance is poison to it.—With such care has the Creator guarded the germ of plants! The ravages of the Puceron are best prevented by dusting the plants with air-slacked lime.

There are few Birds that are injurious to man. The Crow and Sparrow are perhaps benefactors. To the Swallow tribe we are under great obligations.

Amongst the Quadropeds of our island, we may put down as enemies, Rats, Mice, Weasels, Hares, Rabbits, the Polecat, and the Fox; the annihilation of which would be a benefit. Future legislators will endeavour to make a given space support the greatest number of men, compatible with the greatest sum of human happiness. It has been maintained by some naturalists, that no species of animal ever has, or ever will become extinct, and that the destruction of one link in the chain of being, would be fatal to the whole. I, however, can see no reason why we could not now dispense with many—and am of opinion that there have existed animals of which there is now none of their species remaining. The organic remains of remote ages is in favour of this opinion. The theories that have been invented to invalidate it, are too absurd to deserve serious consideration, such as supposing gigantic fossil bones to have grown in the earth, &c. In the early ages of the world, animals were not only longer lived, but larger; their longevity and their size answering to great numbers in our times. Doubtless all animals that are not particularly useful will sometime become extinct; the whole perhaps of the carnivorous kinds, except those which have been domesticated. The rapid civilization, and the numerical increase of man, seem to require this dispensation.

MATHEMATICS.

Solution of No. 59, by Mr. John Hill.

Let $a = 12$ the semi-diameter of the sphere. Assume $x =$ the height of the segment, and $p = 8.1416$.

Then $px - \frac{px^2}{2a} =$ the fluxion of the segment, whose fluent is $\frac{px^2}{2} - \frac{px^3}{6a}$.

Also, $px^2 - \frac{px^3}{2a} =$ the fluxion of the momentum, whose fluent is $\frac{px^3}{3} - \frac{px^4}{8a}$.

Now when the segment becomes equal to the hemisphere, x will be equal to a ; therefore, the fluents will be $\frac{1}{2}pa^2$ and $\frac{1}{8}pa^3$; the latter divided by the former gives $\frac{2}{3}a = 7\frac{1}{3}$ inches, the distance of the center of gravity of the hemisphere from the vertex of the segment, and per question, is equal to the height of the segment. Whence $2\sqrt{7.5 \times 16.5} = 22.248594$ the diameter of the segment; and hence $1678.7925 =$ the solidity required.

Solutions have been received from Amicus, Mr. Jones, Mr. Wilson, and Mercurius.

Question No. 62, by Mr. Jones, Chorlton Row.

There are two ships, A and B, upon the same parallel of latitude.—B is exactly one mile to the west of A, when she sets sail directly south, and sails uniformly at the rate of 8 miles per hour. In 15 minutes afterwards, A sets off at the rate of 9 miles per hour to overtake her. Quere, to what point of the compass did A sail, to overtake B in the least possible time?

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A correspondent in the Iris of last week has made a blunder (whether intentionally on his part is best known to himself) respecting Mr. Vandenhoff's representation of the character of "Brutus," which your correspondent states was played to £15. The real fact, Sir, is widely different; Brutus, during the season, was produced but once; and was for the benefit of Mr. Baas, the receipts of the evening amounting to £224!

There is another circumstance worthy of notice; V. P. says, "Mr. V. played his other principal characters by very trifling receipts;"—it is but justice to the actor in question, explicitly to state (a fact well known to the theatrical public) that the LAST season here, was the MOST PROFITABLE to the Managers that had been for SOME YEARS.

MR. COBBETT'S GRAMMAR.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A reader of your Miscellany would thank any of those gentlemen, who have been canvassing the merits of Cobbett's English Grammar, should they be pleased to inform him if the following sentence, taken from the dedication of the fourth edition of the said work be grammatical. "A work having for its objects, to lay the solid foundation of literary knowledge amongst the labouring classes of the community, to give practical effect to the natural genius found in the soldier, the sailor, the apprentice, and the plough boy, and to make that genius a perennial source of wealth, strength and safety to the kingdom; such a work naturally seeks the approbation of your Majesty, who, amongst all the royal personages of the present age, is the only one that appears to have justly estimated the value of the people." I beg leave to remark, that the word "work" in the adduced sentence, is what occasions a doubt as to it being grammatical.

I remain, &c.

HUMAN DISSECTION.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Induced by the interesting strictures in the Iris of the 15th, and wishing to contribute to the abolition of the unnatural (and now wholly unnecessary) practice of human dissection, I take the liberty of enclosing a short extract from the Literary Gazette of the 1st instant. I have subjoined a few remarks; and allow me, through the medium of your paper, to call the attention of every member of society to this very important subject. I am, &c.

Mosley-Street, Feb. 18, 1823.

"What could be more distressing than the story, recently in the Newspapers, of the Widow, who, wishing to lay his lost baby on the mouldering bosom of its buried mother, found that the grave had been rifled, and that the last melancholy solace he had sought was denied to his aching soul! Yes, there was another late event even more agonizing than this: it appeared in the Police Reports, A son of lowly station in Kent, but of feelings which would have ennobled the highest, had interred his aged father. The body was removed during the night; and the disordered and too plainly exposed the crime. A cart was traced to London, and vile-looking men had been seen lurking about the peaceful village churchyard. To the metropolis the son followed without delay. Inspired by filial piety, this poor, countryman, totally unaccustomed to the horrors of such sights, obtained a warrant, and searched for his father's corpse in every receptacle, Medical School, and Hospital. The imagination can hardly contemplate the dreadful task; we shudder while we think of it. What were his best hopes? To find the mangled limbs of the Being to whom he owed life, amid some of those masses of putridity and disgust which were exposed to his view. To turn over the gashed remains or the headless trunk, praying that he might there recognise his father and give him Christian burial. Our flesh creeps at the picture which our fancy draws. Suffice it to say, that he did recognise the mangled body, and did restore it to the earth. The Romans would have erected a statue, if not a temple, to commemorate such an act. In England it figured among the shameful narratives got up to stimulate curiosity in the reports of the lowest courts! Such shocking occurrences ought never to take place in a civilized country."

Merchants, Tradesmen, Shopkeepers, and Mechanics, all furnish themselves with stock of their respective kinds at their own proper expense; but the indigent medical man has recourse to this species of robbery! The grave, and its contents, are as much ours as any other property we possess, and none have a right to trespass upon, or disturb them. Then what can be thought of the man who resorts to this nefarious plunder? Can indigence, rashness, or inhumanity extenuate his guilt? By no means; but least of all can we submit to be tantalized with a profession of PHILANTHROPY! Philanthropy?—Let the BENEVOLENT ACTS of ANATOMICAL LECTURERS speak! In no gradation of life can we find a parallel for these men; they amass wealth without capital, without talent, without spirit, without industry, without ability; in fact, without any other quality than a formal stale jargon, and unblushing duplicity to impose upon society, despoil the grave, and exact from the anxious student! Their policy holds dissection necessary for the student, and their pompous profession obtains the attendance of a few curious individuals; but I defy them to point out any real benefit which can ever result from their investigations, save a pecuniary one to themselves, their relatives, and their dependents!

VARIETIES.

GENUINE ANECDOTE.—A short time since, a respectable Medical Practitioner, not a hundred miles from Ludlow, was called up in the night by a labouring man, residing at a few miles distance, to attend his wife, who was in childbed. Mr. W., who had often attended under similar circumstances without obtaining any remuneration, asked the man who was to pay him. The countryman answered, that he possessed five pounds, which, kill or cure, should be his reward. Mr. W. consequently paid every attention to the poor woman, who notwithstanding died under his hands. Soon after her death, Mr. W. met the widower at Ludlow, and observed that he had an account against him. The man appeared to be greatly surprised, and inquired for what? On being informed, he replied, "I don't think I owe you any thing;—did you cure my wife?"—"No, certainly," (said the accoucher), "it was not in the power of medicine to cure her."—"Did you kill her, then?" said the countryman. "No I did not," was the reply. "Why then, (said the countryman), as you did not either kill or cure, you are not entitled to the reward," and walked away.

ALEXANDER POPE'S LAST ILLNESS.—During Pope's last illness, a squabble happened in his chamber, between his two Physicians, Dr. Burton and Dr. Thompson, they mutually charging each other with hastening the death of their patient by improper prescriptions. Pope at length silenced them by saying, Gentlemen, I only learn by your discourse that I am in a dangerous way; therefore all I now ask is that the following epigram may be added after my death, to the next edition of the Dunciad, by way of postscript:—

Dunces rejoice, forgive all censures past,
The greatest dunce has killed your foe at last.

ANIMAL SYMPATHY.—On the day of the great thaw, a spaniel was observed, opposite to Thionville, floating down the Moselle on a small piece of ice. It is not known how the poor dog got into that situation; but he set up piteous cries. Having passed one of the dogs belonging to the decoys on the left of the Moselle, that intrepid animal dashed into the river, soon reached the unfortunate spaniel, and seizing him by the neck swam on shore with him amidst the acclamations of the spectators.—French paper.

AN ANGEL VISION.—A story is circulated in Coventry, which we copy from a contemporary, leaving our readers to form their own judgment in the case. On Saturday morning se'nnight, a woman living at Collycroft, Bedworth, surprised that her son, 13 years of age, did not come down at the usual time, went to him, when he made signs for pen, ink, and paper, and stated—that he had had a vision of an angel in the night, who informed him that he should be deaf and dumb for a month. He appeared unconscious of sound and incapable of utterance: he has so remained ever since. Many persons have been to visit the youth, who are satisfied with the truth of this statement. The term now is very short until the termination of this extraordinary visitation (if such it be) of Providence, when probably the lad will be able to communicate some further particulars respecting his singular case.—Choltenham Chronicle.

SNOW.—The remarkable phenomenon of a fall of snow in Jamaica, occurred at Anotto Bay, on the 15th December. The flakes fell to within a few feet of the earth, where they recoiled a little upwards from the heat of its evaporation, and dissolved into liquid drops.

REPARTÉE.—A pretty smart repartée was given the other day at a place in the Trongate, Glasgow, where some repairs were being made on the pavement, and a very confined space was left for the lieges to walk upon. A beautiful young lady was met at this narrow spot by two gentlemen, (one of them an exquisite Corinthian.) "I protest," said the dandy, "this place is as narrow as Balaam's passage." (The name of a narrow lane in Glasgow.) "Yes," said his companion, "and, like Balaam, my progress is arrested by an Angel." "True," said the lady, looking him full in the face, at the same time gliding neatly past him, "and I am stopt by an Ass!"

CHARACTER OF THE LATE GENERAL MOREAU, BY BONAPARTE.—The Empress Josephine married Moreau to Mademoiselle Hulot, a creole of the Isle of France. This young lady had an ambitious mother, who governed her, and soon governed her husband also. She changed his character: he was no longer the same man; he began to intrigue; his house became the rendezvous of all the disaffected; he not only opposed, but conspired against the establishment of religious worship, and the Concordat of 1801: he ridiculed the Legion of Honor. For a long time, the First Consul refused to notice this imprudent conduct; but at length he said, "I wash my hands of him; let him run his head against the pillars of the Tuileries." This conduct of Moreau was contrary to his character; he was a Breton; he detested the English, abominated the Chouans, and had a great antipathy to the nobility. He was incapable of any great mental efforts, but was naturally honest, and good-hearted. Nature had not destined him to play a first-rate character: had he formed some other matrimonial connexion, he would have been a marshal, and a duke; he would have made the campaigns of the Grand Army; would have acquired new glory; and, if it had been his destiny to fall on the field of battle, would have been killed by a Russian, Prussian, or Austrian ball: he ought not to have fallen by a French shot.

ADVANTAGES OF GIBBETS.—Two highwaymen were crossing Hounslow-heath, when one of them observed a gibbet. "Curse those gibbets," said he, "if it were not for them our's would be the best trade in the world."—"You are a fool," cried the other; "there's nothing better for us than gibbets; for were it not for them, every person would turn highwayman, and we should be ruined."

IMPROMPTU.

On seeing a 'beautiful French girl, whose mother was English.

No wonder that her cheeks disclose
A blush so crimson, and a skin so fair;
England has lent her loveliest rose,
To blend with France's lilies there.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

I am "an excellent communication" is but an attempt at humourous composition; we would recommend him to repair the "stool's leg."

Nemo's communication is generally interesting, and in some parts valuable; but we are under the necessity of objecting to its great length. It might be condensed to advantage:—the grave matter could be dispensed with, the light and descriptive parts should not be at all curtailed.

E. of Leeds, is informed that we have some objection to the insertion of any head, that implies a series of papers, unless acquainted with some of the parties, so as to feel confident of a regular succession.—All contributors are not punctual to their promise; and we have, in, at least, one instance been the inadvertent dupes of libelous design.—We shall be glad to see E.'s numbers; and, if satisfied of their merits, to give them a place in our pages.—His essay is inserted.

Vindicator's communication relative to the power of the police. In taking possession of dead bodies, for the use of Lawyers and dissection, is received;—should Mr. Abernethy resort to "gross fabrication," for the purpose of obtaining certain facilities in his professional capacity, we shall be happy to give publicity to the imposture.—V. in our next.

W. S. Y.'s Valentines; More Miseries; Junia; Tom Jones; Abalom; Theocritus; An Observer; and S. Y. are received.

Our esteemed friend Jeremy Antique, seems to have entirely forgotten us.

A Friend's promised communication is requested.

MR. HORNER'S OBSERVATORY

Placed over the Cross of St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

MR. THOMAS HORNER has published a view of London and the surrounding country, taken with mathematical accuracy, from an OBSERVATORY PURPOSELY ERECTED ON THE CROSS OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

Mr. H. passed the summer of 1820 in the lantern of St. Paul's, immediately under the ball, in executing a general view, which from so elevated a position he was able to accomplish with great correctness. About the period when the view was nearly completed from this point, preparations were commenced for removing the ball and cross; and the scaffolding, which excited such general admiration as a stupendous and most ingenious structure, was erected. Impelled by a wish to avail himself of this unexpected and singularly favourable opportunity, especially as he had in the mean time considerably improved his apparatus, he obtained permission to erect for it an observatory, supported by a platform several feet above the top of the highest part of the present cross: and having succeeded in fixing the apparatus in the interior of the observatory, he commenced a new series of sketches on a greatly extended scale, so as to admit the introduction of minute objects at a distance of some miles.

Of this observatory, which was placed nearly 140 yards above the pavement of St. Paul's, we give an exact representation:—

A couple of extraordinary sized Lithographic plates accompany the work, which afford a correct idea of the difficulties of the undertaking; and in a subsequent part we have the following particulars of the threatened dangers within the immediate vicinity of the author's seat of operation.

'Indeed scarcely a day passed without derangement of some part of the scaffolding, or machinery connected with it; and so strong became the sense of danger arising from these repeated casualties, that notwithstanding the powerful inducement of increased remuneration, it was difficult on these emergencies to obtain the services of efficient workmen. This will not appear surprising, when it is known that during high winds, it was impossible for a person to stand on the scaffolding without clinging for support to the frame-work; the creaking and whistling of the timbers, at such times, resembled those of a ship laboring in a storm, and the situation of the artist was not unlike that of a mariner at the mast-head. During a squall more than usually severe, a great part of the circular frame-work of heavy planks, erected above the gallery for the prevention of accidents, was carried over the house-tops to a considerable distance. At this moment a similar fate had nearly befallen the observatory, which was torn from its fastenings, turned partly over the edge of the platform, and its various contents thrown into utter confusion. The fury of the wind rendered the door impassable; and after a short interval of suspense, an outlet was obtained by forcing a passage on the opposite side. By this misfortune, independently of the personal inconvenience, considerable delay and expense were occasioned ere the work could be resumed; and it became necessary to provide against similar misfortunes, by securing the observatory to a cross-beam, and constructing a rope-fence, as seen in the vignette. Thus fortified, the work was proceeded in without any other accidents of a nature worthy to be noticed, until all the sketches which could be taken from the observatory were completed. These sketches, comprising 280 sheets of drawing paper, extend over a surface of 1680 square feet; a space which will not appear surprising, when considered as including a portion of almost every public building and dwelling-house in the metropolis, with all the villages, fields, roads, villas, rivers, canals, &c. visible from the summit of the Cathedral.'

BIOGRAPHY.

MEMOIR OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.

BY ROBERT SCOTT,

EDITOR OF THE CABINET OF PORTRAITS.

The distinguished subject of this sketch was born at Edinburgh, on the 15th of August, 1771, and is the oldest surviving son of the late Walter Scott, Esq. an advocate, or writer to the Signet. His mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Scott, was a daughter of David Rutherford, Esq. also a writer to the Signet, from whom she received a considerable fortune. She was a very accomplished woman; and after her death, in 1789, some of her poetical productions were published.

Young Walter, being lame and of a very tender constitution, received the first rudiments of his education from his mother, to whom he was always much attached. In his early youth he displayed a considerable taste in drawing landscapes from nature, but was neither remarkable for liveliness of disposition, nor aptitude for learning. From his mother's tuition he was sent to the grammar-school of Musselburgh, where he made but little progress until his tenth year, when Dr. Paterson succeeded to the school, at which time the following circumstance is related to have taken place.—The late Dr. Hugh Blair, being on a visit to the school, examined several of the boys, but paid particular attention to young Scott, which Dr. Paterson perceiving, and thinking it was the boy's stupidity that engaged the doctor's notice, said—"Doctor, my predecessor told me that boy has the thickest skull in the school." "May be so," replied Dr. Blair, "but through that thick skull I can discern many bright rays of future genius."

From Musselburgh he was sent to the High-school of Edinburgh, where he completed his classical studies, and then removed to the University of Edinburgh. Having finished his education, he was articled to a writer of the Signet, and before he had attained his twenty-first year was admitted an advocate of the Scotch bar. Here he most assiduously attended his professional duties, and in the year 1798 he married a Miss Carpenter, by whom he has several children. At the end of the next year he was appointed sheriff's-depute of the county of St. Kirk, and in March, 1806, one of the principal clerks of session in Scotland. A peculiar circumstance attended this appointment:—Mr. Scott's warrant, although drawn up, had not yet passed the seals, when the death of Mr. Pitt caused an entire change in the ministry; and his nomination to the office having been procured through the friendship of the late Lord Melville, who was then under impeachment, it was naturally considered void. To the credit of the new cabinet, however, no objection arose to the appointment; which was thus, as was wittily remarked at the time, "the last lay of the ministry."

Being now relieved from professional labours by the enjoyment of two lucrative situations, which produced from 800*l.* to 1000*l.* per annum, and having about the same period come into possession of a valuable estate through the death of his father and an uncle, he was enabled to follow his literary pursuits at pleasure. His first productions were two German ballads, adapted to the English taste, entitled 'The Chase,' and 'William and Helen.' These pieces were merely written for amusement, and would not have been published but for the earnest solicitations of his friends. After a lapse of three years Mr. Scott produced a translation of Goethe's tragedy of 'Goetz of Berlichingen.' His next pieces were 'The Eve of St. John,' and 'Glenfinkus,' which appeared in the late Mr. Lewis's Tales of Wonder.

In 1802 appeared his first work of any importance, 'The Minstrel of the Scottish Border,' and the following year he published 'Sir Tristram,' a metrical romance of the thirteenth century, by Thomas of Ercildoune, edited from the Auchinleck manuscripts. In 1805, 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel' was produced, and at once established his fame upon the firmest basis. This poem will be long read and admired for the interest of the story, the ease and harmony of the language, the picturesqueness of the incidents and scenery, and for the delineation of the manners of the ancient borderers. In 1806, a collection of 'Ballads and Lyrical Pieces,' and, in 1808, 'Marmion, a Tale of Flodden Field,' added considerably to his reputation. The latter poem the author has himself characterised as "containing the best and worst poetry that he has ever written." The rapidity of Mr. Scott's pen shone conspicuously this year; for, in addition to 'Marmion,' he published 'Descriptions and Illustrations of the Lay of the Last Minstrel,' and a complete edition of 'Dryden's Works,' with notes, and a new life of the author. Very shortly after this, he undertook the editing of Lord Somers's collection of Historical Tracts, Sir Ralph Sadler's State Papers, and Anna Seward's Poetical Works. In the same year in which the last of these appeared he produced, 'The Lady of the Lake,' a poem abounding in interest and poetical beauty. In 1811, 'The Vision of Don Roderick' was published, in aid of the subscription for the Portuguese. This was followed, in 1813, by 'Rokeby,' and, in 1814, by 'The Lord of the Isles,' 'The Border Antiquities of England,' a new edition of the works of Swift, with a life and annotations; and 'The Field of Waterloo,' a poem. About the same time appeared a prose work, chiefly on the subject of Waterloo, called 'Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk,' which was generally attributed to the pen of our prolific author. Two other poems, 'The Bridal of Triermain,' and 'Harold the Dautless,' which first appeared anonymously, have since been claimed by Sir Walter. In 1822 he published a dramatic poem, called 'Halidon Hill,' which was not so successful as most of his productions. This, we believe, completes the catalogue of his acknowledged writings—enough most assuredly to establish his fame, both for extraordinary genius and unwearied industry.

But report adds another very long addition to the list, by ascribing to Sir Walter Scott a series of Novels and Tales which have been received by the public in a manner unprecedented in the annals of literature. The first of these, 'Waverley,' appeared in 1814, since which the series has extended to forty-six volumes; and it is confidently stated that they have realized to their author upwards of £100,000. It is said, we know not with what degree of truth, that the manuscript of Waverley remained for three weeks in the possession of a bookseller in St. Paul's Church-yard, being left with him by a young gentleman who wished to dispose of it; but the bookseller, having been previously unsuccessful in that branch of literature, declined the proposal. We should think this could not have been the case.

That Sir Walter Scott is the author of these Novels and Tales we feel little doubt, agreeing with the writer of a letter to Mr. Heber, that the circumstance of every other living poet of any consequence having in some way been honourably mentioned in the course of them, leaves sufficient ground for attributing them to his pen.

Sir Walter was the first baronet created by his present Majesty: he has also the honour of being President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

The following extract from a letter, written a few years since, may give some idea of his general appearance and character:—

"Few travellers visit Edinburgh without inquiring whether Walter Scott is visible. In a small dark room, where one of the courts is held, he is to be seen every morning in term time, seated at a small table with the acts of the court before him. He is a short, broad-shouldered, and rather robust man, with light hair, eyes between blue and grey, broad nose, and round face. Though a great number of travellers have letters of recommendation to Mr. Scott, yet his parties are not numerous. His manners are agreeable, untainted with vanity: and the only affectation to be seen in him is, that he is solicitous not to appear as a poet. He is very lively and full of anecdote! and, though not brilliant in company, is always cheerful and unassuming. He often relates that in his infancy the old people used to take him upon their knees, call him Little Watty, and tell him all sorts of old stories and legends while his brothers were abroad at work, from which he was exempted on account of his lameness."

The character of Sir Walter Scott has been thus portrayed by Mr. Jeffrey, editor of the Edinburgh Review: "He is in a wonderful degree possessed of talents of a very rare kind, and these talents have not been allowed to lie dormant, having been employed for many years in affording amusement and instruction to the whole of this nation. Sir Walter Scott is a man possessed of a most fruitful imagination, a man of most extraordinary genius, a man who is master of almost every subject, and looks into human character, and paints what he there discovers in colours the most beautiful, and language the most sublime. In short, he is a man who combines so many rare qualities, and so much erudition, that he has raised himself to a pinnacle of glory unequalled in this, or, I may say, in any other age."

NORA'S VOW.

BY SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.

Hear what Highland Nora said:

"The Earlie's son I will not wed,
Should all the race of Nature die,
And none be left but he and I,
For all the gold, for all the gear,
And all the lands both far and near,
That ever valour lost or won,
I would not wed the Earlie's son."

"A maiden's vows, (old Callum spoke,)
Are lightly made and lightly broke;
The heather on the mountain's height
Begins to bloom in purple light;
The frost-wind soon shall sweep away
That lustre deep from glen and brae;
Yet, Nora, ere its bloom be gone,
May blithely wed the Earlie's son."

"The swan," she said, "the lake's clear breast
May baffle for the eagle's nest;
The Awe's fierce stream may backward turn,
Ben-Cruachan fall, and crush Kilchurn.
Our killed clans, when blood is high,
Before their foes may turn and fly;
But I, were all these marvels done,
Would never wed the Earlie's son."

Still in the water-lily's shade
Her wonted nest the wild swan made,
Ben-Cruachan stands as fast as ever,
Still downward foams the Awe's fierce river,
To shun the clash of foeman's steel:
No highland brogue has turn'd the heel:
But Nora's heart is lost and won,
—She's wedded to the Earlie's son!

THE RETURN.

Engaged with these reflections, he scarcely perceived that night was approaching, and that the clouds had got thick and dense. All at once he found himself in a little dale, quite solitary, surrounded with wood,—where not the least trace of an habitation could be perceived. The rapid flight of some birds returning to their place of shelter, the noise of the trees that bordered the way, and some large drops of rain, soon turned his thoughts into another channel. It appeared certain from the instructions he had received on the road, that he had lost his way; he looked all around, and saw nothing but a thick dark cloud, which, like a huge curtain, spread round the whole horizon. The rain increased rapidly; he was very shortly wet through; the trees, stripped of their foliage afforded him no shelter, and the night setting in made him fear he should not be able to see his way. Not knowing what to do, he stopped a moment, made up his mind, and pursued his course through the wood straight forward for an hour longer. The continual noise of the rain beating upon the trees, the screaming of wild birds, and the acute sense of his state increasing with the cold and fatigue; the weight of his clothes; the fear of passing the whole night thus in the forest, rendered his situation painful in the extreme. When, after a long journey, seated before a good fire, in the middle of our family, with a full coffee-pot upon the table, and our soup boiling, we hear the noise of the wind and rain without, we recall to our minds with a kind of pleasure, the similar storms to which we have been exposed, without shelter, and without the hope of meeting one, and the comfortable roof which protects us is doubly prized: but a poor traveller a-foot, upon whom the rain is pouring in torrents, who can hardly see his road, which is in the middle of a thick wood, is but little disposed to enjoy this consolation beforehand. At last he perceived that the darkness decreased, that the noise of the rain was getting farther off, and that he should soon be out of the wood. It is scarcely possible to represent the joy Herbert felt, without having been in his situation, when, a few moments after, he heard the barking of a dog, then that of other dogs which answered it, and at last the crowing of a cock. These certain indications of an inhabited place, caused him to double his steps, and just as he was getting out of the wood, he perceived several houses more or less distant, which he distinguished by the light from the windows. He went up to the first, and through a little low window saw a lamp upon a table; beyond this a door half open enabled him to see a kitchen, in which he could distinguish the fire place; a young female was close by, and appeared busy with her soap; the room—the fire—the soup—the young girl—all was calculated to attract a young traveller, dripping wet and greatly fatigued; he knocks, and the young person with the lamp in her hand opens the door. She was attired simply, but with much neatness; her pretty features were embellished with two fine dark eyes, and the tint of health and air of affability and kindness were diffused over her features. Herbert forgot all he had undergone; he said he was a traveller who had lost his way, asked if he was far from the town, and if there was an inn in the village. The town is at least three leagues off, replied the young girl; there is no inn in this hamlet, but in the great village beyond the brook there's one. It still rains very heavily, added she, and the village is above a quarter of a league distant; our house is not an inn, but on so stormy a night as this, a lost traveller can have shelter.

The more Herbert looked at the girl, who spoke to him in the sweetest tone of voice, the more his emotion increased; on the other hand, it was not displeasing to her, to observe the impression she made upon a young man possessed of the most pleasing appearance, notwithstanding the miserable state of his clothes from the rain, and his long dark hair hanging upon his shoulders dripping wet: Herbert appeared the more interesting for all this. Walk in, walk in, said the maiden's father, who had heard the dialogue, opening the room door; walk in young man; I know pretty well what it is to travel, and be overtaken by a storm;—I had plenty of it in my younger days; I have not been in this quiet state long. Herbert entered, related how he had been lost, and the conversation immediately turned on the pleasures and inconveniences of travelling. The old man listened to Herbert with great pleasure and much curiosity; asked him whence he came; and what towns he had visited. When he mentioned Brème, where he had worked for the longest time, the old man smoothed his wrinkled brow; he held out his hand to Herbert, took hold of his, and gave it a hearty shake. Ah! Brème is a good spot! said he, in a tone that indicated emotion and joy,—a good spot indeed! He asked question upon question, and, as it happened, Herbert had been a long time with a master-joiner at Brème, who had been his host's companion in his early years. He who carries us back to the days of childhood, who recalls to our minds the hours we regret, who speaks to us of the friends we loved with all the warmth of youth, becomes all at once an interesting being, and almost a friend himself. Mend us the fire, Leonora, said the old man to his daughter, and then thou shalt lay the cloth, and give us some good soup, some fresh butter, cheese, and pears; this young man will sup with us; he has been at Brème, and knows my friend. He then advised Herbert to take off his wet coat, to put it near the fire to dry, and asked Leonora to go and bring one of his; the young man accepted the first part of the proposal, but refused the second;—it struck him that one of the old man's coats would not fit him like his own. He opened then his haversack, and drew from it another coat, which at once shewed them he was a young man of neatness and order. When he had trimmed himself up, he drew near his host again; replied to all the questions he asked him respecting his travels; gave him account upon account of the different provinces he had passed through. He intermingled his relations with reflections that evinced an observing and sensible mind, and an excellent heart. Leonora kept going backwards and forwards laying the cloth and getting the supper ready; she listened to every word; and every now and then her beautiful dark eyes were fixed upon the narrator: when he perceived it, he would stop for a moment, and appear to have quite forgotten what part of his tale should succeed;—then he would recollect himself and go on. Standing in the door-way with a plate or glass in her hand, she silently admired the interesting and good young man's simple eloquence, and great complaisance. At length the repast was over; they remained all three seated round the hospitable table. Herbert had never been so happy in the whole course of his life;—and still, every look he cast upon the lovely girl, caused him to feel a sweet involuntary regret—he sighed in spite of himself, and, with an unaccountable mixture of pleasure and pain, he continued his relations. The tender emotions of his heart gave an additional force and expression to his words, though at times a sadness prevailed.

Where is the youth, who, after an agreeable conversation with an intelligent and hospitable old man,—after having passed an hour by the side of a beautiful and amiable girl, does not experience the most painful, acute feelings, when he thinks he is about to leave them, and that he shall never, it may be, see them again? Then a vague and confused thought on the brief pleasures of this life,—on happy moments never to return—on the uncertainty of the future, afflicts the heart, and brings tears into the eyes. It was an emotion of this kind Herbert experienced; and the fervour he displayed in his conversation was communicated to his host and fair hostess.

There never was a prince who enjoyed a repast so much as I have mine this evening, said Herbert, in a tone of unaffected sensibility; the old man and his daughter smiled, and the old man gave him a friendly tap on the shoulder; in truth this simple repast was truly delicious,—cooked by Leonora—served by Leonora—and partaken of by the side of her. Without thinking it, she had picked out the best and finest pears. Though strangers to one another, not even acquainted with each others names, they sat round this table like three good old friends. Who can help admiring a guest so sensible of the little kindness shewn him, and who repays it with such interesting conversation, thought Leonora: the old man did not let the talk flag; Herbert was not weary of keeping it up either, and was not now interrupted by glances on the girl, for he scarcely removed his eyes from her, though his conversation was wholly directed to the father. Herbert was not naturally a great talker, but this evening he could not keep his tongue still. Love varies in its effects, sometimes it strikes dumb, at others it is extremely loquacious. Without even acknowledging it to himself, Herbert was secretly desirous of pleasing Leonora; he observed her listen with considerable interest, and smile. Herbert therefore talked away, and with increased eloquence. Nothing animates us so much as a desire of pleasing, accompanied by the hope of succeeding. When Leonora had cleared the supper table, she brought out her wheel, and began to spin; but more than once did it cease to go round, and the thread kept breaking in her pretty fingers. With her eyes fixed upon Herbert, she began to enquire how it was he produced so odd an effect upon her—every sentence he uttered announced such sound sense—so susceptible a heart—there was such a respect and zeal for the female character displayed—such an abhorrence for vice and dissimulation! He related to the old man how a young fellow of Brème had deceived a poor girl, how she had thrown herself into a well in consequence, and the dreadful remorse of her seducer; his expressions were so affecting—his eyes were suffused with tears!—tears also ran down Leonora's cheeks in abundance.—Poor Leonora!—she felt her heart fix itself strongly on the good young man, —and I too, thought she, I too feel a wish to die!

The wooden clock struck nine. Herbert got up, and went out to see how the weather was; the sky had become clear; but our young traveller's soul was enveloped in sombre clouds; he felt this evening would cost him all his future happiness. Good God! thought he,—what is this my friends have done?—No.—I cannot love the girl they have chosen for me;—I'll go,—I'll tell them so; to-morrow I'll return here, and — of what he would now do he had but a confused idea.

During the time Herbert was out, the old man reflected also, and with no little sorrow, on this meeting; he had observed the tears his daughter shed, he remarked the afflicted look she cast upon the young man as he went out. Leonora, said he to her, this stranger seems a very nice young man, but recollect, thou'rt promised.—Herbert came in again; he heard the deep sigh, which was the only reply Leonora made; she began her spinning again, and now kept her eyes upon her wheel. It is fine now, said he,—I must proceed to the town,—I must see my parents this evening, but if you'll permit me, I'll come and see you again, and soon—Your parents!—you have parents then living near here?—I thought you were a stranger—a traveller;—who is your father?—Old Herbert, the Joiner.—Herbert! What! Herbert! cried out the old man; God be praised a thousand times,—he has led you here; you are my cousin, and soon, very soon, — he squeeze the young man's hand with the greatest tenderness. Leonora—Leonora, on whose countenance was a blush as deep as the rose, got up softly from her wheel, drew near also, took hold of Herbert's hand, and with a trembling voice could with difficulty say the words, Welcome, dear cousin.—Has your father never written to you respecting us? resumed the old man;—he is my greatest friend; he is very fond of my daughter, and — we have already frequently talked about our children. Leonora turned about, she went and tied the ribbon that he'd the hemp upon her distaff—it did not want tying. Be quick, Leonora, said the old father,—go and get the bed in the little chamber ready,—cousin stays with us to-night, and we'll go to town together to-morrow; how surprised your good father will be! said he, rubbing his hands—they don't expect you of a fortnight yet.

The young girl, as nimble as a mouse, ran to the little chamber; her cousin's bed was soon got ready; she is soon back, calls him her dear cousin—then her dear Henry—and then her dear friend. She felt a gladness—a lightness—aye, as if a large heavy stone had been removed from her breast, and a wreath of flowers put in its place. Herbert's loquacity left him, he felt so much that he could scarcely utter a word; he thought he was surely translated into heaven, and — my story is ended.

Whilst I am writing, a happy family, a joyful assembly, are celebrating not far from me, at the cottage in the village, the marriage of Herbert and Leonora, which took place yesterday; and I leave it to be decided, whether those young persons, whose hearts alone have been consulted in marriage, or they who have been matched according to the whim of their parents, enjoy the greatest share of happiness.

Translation of the last Ode of the 1st Book of Horace.

I hate the Persian pomp, my boy,
And Liden chaplets bring no joy;
Then, cease with unavailing care
To search those hidden places where
The rose is now delaying.

The simple myrtle needs no scorn,
But shall upon my head be worn,
And while thou servest 'neath this vine
Around thy temples it shall twine
And o'er thy brows be straying.

CRITICISM.

ORTHOGRAPHY.—(No. VI.)

BY S. X.

"The subject of Orthography, which teaches the art of true or right spelling, is both interesting and useful, and has not, in general, been sufficiently attended to, or critically examined. This negligence, however, is not peculiar to the English, or the English language. The private letters of Buonaparte, it is well known, abounded with errors in Orthographe; neither, indeed, was correct punctuation regarded by him, the points being sometimes wholly omitted, and at others, used improperly."—ANON.

Wrong.

57. Assylum—

58. Center—

Right.

Asylum—

Centre—

Spelling is, in a great measure, acquired through the medium of the eye. The centre of a circle, for instance, so frequently mentioned in Euclid, and the Centre-Hotel, casually noticed, in the middle of the Crescent, at Buxton, will be easily remembered (as ending in tre) by the students in geometry, and by the visitors of that fashionable and greatly improved place of resort, from all parts of the kingdom, during the summer, and greater part of the autumnal, months.

59. Centry—

Sentry, corrupted,
Dr. Johnson says, from Sentinel.

"THOU, whose nature cannot sleep,
O'er my slumbers sentry keep;
Guard me 'gainst those watchful foes,
Whose eyes are open while mine close." BROWN.

60. Cephallic—

Cephalic, from céphalique, Fr.
Error—

61. Errour—

This word is spelled with a u, by Johnson, although in the quotation he has given from the bible, Heb. ix. 7, the u, is properly omitted. Mr. Todd, in this instance, has introduced the u, in contradiction to all the modern editions of the Sacred Text, including the Family Bible, lately published by the Rev. Dr. Mant and the Rev. G. D'Oily. In the old Black Letter copy of "The Bible, translated according to the Hebrew and Greek, printed at London, 1589," which, in the margin, is rendered "errors."—Many improvements have doubtless been made in Orthography, in the course of the last 230 years.

Intire—

Entire, from the French, entier.

This word was formerly, and by some illiterate sign-painters of the present day, is still written intire;—as, "Calvert's Intire Butt Beer." But this mode of spelling the word is nearly, though, it appears, not entirely obsolete.

63. Leger—

Ledger, from the Latin, legere, to gather.

The ledger being the principal book used by merchants and tradesmen, in which all the transactions which occur in business are ultimately placed, or, as it is technically called, posted, to each individual account. In this sense of the word, the orthography, as now stated, is established by long custom; and as in any other sense the word under consideration is perfectly obsolete, no advantage can possibly arise from any attempt to alter the spelling, by omitting the letter d.

64. Metalic—

Metallic, from
metallum, Lat.

Here the accent being on the penultimate syllable, the consonant t, is doubled, according to the spirit of a rule that is given in Lowth's Grammar, viz. words of one syllable, ending with a single consonant; and that consonant being preceded by a single vowel,—or if of more than one syllable, double the consonant when another syllable is added to it, having the accent on the penultimate syllable.

65. Moveable—

Movable—

This word has sometimes been written moveable, and also its derivatives, moveably and moveableness, in the same manner, retaining the o mute; but there is no necessity, says Mr. Todd, for retaining this letter, in the present word, any more than in the words, improvable and unmovable, where Johnson himself omits it; and, certainly, he was not wont to dismiss, either idly or inconsiderately, what he deemed superfluous or redundant letters. On the contrary, he has, in some instances, retained letters, which have, since the publication of his Dictionary, been decidedly and universally rejected.—With respect to the word under consideration, it may be proper to remark that in the Bible the e mute is retained, in the word unmoveable, which occurs in the last verse of the 16th chap. of the First of Corinthians, being the portion of Scripture, appointed to be read in the Burial Service.

66. ————— Steadfast—
Stedfast—

This word, being compounded of stead and fast, is, perhaps very properly spelled, by Johnson, with an a, in the first syllable, like its primitive stead. Nevertheless, it is invariably printed without this letter in every passage where it occurs in the Bible. See Eccles. xxii. 23. I Peter, v. 9. and I Cor. xv. 58. The authorities quoted by Johnson, from Dryden and Spenser, are the same; which may fairly be considered as exceptions, of an obsolete complexion, to the more general and prevailing method of writing the word at the present time. Spenser flourished in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the orthography of the English language was very lax and unsettled. The common words, steady, unsteady, steadily, are never written without the a; and if the a be omitted in stedfast, it should seem to be on the same account that the vowel u in odour and valour, and the vowel i in villain, are omitted in the derivatives, odoriferous, odorous, valorous, villany, and villanous.

GRAMMAR.—(Communicated by S. X.)—The following exemplification of all the ten parts of speech, in one short sentence, may possibly be new to some of your readers:—

In English, there are ten sorts of words, called parts of speech, namely the article (1), the noun (2), the pronoun (3), the adjective (4), the verb (5), the participle (6), the adverb (7) the preposition (8), the conjunction (9), and the interjection (10). All these are found in the following short sentence:—

I (3) now (7) see (5) the (1) good (4) man (2) coming (6), but (9) alas (10)! he (8) walks (5) with (8) difficulty (2).

MR. COBBETT'S GRAMMAR.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A correspondent, "F." in your last week's Iris, desires to know if the following passage, which commences the Dedication of the Fourth Edition of Mr. Cobbett's Grammar, be correct:—"A work, having for its objects, to lay the solid foundation of literary knowledge amongst the labouring classes of the community, to give practical effect to the natural genius found in the soldier, the sailor, the apprentice, and the plough boy, and to make that genius a perennial source of wealth, strength, and safety to the kingdom; such a work naturally seeks the approbation of your Majesty, who, amongst all the Royal Personages of the present age, is the only one that appears to have justly estimated the value of the people."—I know not whether I understand the gentleman right; but as it regards the word referred to, I do not see that it is at all ungrammatical. If your correspondent had been a little more explicit in the respect of his doubts, one might have answered to the point at once. Had your correspondent signified his difference from Mr. Cobbett in regard to the propriety of "A work," I might have agreed with him; as, a work implies any work, while Mr. C. intends it, no doubt, in this place exclusively to apply to his Grammar, therefore he ought to have said, this work, or, the work here submitted to your Majesty's perusal, &c. But if your correspondent means to object to the repetition of the word work to the one verb seeks, I do not still see any irregularity or impropriety; for after the detail of the different objects of the work, as "to lay the solid foundation of literary knowledge, &c. to give practical effect to the natural genius, &c. and to make that genius a perennial source of wealth, &c." it becomes necessary, the nominative case, "A work," being at so great a distance, to repeat it to its verb, thus:—"such a work seeks," &c. and the two nominative cases may easily be reconciled on the grammatical principle of two words being put together in apposition.

If your correspondent would pardon me, I would beg leave to substitute a query as to the correctness of the passage, "Your Majesty, who is the only one," &c. And in order that some idea might be formed of the nature of my objection, I would query whether the phrase, your Majesty, were in the second or third person; if in the second, how comes it that Mr. Cobbett reads who is? And if in the third, does the relative who agree with Majesty as its antecedent, and in that case of what gender is Majesty? and should not the relative be which? These queries I should be much obliged by any of your correspondents resolving grammatically, and in the mean time remain,

Sir, your constant reader,

Manchester, Feb. 26, 1823.

THE LIVERPOOL CONCENTRIC FRIENDS.

No. II.

In the Reading Room at six o'clock, were assembled, Friends Constant, Paradox, Frivolous, and Man; satisfactory reasons were assigned for the non-attendance of the other Members, and the

Deliberation Chamber

being entered, the Sociability of Man was pitched upon as the topic of discussion. Much interesting debate arose;—the prone and the erect postures were considered, and the former was unequivocally rejected. A paper on the Matrimonial compact was referred to; and, calamitous as this state is, in many instances, yet it was unanimously held to be legitimate, necessary, and honourable. Bachelorship was viewed as being little better than represented in the humorous stanzas entitled "the Bachelor's Care," and the decision was drawn up as follows, viz:—

CLASSIFICATION OF BACHELORS.

Of the confirmed Bachelor the Concentric Friends are agreed that there are, or ought to be, four species; viz:—

Species.

Characteristics.

1. The B. Scientific. The attention wholly engrossed by abstract studies.
2. The B. Enthusiastic. The views and tempers estranged from common things, by the intellect being habitually engaged in the regions of fancy.
3. The B. Eccentric. Constitutional imbecility, exemplified by penuriousness or instability.
4. The B. Execrable. Confirmed misanthropy, licentiousness or dissipation.

It is admitted, without the slightest difference of opinion, that it would be extremely difficult, if not altogether impracticable, for the man of science to descend from his aerial altitude; to detach himself from his metaphysical reveries; or to suffer obtrusion upon discoveries and demonstrations of magnitude and infinite moment; or upon researches, the intensity of which, absorbs every intellectual faculty. It is improbable that the eye that is intent upon ethereal grandeur should relish the tawdry embellishments of human life! And equally so that the mind that is involved in abstruse theories, or profound calculations, should submit to the interruptions of domestic incident, or to the dangers and derangements arising from childish levity!—The man of sublime, of scientific soul, will, or should, ever remain a Bachelor!

The Enthusiast of the entrancing daughters of Jupiter—the man who makes a world, and who revels amid beauties and perfections of his own creation, can rarely find sublunary realities so exquisitely fascinating. The complexion, the features, the symmetry, and the graceful evolutions of his ideal fair, are, in the earthly sex, seldom combined with simplicity of mind, sweetness of disposition, and sincerity of affection. He is too sanguine—his estimate is above the standard of humanity—he should only dwell with imaginary forms, and ever remain a Bachelor!

The Eccentric species contains four varieties; viz:—the amorous, the capricious, the penurious, and the extravagant. The first is a harmless, accomodating creature; fond of the smiles of the sex, he is their most devoted gallant, at routs, parties, and entertainments; and is ever languishing, but when at their "service to command." The second, being liable to perpetual change, would keep a family in constant solicitude and anxiety. The third would keep—nay, would not keep, a family at all. And the fourth would reduce a family from ease, affluence, and felicity, to toil, indigence, and the grave.—They should remain Bachelors!

The fourth species contains two varieties; viz:—the dissipated execrable, and the lascivious execrable. The first is a mean, low-minded, contemptible creature; detached from domestic, and alienated from social interests; he is devoid of moral worth, and desires only a life of insensibility, and riot. The second is of all civilized monsters the greatest, and the most to be dreaded. His look is full of guile; his word is pestiferous; his touch is moral death! He is the despoiler of innocence, the bane of beauty, the corrupter of fidelity! He betrays the simple, blasts the lovely, violates the affianced! Individual peace, domestic felicity, social purity—all, all are to him, as nothing! He sneers at the distraction of an injured, of a disconsolate husband! He knows not the remorse, he alleviates not the wretchedness, of his victim! He feels not the excruciating pangs, the writhings of a deserted parent!—And he is regardless of the disgrace of unconscious children, and worthy connexions! Let no such man partake of your festivities, let no such man enter your domestic circle—in short, let no such man be trusted.

Deliberation Chamber, Feb. 24, 1823.

THE IMPERFECTION OF HUMAN HAPPINESS.

Nihil est ab omni parte beatum.—Hox.

There are but few persons who will allow the truth of the maxim, that there is no human happiness without some admixture of affliction.—Men in general, are willing to think that happiness may be obtained in certain pursuits of life, which they call pleasures, and for this reason they direct all their attention to some one of them;—but experience, in the end, shews them the vanity of their expectations, and fully proves, that instead of finding happiness, they are filled with discontent at the disappointment.

The covetous man employs all means possible to obtain riches, and even denies himself the common necessities of life for the attainment of what he will not allow himself to enjoy; he is continually tormented with the fear of losing what he has obtained with so much labour, and anxiety of mind: and thus he leads on his miserable existence in a state of the greatest wretchedness, and at his death, leaves all that he has amassed together, and hoarded up with so much care, to his heir, perhaps a man quite the reverse of himself, who, foolishly supposing that the riches he is so easily put in possession of will never have an end, launches out into the greatest extravagance, and consumes, before he is well aware of it, the vast riches which he imagined would secure to him all the happiness he could wish for, and, never expecting a reverse of circumstances, he is totally unacquainted with any means of industry to support himself, and his unhappy family; so that, in his turn, he becomes a flatterer to those, whom, in his prosperity, he had despised, and is reduced to the necessity of living on the scanty bounty, thus meanly obtained. Though all men are not so completely wretched as these two characters, yet, with very few exceptions, we all come short of happiness by misplacing the object: if, instead of doing so, we should believe that there is no real happiness to be obtained in any worldly pursuit, and endeavour to obtain it by our expectations in another world, we should have a greater share of happiness here, and after death, we should for ever enjoy the real happiness, without any admixture of affliction, for which, the miser, if duly sensible of it, would cheerfully resign his gold, and the spendthrift, the pleasure of spending it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOPHISTRY DETECTED.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The strictures on Human Dissection contained in Paper No. I. of the Liverpool Concocted Friends, appeared so extraordinary as to induce me to take some pains for further information. I obtained a copy of Mr. Abernethy's Address, perused it with care, and after making every reasonable allowance, am constrained to pronounce it a most illiberal, insulting, fallacious composition. I would require the writer to substantiate his statements with recorded facts, and particularly that relative to the interposition of police in favour of Anatomical exhibitions. I would require to be specified, the Country, the Law, and the Execution of the Law.

Mr. A. refers to the practices (or properly speaking foists in a whim of his own as being the practice) in Paris. I am of opinion that this dissector is wholly ignorant of the French laws on this point, else he would never so commit himself. Allow me, therefore, to put two or three questions for the consideration of this gentleman who deals so liberally in gross fabrication. In the city noticed, on the death of an individual what is required to be done by the person having the care of the house, and under what penalty? What step is taken in consequence? What is particular before fastening the coffin? And how is the funeral ceremony attended? The solutions of these queries will amply refute the falsehoods of Mr. Abernethy; and clearly show that the human dissectors in France, as in England, are dependent upon practices which should be abolished by the prohibition of dissecting rooms.

VINDICATOR.

[See Notices to Correspondents.]

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Suffer me to awaken your Liverpool correspondent J. D. as to the real causes of the productiveness of the last Liverpool season, which he is gross enough to attribute to the amazing powers of Mr. Vandenhoff.

J. D. sets out with a falsehood in asserting that Brutus was acted only once during the last season at Liverpool, viz. Mr. Bass's night, and brought £224. Brutus was acted there on Thursday June 13th, and by the scanty appearance of the audience that night, it may be supposed £15 was the extreme of the receipts. The success of the last season is solely attributed by J. D. to Mr. V. Why does J. D. omit the attraction of Miss Clara Fisher? Why forget the houses brought by Mr. Liston's engagement? Why sink the comforts of a newly painted and upholstered theatre? Why not mention the unusually great combination of auxiliary talent afforded throughout the season by the long va-tions of Covent-Garden and Drury-Lane? And above all, why does he not allow some share of the profits to the amazing popularity of Tom and Jerry, played 17 nights to about £2000? If J. D. be at a loss to account for the failure of his memory in these instances let me answer for him—it was because Mr. V. was not concerned in the majority of these great resources. Taking a Benefit for an aggregate is ridiculous. Mr. Bass had £224, but it was not the play of Brutus or Mr. V.'s acting that drew the money (I beg pardon I mean the tickets). An Actor's connexion and system of Benefit making is the grand cause of a good night, and had the performances on that occasion been Tom Thumb and Bombastes Furioso, no doubt the same results would have been experienced.

Trusting this to your liberality for insertion,
I remain your's,

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER,
From Monday Feb. 24th, to Friday Feb. 28th, 1823.

Monday.—Hamlet: with Winning a Husband. Hamlet—Mr. Young.
Tuesday.—Julius Caesar: with the Citizen. Brutus—Mr. Young.
Wednesday.—Coriolanus: with the Weathercock. Coriolanus—Mr. Young.
Friday.—Macbeth: with Past Ten o'Clock. Macbeth—Mr. Young.

The admirers of the drama have this week been highly entertained by the representation of four of the popular tragedies of the unrivalled Shakespeare, viz. Hamlet, Julius Caesar, Coriolanus, and Macbeth: and in addition to this excellent selection, they have been gratified with the performance of MR. YOUNG in the principal character of each.—This gentleman's expression and acting are so chaste and noble, as to render him an admirable study for all who would acquire a classical style from the best living models.—His pure enunciation and commanding attitudes are peculiarly striking; and whatever shades of excellency may remain undecided between him and our other leading tragedians, we hesitate not to pronounce that in the points just noticed he is excelled by none.—We should not do justice to MR. SALTER, nor be for a moment reconciled to ourselves, were we to pass him over without particular commendation; his Cassius (which part he played for the first time) could not be objected to in the first performer of the day; nor did our townsmen fail to appreciate his performance;—it was honourably distinguished by reiterated applause. MR. BASS, as Mark Antony, was very efficient, and played the part with much pathos and discrimination.

THE LINKER'S LINES ON MEETING A FAIR FRIEND.

I left ye, Janie, blooming fair,
'Mang the bonrock's o' Bargeny,
I've foun' ye on the banks o' Ayr,
But sair ye're altered, Jeanie.

I left ye 'mang the woods sae green,
In rustic weed befitting—
I've foun' ye buikit like a queen,
In painted chambers sittin'.

I left ye like the wanton lamb,
That plays 'mang Hadyart's heather—
I've foun' ye now a sober damc,
A wife an' eke a mither.

Ye're fairer, statelier, I can see,
Ye're wiser, nae doubt, Jeanie,
But O, I'd rather met wi' thee
'Mang the green bowers o' Bargeny.

A HOMELY COT.

Tell me no more of pleasure's airy flight,
The gay delusions of romantic youth;
Can fancy's schemes afford a just delight,
Unfolded by search, unreal'd by truth.

Ah! tell me not of ever during bliss
For us who roll on life's tempestuous wave,
Not purest love can soothe to constant peace,
Nor firmest friendship from afflictions save.

Fresh as the morn, the traveller essays
His destin'd journey, while doctidful views
Beguile the tedious road, o'er which he strays,
And through the day his unknown way pursues.

At length, o'ertrill'd, the sheltering home he gains;
Bleak blew the winds, and darkness veils the sky;
He crowds the fire, and in his cottage reigns.
Content no more the devious maze to try.

So we, enamour'd of life's gaudy scene,
Through youth's short period, grasp the painted air;
Still disappointed, still in hopes to glean
Unfading harvests from a field so fair.

Weary, at last, we seek a rest to find;
And, though but mean, or irksome be our lot,
Still 'tis our own: and, with a quiet mind,
Earth's greatest blessing is a homely cot.

Will find such laugh were premature,
For here too lies a sole.

And here five little ones repose,

Unheeded by their brother toes,
Who all are now alive.

A leg and foot, to speak more plain,
Rest here of one commanding,

With one foot in the grave.

Fortune in vain here showed her spite,
For he will still be found,
Should England's sons engage in fight,
Resolved to stand his ground.

But fortune's pardon I must beg,
She meant not to disarm,
And when she lopped the hero's leg,
She did not seek his arm;

And but indulged a harmless whim,
Since he could walk with one,
She saw two legs were lost on him,
Who never meant to run.

WEEKLY DIARY.

MARCH.

Among the Romans, March, from Mars, was the first month; and marriages made in this month were accounted unhappy.

REMARKABLE DAYS.

SATURDAY, 1.—Saint David.

Saint David was the great ornament and pattern of his age. He continued in the see of St. David's many years; and having founded several monasteries, and been the spiritual father of many saints, both British and Irish, he died about the year 544, at a very advanced age.—Early on the 1st of March, the young maidens of the village of Steban Hethe, now called Stepney, used to resort to Goodman's Fields (the only remains of which now not built upon is the Tenter-ground) in search of a blade of grass of a reddish tint; the charm being, that the fortunate finder obtained the husband of her wishes within the month. The leek worn on this day by Welshmen is said to be in memory of a great victory obtained by them over the Saxons; they, during the battle, having leeks in their hats, to distinguish themselves, by order of St. David.

MATHEMATICS.

Solution of No. 61, by Miss Agnes.

In the first equation, $x = 62 - y - z$; in the second, $x = \frac{190 - 6y - 2z}{3}$; hence, $62 - y - z = \frac{190 - 6y - 2z}{3}$ and $z = 3y - 4$. If we substitute these values of x and z in the third equation, we shall have $26y^2 - 552y + 4372 = 1452$; or, $y^2 - \frac{276y}{13} = -\frac{1460}{13}$

Whence, $y^2 - \frac{276y}{13} + \frac{19044}{169} = \frac{61}{169}$, by completing the square. And, $y - \frac{138}{13} = \sqrt{\frac{64}{169}} = \pm \frac{8}{13}$ by evolution.

Consequently, $y = \pm \frac{8}{13} + \frac{138}{13} = 10$ or $11\frac{1}{13}$.

Take $y = 10$; then $x = 26$ and $z = 26$. The gentleman's age is therefore 26 years 10 months and 26 days.

Messrs. Jones, Wilson, Andrews, Williams, and Jack at a Pinch have favoured us with solutions.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

CAPTAIN PARRY'S EXPEDITION.

An account, though circumstantially received, we are rejoiced to learn, affords fair hopes of the safety and success of the Expedition under the command of Captain Parry. It is derived from Russia, and communicated to our Board of Admiralty. The particulars are, that several fishing vessels, belonging to Kamschatka and the Aleutian Islands, saw our illustrious Navigators OFF ICY CAPE. The Russian Commandant states, that on receiving this intelligence he examined the masters of the vessels separately, and that their relation of the fact agreed in every circumstance; and he expresses himself to be entirely satisfied of the truth of their report. This is great and gratifying news; for if it be correct, which there is good reason to believe it is, then is the great geographical problem solved which has excited so intense an interest, and to British intrepidity and perseverance is owing another of those grand discoveries which form epochs in the history of the world. As Icy Cape has been reached from Behring's Straits; as it is indeed yearly visited by small Russian ships, all apprehension about our bold navigators will be at an end as soon as the tidings are confirmed, and we shall only have to curb our impatience for letters from our noble Countrymen, now happily, we trust, ploughing the Pacific Ocean on their homeward way.—Lit. Gaz.

EDINBURGH WERNERIAN SOCIETY.

On Saturday, 26th ult. a very able scientific essay on different modes of applying the power of the steam-engine towards impelling vessels through the water, was read at the meeting of the Wernerian Society. The advantages, the different construction, and the application of the paddle or wheel, to this purpose, were detailed at considerable length; and were followed by statements of several other ingenious contrivances: such as a spiral worm working in a cylinder, which receives the water at the bow, and expels it at the stern; a series of horizontal pumps, &c. &c. It is not possible to convey an adequate idea of the author's theories in the short space which is allowed us, much less to state his calculations and arguments. We can only say, that it struck us as being a memoir which would not long remain unpublished; and in the hope of its soon appearing, we forbear regretting that we cannot give a fuller account of it. Professor Jameson read an article on the natural ferocity of beasts of prey; combating the notion that the same species of animal was naturally more savage in one part of the world than in another; and attributing the apparent difference to the knowledge which the animals may have obtained by experience of the power of man. He gave several instances in corroboration of the position; stating that the authors who have affirmed the contrary have drawn their facts from the habits of those animals which have existed in the neighbourhood of civilized human beings; and have thus, apparently, assumed the effect of locality as an original difference of disposition. The horn of a rhinoceros found in Scotland was then produced: it was rather more than two feet in length; slightly curved; of very great weight; and of large circumference at the base. It was a very interesting subject for reflection, as well as an object of admiration. A stuffed specimen, and also a skeleton of the Dugong, was then produced to the society. This animal is of the whale tribe, inhabiting the seas about Java. It wants the blow-holes of the whale. The anterior part of the skeleton has much resemblance to that of quadrupeds. The head exhibited many peculiarities; amongst which the teeth were the most remarkable; besides incisors and molars, there was an intermediate range, distant from the others, of what might be called canine were they not too numerous to make that designation correct; there were three of them on each side of the jaw; they are supposed to discharge the first functions of the molars, that is, of dividing previous to grinding. The molars were round and flat; the distinctive characteristics of animals not carnivorous. The stuffed specimen might be about three and a half feet long. This animal has large mammae in the anterior part of the body. It frequently raises itself out of the water; and its round face, together with the mammae, have given rise to the fable of the mermaid. A living ichneumon was let loose upon the society, which caused no small disturbance, by running about amongst the legs of those present.—Edinburgh Observer.

MORE MISERIES.

MR. EDITOR,—Your fair correspondents, Diana Treacle, and Jane Nubibus, may have some cause for complaints. So have I; and, as my case is rather extraordinary, I wish you to publish it for the benefit of the nation.

When a man lives unmarried till he is sixty-one, as I did, he had better never marry at all. There are many ways by which a woman may torment her husband beside being jealous of him.

Take the general outlines of my history. The earlier part of my life was spent at College, in the study of Physic; and, I do not know why, I acquired the character of an odd learned fellow, when I arrived at the age of thirty, a vacancy happening in the neighbourhood of my birth, I was invited, by an uncle, to take upon me the infirmities of all the folks within the circle of twenty miles. Before I set out, I ordered the cottage barber to make me a good physical wig; under the shadow of which, with the assistance of a handsome cane, and a few very significant shrugs and solemn nods, I soon acquired the reputation of an eminent physician. Fees came in apace; so that in the course of thirty years, I had saved more money than I really knew what to do with: whether it was my learning, my person, or my money, I cannot say, but a lady of my acquaintance took a vast liking to something belonging to me. I was not so blind as not to see the conquest; in short, I married her.—I was past the years of discretion, so I married her. Oh, what a condescension! a lady of her family, rank, and fashion in life! As for age, indeed, she was but six years younger than myself; and for fortune, if she ever had any, she had spent it,—and yet I was such a fool as to be convinced that she was conferring the greatest obligation upon me.

No sooner had she taken upon her the management of my family, than adieu for ever to all order, peace and comfort. She began with discharging old Jonas, because he cut so queer a figure in a long queue, and white stockings, (which she insisted upon his wearing,) that the poor fellow could not help laughing at himself. She next discarded my old wig. It certainly was worse for wear, not sitting so close to my head as it did when it was new; but I continued it in service, purely from this consideration, that the older it grew it had the less occasion for combing. A new fashioned wig was instantly substituted, which has no warmth in it, and I am never suffered to stir out, however pressing the occasion, until it is dressed and powdered. Our prigg of a footman is so long twirling and frizzing it up, that a score of patients have expired, and the fees been lost, ere I was able to set out and relieve them. My snuff-coloured suit had been reinstated every year, from a pattern left in the hands of an honest country tailor, who was forbidden the house, because, agreeably to my direction, he made all my clothes wide and easy.

A more fashionable habit-maker was charged to prepare a new suit, of the dandy kind, which fit me so exactly, that I dare not cross my arms, for fear of exposing my back bone. I am no longer suffered to wash myself, according to custom, every morning at the pump in my back yard; though nothing was more refreshing, nor any thing more handy than the towel which revolved on a roller fixed to the kitchen door.

On my return home the other day from visiting my patients, I found the chambermaid setting my study to rights, as she called it; but the confusion this regularity has occasioned is almost inconceivable. My shoeing horn and tobacco stopper are irrecoverably lost; and my papers are disposed in such order that I know not where to find any thing I want. Two pair of Manchester velvet breeches, which I left on the back of a chair, have disappeared: and, instead of the easy slippers which I made out of an old pair of shoes, by cutting the straps off, I found a new pair of red leather, adorned with white stitches round the edges, and made so neat that I can not bear to walk in them. My woolen night cap is condemned to the vile purpose of rubbing the grates and fenders; and my wife insists upon my wearing a fine cotton one, with a large tassel on the top. I took such a violent cold the first night that it brought a defluxion of humours into my right eye, as very nearly to deprive me of sight.

The stair-case and floors are all waxed; it saves the expense of mops, but I have had such falls, that I have almost dislocated every joint about me. I must not appear in my broad brimmed heaver, not even in the summer months, however distressing the sun may be; while my neck-cloth is so stiff that I am apprehensive of having my throat cut with the paste board. When I remonstrate against any of these things, my wife stops my mouth with a kiss, and says,—my dear angel—we must pay some regard to appearances. She is, as I said before, but six years younger than myself, yet, she dresses, dances, and drives about as if she was but five and twenty.

N. B. The old blacks are condemned to the carts, and we have a pair of nagtailed bays. These things she may continue to do; nay, she may wear veils, dress herself as foolishly as she pleases, and play at cards for a shilling a fish, if she will only let me have my study to myself: and if she will restore my night cap and old slippers, I will submit to wear the new coat and wig every Sunday. I am, Sir, Your's,

R. T.

P. S. I long to take poor old Jonas again; for he was very particular about greasing my boots in wet weather; and never lost his time in polishing them with either Warren's or Turner's blacking. Besides, on dark nights, he always rode before; and, drunk or sober, he knew the shortest ways all over the country.

THE EXISTENCE OF CRIME IN ENGLAND AT THE PRESENT TIME AND IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY COMPARED.

Nothing is a more common complaint, than that of the degeneracy and wickedness of the times. That a more general laxity of morals and manners prevails at the present day than at any former period, cannot be denied; but that capital and flagrant crimes, among the lower orders, are more common and prevalent, is much to be doubted.

From official documents presented to the house of commons, it appears, that in 1810 the number of persons committed to the different jails in England and Wales amounted to 5337, of whom 404 were sentenced to suffer death. In 1815, the committals amounted to 7818, and the capital condemnations to 533; and in 1819, the committals increased to no less than 13,932, and one thousand three hundred and two were capitally convicted.

Let us now see what was the state of society in England, with respect to crimes and outrages, three centuries ago.

"In Henry the Eighth's reign," says Harrison, "there were hanged 72,000 thieves and rogues, besides other malefactors: this makes about two thousand a-year."

This is more than double the average annual number of every capital convictions in England at the present day; and yet the population has been trebled within the last three centuries. Considerable allowance is, however, to be made on account of the far greater degree of rigour with which the laws were administered in the sixteenth century than in the nineteenth.

An eminent justice of the peace in Somersetshire, in the year 1596, in an account of England, says, "that there had been, in that county alone, forty persons executed in a year for robberies, thefts, and other felonies; thirty-five burnt in the hand; thirty-seven whipped; and an hundred and eighty-three discharged; that those who were discharged were wicked and desperate persons, who never would come to any good, because they would not work, &c.; that, notwithstanding this great number of indictments, the fifth part of the felonies committed in the county were not brought to a trial; that the number of robberies committed by the infinite number of wicked, idle, wandering people, was intolerable to the poor countrymen, and obliged them to keep a perpetual watch over the sheepfolds, &c. &c.; that the other counties of England were in no better condition than Somersetshire, and many of them were even in a worse; that there were at least three or four hundred of these vagabonds in every county, who lived by theft and rapine, and who sometimes met in troops of fifty or sixty, and committed spoil on the inhabitants; and that the magistrates themselves were intimidated from executing the laws upon them; and there were instances of justices of the peace, who, after giving sentence against rogues, had interposed to stop the execution of their own sentence, on account of the danger which hung over them from the confederates of these villains."

"In the year 1575, the queen (Elizabeth) complained in parliament of the bad execution of the laws; and threatened that, if the magistrates were not for the future more vigilant, she would intrust authority to indigent and needy persons, who would find an interest in a more exact administration of justice." This was a dangerous and impolitic expedient: it would however appear that she was as good as her word; for, in the year 1601, there were great complaints made in parliament of the rapaciousness of justices of the peace; and a member said, "that the magistrate was an animal who, for half-a-dozen of chickens, would dispense with a dozen of penal statutes."

SONG.

On those eyes a moment gazing,
Care of life no more control,
Joy and hope the bosom seizing,
Love inspires the drooping soul.
Should thy features so transcendent,
Change beneath a sickly ray,
Thou hast beauties more resplendent,
That adorn, nor fade away.
Sweetest temper, mind enlighten'd,
Talents that respect engage,
Graces that by time are brighten'd,
To the farthest day of age.
These exhaustless sources flowing,
Sooth and charm life's rugged way,
And in softest fervour glowing,
Melt into celestial day.

LINES

Written by a Father during his absence from Home, and addressed to his Wife.

The delight dearest Helen—the bliss is all thine,
Our sweet one this day to caress;
Whilst far from her prattlings, one comfort is mine—
In my prayers my dear infant to bless!
Yes, Helen can feast her bright eye on the traces
The beauties which nature has given,
Can fondly exult o'er the infantile graces,
Bestow'd by the bounty of heaven.—
Whilst the Father his gratitude pours in his lay
To the Father of all on his child's natal day!
In the season of spring—'tis the gardener's pride
Each floweret and plant to support,
And screen them from winds that so ruthlessly ride—
Destruction their business and sport.
But, Helen with tenfold the gardener's care,
Will foster her infant with Joy,
Will delight every blessing and comfort to share,
And kiss the young tear from its eye.—
Whilst the Father his gratitude pours in his lay
To the Father of all on his child's natal day.

I remember my sweet one thy parents and friends,
Rejoic'd on thy first natal day;
But what their delight when another extends Thy promise of bloom to display!—
They rejoice and they pray that no cold chilling frost,
May injure the bud of thy youth;—
Nor thro' life on the world's heaving ocean be tost
But repose in the calmness of truth.—
And thy Father all grateful, his Maker will praise;
And his child be the pride and delight of his days! G. I.

VARIETIES.

A MONUMENT bearing the following inscription, has been lately placed in the chancel of the parish church of Preston:—

In memory of
Henry William Hulton, aged 31 years,
Nicholas Charles Grimshaw, aged 30 years,
George Henry Grimshaw, aged 17 years,
And Joseph Kay, aged 20 years,
Who

In a moment of youthful enjoyment,
Were drowned in the River Ribble,
By the oversetting of a boat,
On the 24th day of April, A. D. 1822.
Several of their friends and companions,
Have united to erect this Monument,
In testimony of their deep concern,

And
With a desire to perpetuate the salutary impression
Of this truly awful dispensation.

They sailed in hope, but they returned no more;
Youth, health, and pleasure, cheered them on the way;
Brief was the voyage, yet they reached a shore
Beyond the seaman's track, ere close of day.
Low in the grave their ashes slumber now:
Reader, their days are numbered—Where art thou?

Though on the stream of time thy vessel glide,
And pure as heaven the waters seem to roll,
Ere long, in calm or tempest, shall the tide
Cast on a land unknown thy naked soul:
Ah! then, when life and death no more shall be,
Where, reader, wilt thou spend eternity?

ANECDOTE OF LAVALETTE.—When Lavalette had been liberated from prison by his wife, and was flying with Sir Robert Wilson to the frontier, the postmaster examined his countenance, and recognised him through his disguise. A postillion was instantly sent off at full speed. Many times Lavalette urged his demand for horses. The postmaster had quitted the house, and given orders that none should be supplied. The travellers thought themselves discovered, and saw no means of escape in a country with which they were unacquainted. They resolved upon defending themselves, and selling their lives dearly. The postmaster, at length, returned unattended, and then addressing himself to Monsieur de Lavalette, he said, "You have the appearance of a man of honour, you are going to Brussels, where you will see M. de Lavalette, deliver him these two hundred Louis d'ors, which I owe him, and which he is no doubt in want of;" and without waiting for an answer, he threw the money in the carriage, and withdrew, saying, "You will be drawn by my best horses—a postillion is gone on to provide relays for the continuance of your journey."

NAPOLEON AT A MASQUERADE.—I am told that the late Emperor used frequently to attend these masked balls, and an anecdote is related of him, which rests on good authority. Napoleon was at a masquerade two years preceding his downfall, in a brown domino, and with very high heeled shoes, and large feathers in his hat, to increase his apparent height, and prevent recognition. As, notwithstanding his disguise, there was still a commanding air about him, he was intriqué, as the French call it, by several females; but particularly by one in a white silk domino, who at length fixed his attention. The coquette drew him into a Loge Grillee; to which he was followed closely by General D—s, the officer in attendance. Napoleon ordered refreshments, and, whilst the waiter went for them, shut the door. When the waiter returned, the lady took the refreshments from his hand. They consisted of a glass of orgeat, a glass of lemonade, and some biscuits. D—s stood at this time in the passage, so situated as to have a perfect view of the box when the door was open, without being seen himself; at the moment when the female had taken the lemonade from the waiter, and as she stood with her back towards Napoleon, she drew a paper from her sleeve, and poured the contents into the glass. D—s, who had heard the Emperor order lemonade for himself, and orgeat for the lady, was instantly on the alarm. He listened at the door, and when he heard the Emperor toast his companion, rushed forcibly into the box. Napoleon had the glass to his lips. D—s cried out to him not to drink. The contents of the glass were examined, and it was found that a quantity of poison more than sufficient to produce death, had been introduced. The lady, Napoleon, and D—s, went away together in a coach: the affair was kept secret for some time; but it was rumored that an attempt had been made to poison Napoleon, by a member of his own family, and a month after the abdication, D—s himself confirmed the report, but without stating any other particulars than those which I have mentioned.—Museum.

FUNERAL SERMONS.—Mrs. Creswell, a noted courtizan who flourished, or rather decayed, in the reign of Charles the Second, from the natural effects of her infamous profession, was far advanced in the decline of life, before she had arrived at its meridian. At her decease, she desired, by Will, to have a sermon preached at her funeral, for which the preacher was to have ten pounds; but with this express condition, that he was to say nothing but what was WELL of her. A preacher was, with some difficulty, found, who undertook the task. After a sermon preached on the general subject of mortality, and the good uses to be made of it, he concluded with saying,—By the will of the deceased it is expected that I should mention her, and say nothing but what was WELL of her. All that I shall say of her therefore is this:—she was born WELL, she lived WELL, and she died WELL; for she was born with the name of Creswell, she lived in Clerkenwell, and she died in the parish of Bridewell.

Dr. Fuller, in one of his publications, tells us, that when one was to preach the funeral sermon of a most vicious and generally hated character, all wondered what he would say in his praise; the preacher's friends fearing, and his foes hoping, that, for his fee, he would force his conscience to flattery. For one thing, said the minister, this man is to be spoken WELL of by all; and for another thing, he is to be spoken ILL of by none: the first is, because God made him; the second, because he is dead.

AN ENORMOUS PUNCH BOWL.—On the 25th of October, 1694, a bowl of punch was made at the Right Honourable Edward Russel's House, when he was Captain General and Commander in Chief of his Majesty's forces in the Mediterranean seas. It was made in a fountain, in a garden, in the middle of four walks, all covered over head with lemon and orange trees, and in every walk was a table, the whole length of it covered with cold collations, &c. In the said fountain were the following ingredients, viz. four hog-heads of brandy, eight hog-heads of water, twenty gallons of lime juice, twenty-five thousand lemons, thirteen hundred weight of fine Lisbon sugar, five pounds of grated nutmegs, three hundred toasted biscuits, and lastly a pipe of mountain Malaga. Over the fountain was a large canopy, built to keep off the rain: and there was built on purpose a little boat, wherein was a boy belonging to the fleet, who rowed round the fountain, and filled the cups of the company; and in all probability more than six thousand men drank thereof.

DEATH EXTRAORDINARY.—A cat belonging to a lady in Dumfries, guillotined herself in the following manner:—Having strayed into the drawing-room, which fronts the river, and one of the windows being open, she jumped up to observe what was passing outside. Unfortunately, a small piece of wood that fastened the window up caught her eye, and examining it she pulled it out, when down came the sharp-edged window, and literally guillotined her, sending her head out and her body in.

MR. FOX ON THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.—Mr. Fox, during his illness, breakfasted with one or two of his most intimate friends, by his bed-side, and talked with them as long as his physician permitted. It was during one of these morning conversations, that he first expressed his persuasion that his disease would terminate fatally. Lord — said, that he had made a party for Christmas, in the country, and that he had taken the liberty to include Mr. Fox in it, without his knowledge. 'But it will be a new scene, sir,' added he, 'and I think you will approve of it.' 'I shall indeed be in a new scene by Christmas next,' said Mr. Fox. 'My lord, what do you think of the state of the soul after death?' Lord — (confounded, I believe, by the unexpected turn which Mr. Fox had given to the conversation) made no reply. Mr. Fox continued, 'That it is immortal I am convinced. The existence of the Deity is a proof that spirit exists; why not therefore the soul of man? And if such an essence as the soul exists, by its nature it may exist for ever. I should have believed the immortality of the soul, though Christianity had never existed; but how it acts as separated from the body, is beyond my capacity of judgment. This, however, I shall know by next Christmas.' Mrs. Fox took his hand, and wept. Mr. Fox was much moved; 'I am happy,' said he, 'full of confidence; I may say, of certainty.'

WOMEN OF KNOWLEDGE.—'I shall be glad to know,' said a lady angrily, 'how knowledge is incompatible with a lady's situation in life. I should like to be told why chemistry, geography, algebra, languages, and the whole circle of arts and sciences are not as becoming in her as in a man!' 'I do not say,' replied a gentleman of plain sense, 'that it is unbecoming, but I think a little of it would serve her purpose; in my opinion, a woman's knowledge of chemistry should extend no farther than to melting of butter; her geography, to a thorough acquaintance with every hole and corner of the house; her algebra, to keeping a correct account of the expenses of the family; and, for her languages heaven knows that one language is enough in all conscience, and the less use she makes of that the better.'

MARY, COUNTESS OF WARWICK, was the thirteenth of the fifteen children that the great Earl of Cork had by his second lady, the daughter of Sir Geoffry Fenton. She was married to Charles, Earl of Warwick, whom she survived about five years. She was so eminent for her bounty to the poor, that the Earl, her husband was said to have left his estate to charitable uses.

Such was the fame of her hospitality and charity, that it advanced the rents of houses in her neighbourhood, where she was the common arbitress of controversies; which she decided with great sagacity and judgment, so as to prevent many tedious and expensive law-suits. The earl, alluding to her economy as well as her other excellences, frequently declared, that he had rather have her with five thousand pounds, than any other woman with twenty thousand. She died April 12, 1678. Her funeral sermon was preached by A. Walker, D. D. Rector of Fyfield, in Essex, who described her as "eminently religious and charitable, the most illustrious pattern of sincere piety and solid goodness this age hath produced."

DOCTOR GIDEON HARVEY, who was esteemed little better than a pretender to physic, wrote against the frauds and empiricism of the physicians and apothecaries, as well as those of the quacks of his time. He made it his business to cry down the faculty, and published several books with a view of making people their own doctors. His "art of curing diseases by expectation," is the most remarkable. In this he intimates, that nature, aided by expectation only, may be more safely relied on, than the prescriptions of the generality of physicians; and that those who employ them are frequently amused with such things that have no real effect in working their cure. He was very dogmatical; and consequently, as far as he was so, was no more to be trusted than the worst of those against whom he exclaimed.

There never was, perhaps, any thing more remarkable than the fortune of this man. There was a great debate who should succeed the deceased physician of the Tower. The contending parties were so equally matched in their interests and pretensions, that it was extremely difficult to determine which should have the preference. The matter was, at length, brought to a compromise; and Dr. Gideon Harvey was promoted to that office, for the same reason that Sixtus V. was advanced to the pontificate, because he was, in appearance, sickly and infirm, and his death was expected in a few months.—He, however, survived all his rivals, and died in 1700, after he had enjoyed his sinecure above fifty years!

A GENTLEMAN.—BY THE EMPEROR JOSEPH II.
(From Mad. Campan's Memoirs.)

"Madam,—a man may be the son of a general, and yet have no talent for command. A man may be of a good family, and yet possess no other merit than that which he owes to chance, the name of gentleman."

"I know your son, and I know what makes the soldier; and this two-fold knowledge convinces me that your son has not the disposition of a warrior, and that he is too full of his birth, to leave the country; a hope of his ever rendering it any important service."

"What you are to be pitied for, madam, is, that your son is not fit either for an officer, a statesman, or a priest; in a word, that he is nothing more than a gentleman, in the most extended acceptance of the word."

"You may be thankful to that destiny, which, in refusing talents to your son, has taken care to put him in possession of great wealth, which will sufficiently compensate him for other deficiencies."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Mr. William Daniell, we are informed, is preparing for publication the seventh volume of his Picturesque Voyage round Great Britain, which will comprise the range of coast from the North to Weymouth.

We understand that "Thomas Brown the younger," will publish, early in April, "Fables for the Holy Alliance," with other Poems, &c. &c.

J. H. Wiffen has in the press a translation, in English verse, of the Works of Garcilasso de la Vega, surnamed the Prince of Castilian Poets; with a Critical and Historical Essay on the rise, progress, decay, and revival of Spanish Poetry, and a Life and portrait of the Author.

Dr. Meyrick has for a considerable time been employed on 'A Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armour,' with a view to its chronological arrangement. Such has long been a desideratum in literature, as it is impossible clearly to understand our early history without some information of the kind; and Grose's Treatise affords no help whatever. We understand that the work is in the press, and in such forwardness, as is all probability, to be shortly produced to the public.

Sharon Turner, Esq., P. S. A. is about to publish, in 4to., the third volume of his History of England, embracing the Middle Ages.

Mr. Scott's History of England during the reign of George III., designed as a continuation to Hume and Smollet, will appear in the course of the month.

An Encyclopaedia, or General Dictionary of the Science of Music, is about to be published under the direction of Mr. Bacon, assisted by Messrs. Clementi, Bishop, Horsley, Wesley, Shield, and Hewitt. The work will be illustrated by numerous engravings.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

O. J. on the performances and the receipts at the Liverpool Theatre Royal, last season, is not inserted.—The substance of his communication will be found in the letter of Veritas. V. P.'s "Facts are Stubborn Things" came too late to supersede Veritas.—Otherwise, being more particular, they should have been given. We subjoin an extract:—

"J. D. also says, the last Season in Liverpool was the most profitable that had been for some years. Here, I doubt not, he is well informed; but why did he not favour us with the cause of such success? No,—that would not have suited his purpose. Then permit me, Sir, to enumerate the attractions of that season. First, a newly and splendidly decorated theatre, with a reduction of prices of admission; then the following Stars in Succession:"

Miss Clara Fisher	Mr. Harley	Mr. Cooper
Mr. C. Young	Mr. Knight	Mr. Davison
Miss M. Tree	Mr. Farren	Miss Booth
Mr. St. Albion	Mrs. Faucit	Mrs. Bunn
Mr. Blanchard	Mr. Dowton	Mr. Russell
Webb	Miss Halliande	Mr. Norman and
Miss Smithson	Mr. Fawcett	Mr. Liston.

The following new pieces:—Kentworth, which was played every evening for a fortnight to great houses; The Law of Java; The Vampire; The Libertine, &c. all got out with splendid new scenery and decorations; and last of all, Tom and Jerry, which had not been previously acted at the Minor Theatre there, as it had been in this town. This piece was acted 15 nights, and brought £2000 into the treasury!"

"A Reflection at Sea."—These beautiful lines are omitted.—They will be found in the Iris, vol. I. p. 248.

T. K. will find the substance of his favour in our next, when the original shall be returned.—We are obliged by his indulgence and complimentary condescension.

Albert Montgomery; Maxims of Health; The Ancient hypotheses of Heaven and Earth; Mourning to-morrow; with Lines on Beauty, on Ale, and on Everlasting Shoes, are received. Ignorance will oblige us by sending the conclusion of the Wearied Bachelor in time for our next; we shall then insert what has this week come to hand.

“Mindful of disaster past,
And shivering at the northern blast,
The sleety storm returning still,
The morning hour, the evening chill;
Reluctant comes the timid spring.”—WATSON.

MR. MEDIUM,

SIR,—No season has been so much celebrated by poets and descriptive writers as the Spring. Every person who is at all conversant with our general literature, can recollect many beautiful passages of which this loveliest portion of the year is the subject; and almost every volume of poetry which makes its appearance, exhibits another attempt to communicate to the reader that delight which the writer has felt, or affected to feel, amidst the zephyrs and flowerets of the vernal months. Many of these descriptions have, no doubt, been written in situations very distant, and under circumstances very different, from those which they attempt to delineate. The balmy airs laden with odours, have been imagined amid the smoky eddies of a metropolitan atmosphere, and the perfume of the March violet has shed itself over the descriptive page, in spite of that “rank compound of villainous smells,” which is inhaled,

“Where houses thick, and sewers annoy the air.”

The leafy grove, and extended landscape, have been manufactured out of the narrow lane, and the chimneys which nod over each side of it; the kennel—which, too long,

Had crept inglorious, and unknown to song, had become a meandering stream, and the dingy half-starved sparrows, who sit drooping and complaining on the tiles, are metamorphosed into the coy quiriters, beautiful in plumage, and varied in song, who fill the groves with melody, and express their loves by the sweetest notes, and most rapid motions. The swains too, (for no description is worth reading that does not speak of swains), the swains, and the nymphs; so faithful, and beautiful, and tender, these had their prototypes, in the dust-men, and milk-women, whom the poet, in a town, must consider as the representatives of the ploughmen and dairy-maids of rural life.

Such is the prerogative of genius. It strips real life of all its coarseness, and gives to airy nothings, the form and impress of reality. But Spring, as it appears in the country, is a subject so hackneyed, that it is scarcely in the power even of genius itself, to impart an air of novelty to descriptions of this season.

Swift has given us a poetical description, abundantly humorous, of a shower in the town; but I do not remember that any writer has attempted to delineate the appearances of Spring, except in connection with rural scenery and rural life. Yet Spring in the town has characteristics as strongly marked as those by which it is distinguished in the country; a position which I shall proceed to exemplify, by detailing some of those appearances which I have observed to take place with great regularity in Manchester, during the progress of this season.

The genial beams of the sun which, in the country, cause the buds to unfold, and the flowers to disclose their beauties, produce an effect somewhat of the same kind upon the population of our town. The great coats, and fur cloaks of our beaux; the thick and ample shawls, and kerchiefs, in which our belles were wrapped up during winter, like flowers in their hybernacula, gradually disappear. One of my friends, who is a florist, from repeated observations on the times at which this blossoming, as he calls it, takes place among the ladies, has nearly completed a floral catalogue of our fair townswomen. He begins with those who are the first to disclose their charms, and whom, from the time of their appearance, he terms the snow-drops. Proceeding through the violets, daffodils, primroses, cowslips, and lillies, his list terminates with the roses. I must, however, be permitted to add, that he has been obliged to leave a large space for the everlastings, and that he has several specimens of sweet-briar, minuted in his collection. “When,” says he, “I look upon an assemblage of the different species and varieties of these human flowers, as they are to be seen in our public walks in the month of May, I scarcely find it possible to regret that I am not in the country, and should willingly consent to match such a collection of the beauties of nature, against all the prize flowers which shall be exhibited at the different shows in the neighbourhood during the present season.

Our amusements, as well as our dress, feel the influence of Spring. Winter is undoubtedly the fittest time for political disquisitions, learned speculations, and tragic performances. Our literary societies, and alehouse clubs, are so fully aware of this fact, that their operations are usually suspended during Spring and Summer. Nor are the managers of the theatre deficient in the necessary information on so important a point. As the days lengthen, the buskin gradually gives place to the sock; “Love in a Village” takes the place of “The Mourning Bride,” and the “Fair Penitent” quits the stage to make room for “Miss in her Teens.” Why it is that we can argue most closely in cloudy weather, and are more inclined to weep when we are pinched by the cold, I leave to be investigated by those philosophers who delight in deep researches. It is sufficient for my purpose to have stated the fact, nor shall I be at all inclined to envy the fame which may be acquired by the writer who shall settle these points to the entire satisfaction of the learned world.

Besides the change which is effected by the Spring in our standard amusements, several recreations peculiar to the season, arise during its progress. I cannot but reckon amongst these the exhibition of the spring fashions in the windows of drapers, milliners, bonnet-makers, and hair-dressers. I am willing to give due value to the pleasure which may be derived from the appearance of Spring in the country, but I will appeal to the majority of your fair readers, whether they ever received half that delight from grass and flowers, and the songs of birds, in rural retirement, which they have felt in looking at the newest patterns, and trying on the most fashionable shapes, during a morning’s ramble through the shops in St. Ann’s-Square?

In speaking of Spring in the town, it would be unpardonable to forget either the pancakes which are the peculiar treat of this season; or the valentines full of bleeding hearts, true love-knots, sprawling cupids, and doggerel rhymes, which are distributed in all quarters, and produce throughout the town such an agreeable flutter. Neither ought I to overlook the gaieties of May-day, or the antics of the Morrice dancers, or the equestrian performances of those adventurous young men who, at this season, escape from the desk or the counter, and, with a most praiseworthy disregard of their personal safety, exhibit themselves on horseback, to the general amusement of all who behold them.—But I perceive that my paper is nearly filled; and as I have perhaps already exceeded your customary limits, I shall reserve what I have to remark on these, and other particulars connected with the subject, to another opportunity; warning you, however, that, if the weather proves fine, the amusements of the season may leave me little time or inclination for writing letters, in which case it will be some weeks at least, before you hear again from,

Sir, your humble Servant,

BARTHOLOMEW BLOSSOM.

March 4, 1823.

ALBERT MONTGOMERY.

A TALE.

Farewell, cried I, taking my friend for the last time by the hand, farewell, do not forget me; I felt the grasp of his hand tighten as I pronounced the words; he spoke not, but I felt, that had he uttered volumes, I could not have been more moved—farewell murmured I again, as I tore myself away, and mounting my horse began my melancholy journey. It was November, and the hoarse wind blew long and dismally as I journeyed over the barren moor of ———, I had travelled for some time lost in anxious thought, ere a stumble of my horse which almost threw me to the ground, brought me to recollection; what was my surprise on discovering that I had lost the road! When I had left it I knew not; nor had I a single idea whither I had wandered; the moon was in her wane and by her small flickering light, I perceived I was not many yards from a wood, which spread itself like a dark cloud along the horizon. To endeavour to recover my lost way by the uncertain light of the moon, I considered would be unavailing—what then was I to do? At this moment a light like the rays of a lamp caught my eye, it came from a rude built hut at the edge of the wood. Thither I proceeded, and dismounted; the door was half open; uncertain who might be the inhabitant, I resolved to be cautious. As I drew nearer, I heard some one in prayer, and the name of Eliza breathed in every line, convinced me that I had nothing to fear. I walked directly to the door; never shall I forget the scene which was developed before me; the room was filled with rude furniture, yet clean; in the middle was a small table on which stood the lamp, and by this table knelt the owner of the cottage. His long white hairs which fell around his shoulders, and his lengthened beard proclaimed his age; his hands were clasped upon his breast; and his pale eyes, raised to heaven, held communion with their God! For worlds I would not have broken the pause,—in this posture he remained a few moments, then, with a sigh, arose; I now knocked at the door, is any one there, said the old man; a stranger who has lost his way begs shelter for the night, I replied, will you receive him father?—he had opened the door while I was speaking, and now stood on the threshold, the faint beams of the moon played on his snow-white hairs as he bade me welcome;—thou shalt rest and partake of what I have, but thou wilt find no dainties in this hut, my son. The bleak wind of the moor, said I, will convert even the coarsest food into delicacies. I now threw off my cloak and hat. Have you travelled far, asked the hermit (for so I found afterwards he was called)—I told him from whence; and thy name? Albert Fitaroy;—and thy father's name is Edmund, cried he breathlessly; it is;—but, good father, what can thus distress you? (he had burst into tears)—Thou askest me why I weep?—thy father I loved,—'twas not the friendship of a day; thy voice brought a remembrance of times long past—I am old, and feeble, and tears will flow now when the heart is wounded; I knew the time when—but he will know my story when I tell my name, murmured he,—didst thou never hear of Albert Montgomery? I recollect, I answered, asking my father why I was called Albert?—I had once a dear friend of that name, he replied, and he is dead. The tear started in the Hermit's eye, he looked mournfully on me for some time; then exclaimed, if you love your father ask him that question no more; I vowed my intention of observance. Then he knows not my tale, poor Edmund—but we shall meet again. Albert, I love thee for thy father's sake; wouldst thou hear my story? Oh father, cried I, if to relate past sorrows will not wound your bosom afresh.—To me, my son, the griefs which rend this heart are ever present—there is a voice which renews them in the day, and there is a form which at eve—I am guilty, he exclaimed,—but, I have suffered;—Again his eyes were raised to heaven, as if from thence alone he expected peace. But, thou shalt hear my story:—“My mother died ere I could be sensible of her loss, I was the only offspring, the only comfort, left my widowed parent; and, for my sake alone, he wish'd to live!—I was his child, his companion, his dearest friend. He seemed to have no joy when separated from me, and his whole time was devoted to my bodily and mental improvement. Thus we lived till I arrived at manhood; till then my love was his, unshared, undivided. One night, returning from our usual stroll, we were alarmed by a shriek which echoed across the lawn, and presently a horse galloped furiously along the road, on which sat a lady whom I expected every moment would be precipitated and dashed to pieces; at the imminent risk of my life I rushed forward, and fortunately seized the bridle; the lady by the shock was thrown into my arms, while the horse proceeded with the swiftness of lightning. Never did I look upon one so lovely,—her fine brown hair played in graceful ringlets over a bosom fair as heaven; her cheek, although pale from terror, looked beautiful as the rose! Never shall I forget the moment, when blushing she thanked me for her life; there was magic in the sound, I could have listened to it for ever. She added, that whilst riding in company with her father and her cousin, her horse, on the flight of some birds, took flight; it was her father who shrieked, fearful that by following he should make the horse still more wild;—to you, Sir, he owes that he is still a father! The gentlemen now came up and loaded me with thanks—her cousin was your father, Albert! After this we were never separated—that hour commenced a friendship which will never be forgotten—a love which can only fade when I shall breathe no more. One evening we had strolled along the road where first I saw her—this road, Albert, said she, do you remember our dangers? Remember them!—I had never told my love, but now upon that spot where first we met, I spoke with all a lover's eloquence; she heard, she whispered back her maiden vows and I was blest—oh conceive my transport—loved by her I adored! I was in Elysium!—but fleet, fleet are the hours of bliss!—the following morn I received a letter in words of friendship, bidding me beware lest I should prove the dupe of Eliza.—“Watch well your bride that is to be; it would gild me to the soul, to see one I repeat clasp to his breast a flower on which the bee has rested. Look to your friend, Montgomery; he, like the fruit with fair outside, is rotten at the core? You'll ask if I'm a friend, or if 'tis friendship's part to wound you with a tale like this?—I answer, yes! 'tis better that your bosom now be torn, than that you should live to infamy and dishonour!”—Is this my Eliza, I exclaimed,—and have I a perfidious rival! Stabbed to the soul—I lived but for revenge. With prying eye I watched her slightest movements. The friendship between your father and Eliza seemed to me to be no other than love, and I wondered that I had never before marked what now appeared so clear. I slept not; my nights were spent in plots of deep revenge.—“give me a time just heaven and to his heart my wrongs shall speak”—the time arrived. One evening when I had wandered amid the moss grown ruins of E—Abbey, as was my wont in many a happier hour—words met my ear, my name was repeated,—'twas Eliza's voice, and a man in low accents made reply!—my bosom swelled: a pillar concealed me—I drew my poniard—my wrongs nerved my arm—my rival was within my reach—my brain grew wild—I struck the blow, and he fell writhing at my feet! A shriek of agony burst from Eliza's lips—I stood rivetted to the spot, and lost to myself and to the world, till the low moans of my victim reached my ear—Oh horror! it was my father! Distraction seized me—I dropt by his side and implored heaven to hurl lightnings on my accursed head. He took my hand, raised his eyes to Heaven, he seemed to speak—no sound escaped him—his arm wound insensibly round my neck, I felt his kiss upon my lips—I watched those eyes I loved dear as my soul, close for ever—his form stiffened in my arms—my brain turned, and I fell senseless on his corpse! But I awoke—awoke to thought and madness. I am a murderer, I cried,—I am a murderer, echoed along the walls! Eliza lay senseless; I have killed thee too!—oh, I loved ye!—to adoration loved ye—and I have murdered ye! A distant hallo pierced the still air, I kissed those lips dead, which oft had blest me living; I cast a look upon Eliza and fled a blasted, an accursed being. The night passed in torments such as hell can only parallel—often I had raised the blade yet reeking with a parent's blood; I follow thee, I cried, my father! But, methought I heard his voice whisper—Live my son, and we may meet again! Yes, my father! 'twas thy peace-whispering voice which spread a calm upon my soul, and held my uplifted arm! The next day I fled from my native home for ever. I purchased a hermit's dress which completed my disguise, and in this hat formed by my own hands I have dwelt for fifty years. One night (since which nearly twenty tedious years have passed away) 'twas in Autumn, the hoarse wind blew its dreary blast across the heath, the rain poured down in torrents, and the loud thunder shook the quivering earth with reiterated peals—I thought that mid the strife of elements I heard voices high in contention, a pause ensued,—a groan as if the last of some poor dying wretch broke on my listening ear—snatching my lamp, I hurried to the spot from whence the groan proceeded; stretched on the earth, and lifeless to all appearance, a sufferer lay; I raised him in my arms and bore him to my hut, he had fainted but the movement revived him. The rays of my lamp fell on his face and form, they were far from prepossessing; his long black hair fell in rude elf locks over his shoulders; his bushy eye-brows, and dark lowering eye—his wild disordered dress covered with blood and soil, seemed to bespeak one of a ruthless banditti. Give me water, he cried; eternal curses seize them—I am murdered! He tore open his vest and exhibited a wound which witnessed to the truth: Look here old man, can your grey hairs find out a salve for this, or am I (and his gaunt frame trembled as he spoke), ere the moon shall rise—to die! I shook my head. Speak, he shrieked out; say, that in a few short hours I shall be like tainted carrion on the earth—tell me that my soul will sink to hell and torture! He dashed his clenched hand against his forehead, and fell grovelling to the ground.—In a few minutes he became more calm, but dismay still sat upon his features, and showed the powerful working of his guilty mind. I prayed by his side—scorn sat upon his lip and his scowling eye lit with a savage glow, as seizing my hand he said—“I've heard you, now you hear me—and speak of hope to devils! “My birth was noble, my fortune splendid, my youth past in scenes of drunkenness, debauchery, and guilt. Could such a mind feel love? It did and loved to madness!—my love was scorned!—even to this hour it shakes me, I learnt the cause, a rival held the heart I sighed to gain. I asked his character from the world, 'twas amiable; it could not be blackened; burning with rage and grief, I penned a letter, said that his love was false, and as a cheated, laughed-at dupe; I made so artful, so plausible a tale, that he believed me. Intent on his revenge, damned chance, he embroiled his hands in the blood of his father—and broke for ever the heart, the innocent adoring heart of his bride!—He fled.” Then she was true—say that she was spotless, and I'll forgive thee; say that she was true, and I will bless thee! A death-like groan burst from his lips; “I am dying,” he moaned, “Eliza was pure as angels are; I leagued myself with villains, we quarrelled, and they murdered me—vilest of traitors. Forgiveness? ask forgiveness? crawl on the earth and kneel for pardon? No!—come, curse me; those forms I see are come to hush my soul with torments: O, horror!—she there, who I betrayed and poisoned—thy child too? I killed him not; he died—died in his cradle—who brought him here to damn me?—his blood still wet?—and so long past—ah, whip me furies with your serpent fangs—coil around and thrust your poisoned darts into my soul!—but, take, oh take away that child!” His eyes rolled furiously—his hair stood erect—his frame shook with terror, and with a shriek of agony and a tremendous struggle he expired. I buried him beneath the shade of the broad oak—the night raven oft makes it her abode and screams wild and mournfully o'er his grave. I am now old and feeble, and I bless God my journey is so near its close.”

Thus ended the old man his tale of sorrows. Years have past, and the long grass now waves over the lone grave of the hermit—there is a soothing balm in solitude, and often when the stars shed their faint rays and the wild blast whistles across the plain—with lonely step I bend my way to the churchyard.—“No eye will weep for me,” he exclaimed, when last we parted. Yes, victim of passion! there is one who will shed a tear for thee, one whose bosom will heave a sigh to the remembrance of thy misfortunes! but thou art happy; thy expiation is complete—on earth thou wast forgiven, and “the recording angel” has blotted from his book thy past errors, and in the regions of the blessed thou art once more restored to the bosom of those who but lived to give forgiveness!

LINES ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG LADY.

Emma! It once was said by Pope,
(No harm in quoting him, I hope)
“Most women have no characters at all;”
But, though exceptions may be few,
All readily admit that you
Within the happy number justly fall.
Surely, in gentle womankind
Virtues and graces we may find
Enough to call forth all the poet's skill;
But when your sex I wish to praise,
This Pope—ill-natured fellow! says,
“Woman's at best a contradiction still.”
Ladies there are, it is most true—
Perhaps exceptions these, like you—
Who wit with judgment join, O union rare!
Whilst others always in the extreme
Of ever-varying humours, seem
“For ever in a passion or a prayer.”
I own it seems quite strange to me,
That those who perfect else might be
To spoil their charms so foolishly endeavour;
More circumspect at least are they
Who fewer wide extremes betray,
“Content to dwell in decencies for ever.”
Now, Emma! is our poet right—
Or does he only utter spite—
The point's important—tell me—ay or nay?
He says—(you surely are believed)
Two passions the whole sex divide,
“The love of pleasure and the love of sway.”
Nay more—for poets will go on
When once a favourite theme upon,
However involved in controversial strife—
That man, good-nature'd creatures all!
Take thankfully what'er befall—
“But every lady would be queen for life.”

A thousand graces surely pay
For this your loathsomeness to obey,
And for usurped prerogative alone:
Or, woe to husbands! they shall rue
Their bridal hour, if he be true,
"A woman's seen in private life alone."

Yes—though at home resolved to reign,
Man's just dominion you restrain:
By woman's love what wrong's not more than paid?
For though more faults we there decry,
Searching with less impassioned eye,
"Your virtues open fountains in the shade."

'Tis there the female heart is found
With all that's kindly to abound,
There all its inborn loveliness displays:
Sheds gladness on the social hour,
And when it most exerts its power,
"Charms by accepting, by submitting sways."

Brama! for you who never kneel
At folly's shrine, nor ever felt
A wish from para domestic joys to stray;
Whose temper never ruffled seen,
But always placid and serene,
"Can make tomorrow cheerful as to-day."

May every earthly comfort meet
To make joy's office complete,
And no rude gale of fortune overthrow it—
Still grateful to o'er-ruling fate,
Which, vexing some with rank and state,
"To you gave sense, good-humour, and a poet."

THE KING OF PERSIA'S FEMALE GUARDS.

(From the London Magazine.)

Every one has heard, or every one may have heard, that his Majesty the King of Persia has eight hundred wives, or ladies, in his harem, and that every other man in the country has as many as he can keep, and more than he can manage. European husbands, who have only one, and yet find it difficult enough at times to be masters in their own houses, can hardly imagine the straits their eastern brethren in matrimony are sometimes driven to by thus multiplying their domestic blessings. A man can with little propriety, in this country, talk of his rib, or his better half; he is the mere stem of a cluster of dates—a poor dry stick, surrounded and weighed down with rich ripe fruit. Yet he must endeavour to subdue the inveterate animosities of interested rivals, and contrive to preserve some order amidst the discordance of the divided wives of his bosom (peace and quiet he never hopes for). As this must absolutely be effected by his own exertions, it being indecent even to name his wife or wives to a neighbour, or to ask his advice or assistance under any circumstances; the science of managing one's own family has long been the favourite pursuit, and intricate study, of the most learned philosophers and able diplomatists. Many are the schemes, good and bad, to effect this great purpose, which have been proposed, adopted, and rejected in their turn. The last, and perhaps one of the best, is that devised, and at present actually practised, by the Moolah Alaverdi, of the Ibrahim Mosque. It is concise, simple, and, as far as it goes, tolerably efficacious; but it is extremely limited in its action. It consists in hanging up a small whip, with a whistle-attached, to the right hand door-post of the ladies' apartment. When the venerable Moolah enters, he unhooks his whip, and first gives a neat distinct whistle, which immediately assembles the ladies around him; as the pipe of the shepherd collects together his dispersed flock. He then lays the whip smartly over the back of the first, or head wife, and continues to apply a similar discipline to every one present, till each has received her portion, strictly observing the regular order of precedence and rank, and carefully avoiding all partiality, by giving out his whole strength to each blow. He has hitherto invariably found himself respected, loved, and obeyed at the conclusion of the ceremony by his affectionate and dutiful spouses. He now boasts of his method as infallible, asserts that his theory is now confirmed and established by experiment, and that this is the true and only way to manage a family. The Moolah, like many other men, is the devoted bigot of his own system, and blind to its imperfections as a general practice, or he must feel conscious, as any impartial observer does, that it never could be applied with any advantage in a large marriage establishment. Taking his own world for it, I make no doubt that he has found it perfectly successful in his own; but the Moolah should recollect, that the discipline adequate to maintain order and regularity in the house of a parish priest, whose whole inside (as we correctly translate Haram Khonar) contains but four wives and nine concubines, would prove totally insufficient for the extended interior of a Khan, or Beyli Beggy. In the first instance, any man, endowed with ordinary strength and facility of wrist, can sufficiently illustrate the necessity of passive obedience to thirteen wives in one quarter of an hour, allowing one minute to each, and two for changing places. But—but to proceed from the fountain head, let us turn our eyes for an instant on the Brother of the Sun, our most merciful King, first Cousin to the Moon, Light of the World, and Glory of the Universe, and conceive his having to whip eight hundred wives daily. The thing is in itself impossible. His Majesty might neglect the most important of the state affairs, might abstain from all amusement and recreation, not even witness the bastinadoing of a Khan, or the bowstringing of a single Mirza exhausting his precious and celestial powers in useless efforts, and not accomplish the work to his own satisfaction in the course of one sun. The very few eunuchs attached to the court, and their inability to afford any assistance, (except by good wishes) would always leave the whole burthen on his own illustrious shoulders, and convert his Sublime Majesty into a mere carrier of raw hides.

This weighty enterprise has been regulated and conducted in a much more dignified and certain manner by his Majesty's glorious progenitors, predecessors I would say, the Crown here not being exactly hereditary in descent; indeed, our present gracious Sovereign is the first of his race who has reigned by succession. His worthy uncle, whose title he justly inherits, de-throned his master, the then reigning tyrant (all de-throned kings are fools or tyrants). They have ever wielded the sceptre with paternal solicitude, chastising their refractory subjects as a tender parent corrects his disobedient child with the rod. Within the harem is established a regular court, in exact imitation of the exterior one, with officers of state, guards, attendants, &c.—she-duplicates of all, excepting priests. As it always has been a very disputed point, whether women have souls or not, it is deemed more prudent to leave that question undetermined. The establishment of a female priesthood must be expensive, and, without any certain benefit, would tend to confirm them in their ambitious belief, that in the eyes of Providence they are equal to men; yet such is the affectionate lenity of these patriarchal rulers, that every woman asserting herself possessed of a soul is permitted the entire keeping and exercise of it for her own private advantage. To these lady-ministers and generals is entrusted the entire administration of all the interior affairs, the strictest precautions being observed to exclude all communication with the exterior. When his Majesty intends to dispel the clouds of the harem by the joy of his presence, he is conducted by his male guards to the entrance of a certain crooked narrow passage, where they are drawn up to present their parting homage. When the darkness of night falls upon the eyes of the exterior, by the setting of the sun into the afore-mentioned crooked passage, he dawns forth resplendent from the little door at the other end, to enliven with the radiance of his countenance the day of the interior. He is there received by his attendant female goulams and feraches, (or cut-throats) who conduct him through the assembled ministers to the numnah or carpet of state, where he seats himself to administer (first calling for his calcoon or pipe) impartial and severe justice to his faithful female subjects.

One of these trials, or courts-martial, (for the offender, it seems, was a military lady) has lately come to my own knowledge; how, I need not explain. I was always inquisitive, and liked to have a friend at court. As the proceedings are rather singular, and in some measure illustrate the interior economy of the royal household, they may not, altogether, be unacceptable to a European reader. I shall therefore transcribe them, deferring to another occasion my further animadversions and objections to the Moolah Alaverdi's plan, as entirely inapplicable to large insides.

I shall omit the Persian titles of Serang, Sultan,

&c. and adopt, as near as may be, the corresponding terms in English, as more intelligible.

The court being solemnly assembled, seated, and served with pipes and coffee, the charges were brought forward and read aloud by the secretary, Minikin, with all the emphasis of nasal monotony of which the language is so peculiarly susceptible.

The indictment, or accusation, is against Ensign Chubby, of the sweetmeat battalion, and is divided into three separate charges of misdemeanour.

First, for most improper, indecent, disorderly behaviour in the public bazaar; having walked across the same without a veil, contrary to all military discipline, and the strict decorum of deportment absolutely imposed on all officers of the rank of Ensign Chubby.

Secondly, for unofficer and unlady-like conduct, totally subversive of all military discipline, in wantonly and cruelly wounding Corporal Dimple; and in using indelicate language to Major Rosebud, of the laundry department, an officer of irreproachable reputation, undeniable virtue, and mother of a large family by a lawful husband, from whose violent temper and cruel stick the Major had every thing to fear, had this scandalous imputation reached his ears.

Thirdly, that, in consequence of certain suspicions excited by the frequent absence of Ensign Chubby from duty, without assigning sufficient cause, a jury of discreet matronly officers had been appointed to examine the case; who, after the most careful investigation, report the aforesaid ensign to be some months advanced in a state, utterly unbecoming the character of a single officer and girl of honour.

Upon the first charge, it was clearly proved, by the testimonies of Captains Sloe-eye and Beauty, confirmed by Sergeant Languish, that on Thursday, the 6th of last moon, at or about the first hour, after calling mid-day prayers, Ensign Chubby walked twice across the jeweller's bazaar, with a veil immediately arranged, and only partially covering the face with one corner of it; two-thirds of the nose, at least, and one eye of the said ensign, being absolutely exposed to the public gaze. Moreover, that on turning the corner, just by the shawl-mender's stall, leading to Hassan Ali Mirza's, the said Ensign stopped, and familiarly conversed, full five minutes, with a He Sergeant of the Sheganhies, then quartered in town, or passing through. The facts being clearly proved, the guilt of the Ensign was fully established.

Upon the second charge, the following facts were advanced, and most distinctly proved by a number of reputable witnesses. The respectable Major, whose superior knowledge and skill in all kinds of needle work is undisputed and admired by the whole corps, was kindly giving some instructions, how to cut out six chemises to the greatest advantage from a piece of Indian muslin, to Corporal Dimple, who had undertaken to make and embroider them down the front, with the new Isphahan pattern, for the lady Fatima. Ensign Chubby entered the chamber, and commenced conversation so as to bring a blush into the cheeks of every young soldier present. The Ensign continued in the same strain for a considerable period; at the same time throwing on one side the scissors; wilfully burning a thread paper of green silk; at last, heating the Major's beat chased silver thimble in the mangal, and privately and maliciously replacing it at the moment that the honest corporal looked out a superfine needle to backstitch the left hand gusset of the second chemise. A horrid wound was inflicted upon the sewing finger of the unfortunate corporal; the celebrated Bandinjon cataplasm was speedily provided, and applied by the active exertions of the party; but unfortunately without that happy success which so frequently attends the operation of this far-famed remedy. The suffering object of this diabolical joke remains yet incapable of duty, civil or military; and, in consequence, the lady Fatima is deprived of the advantages of clean linen. No superior officer could witness such outrageous conduct without giving a reprimand to the offender, which, although couched in perfectly genteel and lady-like language, provoked a most sippant reply. Finally, that the scandalous tongue of the aforesaid Ensign dared, in the presence of numerous witnesses, to contaminate the pure name of the virtuous Major with an odious appellation.

To the third charge, the person of the Ensign bore efficient testimony of guilt. Accordingly, the court found the prisoner guilty on all and each of the accusations; and, without hesitation, unanimously declared their verdict. The president, Colonel Simper, of the kitchen guard, a chaste maiden officer, advanced in years, after a most delicate and pathetic discourse on the loveliness of virtue, in which the spotless purity of conduct requisite to embellish the character of a young soldier was finely illustrated, pronounced the sentence of the court:—That Ensign Chubby, of the sweetmeat battalion, be degraded to the rank of a common soldier, and rendered incapable of ever again bearing a commission. The court, in the mean time, to prevent disgrace to the corps, will take care to provide a husband suitable to the present rank of the late Ensign.

In consequence of this trial, the following general orders have been issued and enforced through the whole harem. That no officer capable of bearing children shall presume to frequent the bazaars, markets, or other public places, without being attended by a reputable old woman. It is also highly recommended to young officers to wear the Indian corsets, for the better preservation of their shapes.

The practice of soldiers suckling their children on parade, having introduced various and considerable disorders in the discipline requisite for all good troops, male and female; the same is strictly forbidden from this day. Nevertheless, the king of kings ever careful of the well-being of his army, condescends, in his excellent bounty, to grant one hundred and eighty days leave of absence to all soldiers seven moons gone with child, for the purpose of being confined, and suckling the said child during its tenderest infancy; provided always that the same be lawfully begotten in wedlock, and that no disparagement be brought upon the corps by its birth.

TRANSLATION FROM CATULLUS

CATULLUS TO LESBIA.

Nolla potest mulier tantum, &c.
Let woman boast,—the boast is vain,
That she is loved as much as I,
My Lesbia, love the silken chain,
Which binds me to thy destiny.
For in the love, which I did pledge,
There was a faith not often found;
And in the vows, which I alliged,
Did constancy and truth abound.
Though I was constant, yet hast thou
Believed the tale which slanderers told;
And left me faithless, mourning now,
O'er broken vows, and slighting cold.
And thus, my Lesbia has thy mind
Been fed away, and done me wrong;
Though 'twas the right it ought to find,
It lost itself a maze among.
And now I cannot wish thee well,
Though virtue be in every deed;
Nor can I lover's thoughts repel,
Though you to every fault succeed.

SONG.

Oh! Love is like the spring flower,
Which boasts no dazzling dress;
But blooms in solitary bowers,
Array'd in loveliness.
And love is like the spring flower,
Which sheds a breath around,
More sweet, when adverse skies do lour
And beat it to the ground.
And love is like the spring flower,
When wintry blasts assail;
It bends beneath the tempest's power,
The sport of every gale.
And love is like the spring flower,
Wak'd by some sunny ray,
It blossoms ere its woe'd hour,
And sinks into decay.
And love is like the spring flower,
When brighter skies illumine;
Then beauty claims it for her dower,
Within her breast to bloom.
And love is like the spring flower,
Which even there will fade;
And when Love fades with youth, no power
Can raise its drooping head.
But if like many a spring flower,
Its sweets when dead remain,
In peace, and joy shall pass each hour,
And age those sweets attain.

TO THE EVENING STAR.

Bright star of eve! how sweetly dost thou smile
Upon the flowers which sleep beneath thy beam
This summer night: oft does this hour beguile
The cares of day; no more do sorrows stream
Upon the heart, which, worn by grief and toil
A respite finds beneath thy glancing ray;
For rapt on thy beauty, sleeps the while
Each anxious thought, that haunts the breast by day.
To thee I raise my humble vesper song:
Mother of love! I own thy gentle sway;
Oh grant me thus life's stream to pass along,
Thou the companion of its toilsome way;
And many an hour of peaceful rest, may I
In years to come, beneath thy beams enjoy.

LETTER FROM WATTY.

I am glad to see the improving style of your Paper. You do things better than you had used to do, which is a proof that you are following the advice I have occasionally given you. I left you a long while to your own devices and wilfulness, for I thought you were dead to my instructions: but I find now that you are one of those prudent fellows, who wait to go along with opportunity, and who will neither run after nor before her. Well, well, you are right, and I suppose I was in the wrong, though it goes against the grain to confess so much.

However, that Poetry page was a sad bore, it is certain, and I did not think you could get without it too soon. Iris was like an ill made plum pudding, such as I have seen, where the raisins had all fallen together into a nook. Not that I think your poetry was ever particularly good, that is, not of as much consequence to your Paper as the fruit is to the dumpling. You began better this year. The distribution has a neat effect, and subtracts something from your ancient resemblance to a Pot-House Chronicle, the 'British Muse,' or 'Sprigs of Parnassus,' choking a whole column with their musty sweetmeats. The general character of your verses too, is better than formerly: 'The Romaunt of Llewelllyn,' though on the whole it was hungry-looking stuff, (being about as unoriginal and pedantick as — I cannot stop for a simile) had a glimpse or two of genuine feeling not quite sunk in the darkness of copyism. The author, I should opine, cannot always have inhaled the cottony particles of your atmosphere. Why don't you continue it? Then the 'Beauties of the English Poets.' But those really were not so good: all hum, I assure you. How could you think of taking a judgment upon English Poetry from such a half-starved, Frenchman-like-looking, name as Eustace de St. Clere? However, the thing had an air with it, and was perhaps in the better fashion of make-believe criticism, in spite of the bookish, unnatural fust about nature 'and that concern.'

So you have begun of reviewing; and very prettily you manage it considering. 'Considering what?' you will say. Considering that you are only beginners:—you will improve yet, take my word for it; and here's some advice in your ear; don't be so straight forward in your detail; run in a circle and use cant enough. I'm up to it.

It was a silly trick of you giving that extra half sheet. Your Paper is big enough in all conscience, if people could know when to be satisfied. If matter accumulate on your hands, (which I am pleased to hear it does) beat out the chaff better, or if you give more charge more. I see no reason for squandering your profits in the prodigality of gratis appendages. None of your readers would give you the remaining twopence half-penny of their sixpence, because they might have it to spare.

I continue sending 'The Club,' but if you've had enough of it tell me. I know you won't refuse it, so long as I think proper to give it you, and as it costs me no trouble, I may never know when to stop. I'll tell you how I do it. I lay a sheet of paper (foolscap size) on my writing desk, and place it before an Automaton doll, that I have invented for the purpose, who instantly commences scribbling at a furious rate. The pen, from long habit (for it is the same 'The Club,' has been written with from the beginning) turns off its periods in rapid succession, and I have nothing to attend to but regulating the length of the article, which I do by the winding up of the machine; and as I took especial heed never to suffer thought to have any thing to do in the composition of the papers, the mere mechanical part of it was easily acquired by my pen, which I flatter myself can produce as pretty a specimen of that amiable reading, designated by Hamlet 'words, words, words,' as any man needs to desire.

You have rather a prosing correspondent, who signs himself S. X. whose articles contain a deal of information, though of somewhat too pedagogical a kind. I always read them, however, which is saying as much for them as I can, for they must be something more than tolerable to meet with such attention from me. I had always a liking for nick-nackeris of knowledge, and (will you believe it?) I read Sir Richard Phillips' 'Hundred Wonders,' from the beginning to the end. I made a note of the fact, in red ink, at the end of the volume, and Sir Richard will publish it as an additional wonder in the next edition of the book.

You seem to have many correspondents in Liverpool, though, I must say, the saltiness of the air they breathe finds none of its savour in their writings. Yet, don't think I despise them by any means: (and once for all let me tell you, I am giving my 'worst of thoughts the worst of words' in every point I touch upon) I don't think, take them altogether, they're a bad race of writers. A little too much of the deek and stool about them, that's all, and I can fancy their manuscripts are replete with long-tailed, well-rounded, flourishing capitals, and that they make the prettiest small figures imaginable. It would be invidious to say which I think is the best of them; but I tell you candidly, I hate the Conceitrick for its very name's sake. There's something contract in the notion of it, and no true genius would adopt it. 'Let me have liberty withal, as large a charter as the wind for so — (fill the space to your liking) have.' Let me be free, unfettered, eccentrick, sailing round the world of thought, and ballooning in the regions of fancy, I may hit upon a discovery sometimes, and when I do, let America fix what name to it he choose, mankind will remember Columbus.

ON BENEVOLENCE, THE CURE OF DISEASE, AND THE MEANS OF PRESERVING HEALTH.

"As it is evident that every human being is sent into this world for some wise and benevolent purpose; and as it is also evident that every rational creature, of mature age, is endowed with a power of being useful to his fellow-creatures, I think it would not be as unprofitable question, were we occasionally to ask ourselves, 'Of what use can I be to society this day!'

"If we make as ingenuous an answer as its importance demand, would it not be after this manner?—I can bestow a superfluous garment to assist in clothing the naked, I can give a portion of my bread to feed the hungry, I can send some cordial to him that is fainting, I can supply the poor widow with her winter's fuel, or I can instruct the ignorant, direct the unwary youth how to tread the dangerous path of life with safety and honour, and in a variety of ways lend assistance to the young, the aged, the feeble, and unfortunate. We shall find this employment the most effectual means of escaping from the disgust and languor of a consuming indolence, of imbuing our minds with pleasant and peaceful thoughts, and of cultivating a cordial goodwill and a generous benevolence to the whole human race. We shall be less disposed to lend an ear to the suggestions of pride, resentment, ill-humour, slander, censoriousness, or any moral defilement, that derogates from the dignity of man. If we thus act in unison with the honest suggestions of our minds, and attentively consider the great power we have of preventing evil, and relieving distress, and the moral degradation we incur from passing our lives in indolence and sloth, and by this means lay the foundation of vicious habits, how speedily should we be sensible of a very pleasing change in the rational and moral world? We should behold the countenance of the broken-hearted beaming with contentment; we should find the interior of the poor much more orderly, cleanly, and comfortable, their manners improved, their habits more industrious, and a variety of indisposition, arising from filth, intemperance, idleness, and disorderly practices, banished. We should find the sum of our happy moments increased, and society at large would be the gainers."

The writer then proceeds by recommending simplicity of diet; he quotes experiments from Dr. Adair to show that duck or goose is less digestible than any other food; and from Drs. Hoffman, Young, Pye, Reynolds, Lyberkin, and Hunter, he shows the salutary effect of milk diet in cases of gont, dysentery, consumption, and diseases of the stomach. Cures of indigestion by a simple diet of beef and mutton; and several instances of restoration to health and vigour effected by vegetable food, and even by mere abstinence from sauces, wines, and strong liquors are given from Rush, Tissot, Engel, Parmentier, Mackenzie, and Priestley. The impropriety of giving wine to children is stated as follows:—

"A late ingenious surgeon gave to one of his children a full glass of sherry every day after dinner for a week; the child was then five years of age, and had never been accustomed to wine: to another child, nearly of the same age, and under similar circumstances, he gave a large china orange for the same space of time; at the end of the week he found a very material difference. In the first, the pulse was quickened, and the heat increased, while the second had every appearance that indicated high health. He then reversed the experiment: to the first-mentioned child he gave the orange, and to the other the wine; the effects followed as before described;—a striking and demonstrative proof of the pernicious effects of vinous liquors on the constitutions of children in full health."

We conclude our abridgment of "J. O.'s" interesting letter, which has been kindly handed to us by Mr. Kaye of Liverpool, with the following extract:—"Dr. Mackenzie directs this simple and easy method of preventing impendent disease, frequently practised with good success, viz. that when a person finds himself indisposed, to go directly to bed, and there lie for one, two, or three days, until his complaints are removed, living all the while on water-gruel, or panado, for food, and on water or small negus, or white-wine whey, for drink. The gruel or panado may be made more or less substantial, according to circumstances. Though some may deride the simplicity of this prescription, they will find, where such food agrees with the stomach, and time can be spared to make the experiment, it will prove more beneficial than they imagine. The Dr. adds, 'I have often been told by a lady of quality, where circumstances obliged her to be a good economist, and where prudence and temperance preserved her health and senses to a great age, that she had kept herself out of the hands of the faculty many years by this simple regimen.'"

MATHEMATICS.

MATHEMATICAL PLAGIARISMS DETECTED.

MR. EDITOR.—In the Iris No. 41 you have inserted a "Question No. 52, by Philomathe;" this, Sir, is incorrect; the same question was proposed in the Ladies' Diary of 1769, by Mr. W. Spicer; for Philomathe, we must read, therefore, Mr. W. Spicer.

You have also in the Iris No. 44 inserted a very neat solution to this question, which you say is by "Mr. W. M. Lawrie, Schoolmaster, at Hulme." This, too, is incorrect, for in the Ladies' Diary of 1770, I find literally the same solution to the same question, by Dr. Charles Hutton; for "Mr. W. M. Lawrie, Schoolmaster, at Hulme," we ought, therefore, to read Dr. Charles Hutton.

The discovery of these errata reminds me very forcibly of a Fable which I recollect, when a lad at school, used to afford me much amusement. I allude to the fable of the "Jackdaw in borrowed feathers." Do you think, Sir, that your mathematical correspondents, Philomathe, and Mr. W. M. Lawrie, ever read the fable? I would persuade myself they have not, for if they had, I think that the poor Jackdaw stripped of his borrowed plumage, would have appeared to them so perfectly ridiculous and contemptible, as ever to deter them from turning Jackdaws themselves, or, indeed, from playing tricks that would be likely at any time to place them in a similar situation.

Yours, MUTA.

N.B. To assist me in my Mathematical researches, I have recently been presented with copies of the Ladies' Diary, for many years back. These will probably enable me to make further discoveries, if they do, you shall hear from me again.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM.

(THE AIR WRITTEN FOR THE IRIS.)

Andante.

And I—a melancholy, single man—
Retired to mourn my solitary fate.—
I slept awhile; but o'er my slumbers ran
The sylph-like image of my blushing Kate.

I dreamt of mutual love and Hymen's joys,
Of happy moments and connubial blisses,
And when I thought of little girls and boys,
The mother's glances and the infants' kisses.

I saw them all, in sweet perspective, sitting
In winter's eve around a blazing fire,
The children playing and the mother knitting,
Or fondly gazing on the happy sire.

The scene was changed.—In came the Baker's bill:
I stared to see the hideous consumption
Of pies and puddings, that it took to fill
The bellies of the rising generation.

There was no end to eating—legs of mutton
Were vanquished daily by this little host;
To see them, you'd have thought each tiny glutton
Had laid a wager who could eat the most.

[See note to Readers, page 84.]

The massy pudding smoked upon the platter,
The pond'rous sirloin rear'd its head in vain,
The little urohins kick'd up such a clatter,
That scarce a remnant e'er appeared again.

Then came the School bill: Board and Education
So much per annum; but the extras mounted
To nearly twice the primal stipulation,
And every little bagatelle was counted:

To mending tucks.—A new Homeri Ilias.—
A pane of glass.—Repairing coat and breeches.—
A slate and pencil.—Binding old Virgilins.—
Drawing a tooth.—An opening draught and leeches.

And now I languished for the single state,
The social glass, the horse and chaise on Sunday,
The jaunt to Windsor with my sweetheart Kate,
And curs'd again the weekly bills of Monday.

Here Kate began to scold,—I stamp and swore,
The kittens squeak, the children loudly scream;
And thus awaking with the wild uproar,
I thank'd my stars that it was but a dream.

EXTRACTS, ETC.

BONAPARTE, TALLEYRAND, AND LORD WHITWORTH.

The following is a translation of Bonaparte's instructions to Talleyrand:—

"I received your letter at Malmesbury. I desire that the conference" (with Lord Whitworth) may not turn into talk—put on an air, cold, high, and even a little haughty.

"If the (British) note contains the word ultimatum, observe to him that this word includes the word war—that such a style of negotiation is that of a superior towards an inferior. If the note does not contain that word, make him put it in, by observing to him, that we must know clearly and finally what we are about—that we are tired of this state of anxiety—that never shall they obtain from us what they obtained during the last years of the Bourbons—that we are no longer the same people who submitted to have an (English) commissary at Dunkirk—that if the ultimatum be postponed all will be broken off.

"Frighten him on the consequences of the postponement.

"If you cannot shake him, accompany him through the outward room, and just when you are about to quit him say—'But the Cape and the island of Gorée, have they been evacuated?' (which he knew they had).

"Soften a little towards the end of the conference, and invite him to see you again before he writes to his court, 'in order that you may tell him the impression it has made upon me, which may be diminished by the assurance of the evacuation of the Cape and Gorée.'"

"This would not be the place to make any historical

* This relates to the conference of the 20th of April, 1803. It will be seen, in the papers laid before Parliament, that Lord Whitworth baffled Bonaparte's trick, by not delivering any note, and by confining himself to a verbal explanation of his former communications.

observations on this very important document as connected with the rupture with France in 1803, nor shall we attempt to decide how far diplomacy may justify such tricks as the above paper prescribes. The Chancellor Segurier said, two hundred years ago, "Qu'il y avoit deux sortes de conscience—l'une d'état, qu'il falloit accommoder a la necessité des affaires: Pautre a nos actions particulieres." But under any circumstances a person who thinks himself justified in practising such falsehood and duplicity, has no right to charge such errors, in the grossest language, on two persons, one of whom was the instrument, and the other the object, of his own intended fraud.—Q. Rev.

PORTRAIT OF A GRECIAN DOCTOR.—"His riding dress can scarcely be imagined without a drawing; but I have seldom seen a more grotesque figure than his, when he set out for the town of Leondari on that journey. His hat was not unlike that of a capuchin with a slouched brim, but the crown had a broad silk hat-band and large steel-buckle. His hair, which had not been untied for months behind, showed that several attempts had been made to comb it, which had only succeeded in tearing out or breaking off locks which originally belonged to the queue. He wore a large and long robe of cloth, which once had been sky-blue, lined with thick fur, with a broad cape of the same. Under this was a tunic of dark colours to conceal the dirt, also reaching to the ground; beneath this, again, were other dresses altogether invisible, but forming a prodigious mass of inconvenient appendances, which when prepared for a journey were all thrust together,—fur, pelisse, tunic, and all the rest into a tremendous pair of Turkish trowsers, composed of many yards of light-blue cloth, which being sewed together between the legs, as all Turkish trowsers are, in spite of an essay in one of the English newspapers to prove the contrary, were so much forced upwards by the saddle, that several inches of septennial cloth stockings were visible, between them and a huge pair of Turkish jack-boots which had once been black.—St. W. Gaz.

HORSEMANSHIP OF THE GUANCHES.

From his youth the Guanche is nursed in ideas of independence and activity. The exercise which he loves best is riding; and he piques himself on his skill in breaking in his steed. The plains through which he wanders feed an immense quantity of horses and wild mules. Along with the favorite weapon, fathers give their sons lessons of skill and intrepidity. Mounted on their well-trained coursers, they dart on a troop of wild horses, the lupo is thrown, and one is caught; the others gallop off, and the captive, full of impatience, turns to recover his liberty, which is lost for ever. The Guanche is already dismounted; whirling another lupo round him, which serves to strengthen the first, and throws it with skill round the legs of the captive, who falls, and must bear his conqueror. Without stirrups or bridle, merely with spurs and words of command, the Guanche masters the impatient animal, which paws the ground and darts away like a flash of lightning. He soon stops; indignant at his burden, he prances and rolls in the dust, and the Guanche rolls along with him. Deceived in his expectation, he gets up fiercely, darts off again, and feels the merciless spur, till he is quite furious. He stops again, and looks round for some danger, to terrify his adversary; he hastens to it, traverses rocks, clears precipices, and swims the streams. At length, worn out with fatigue, he falls, and submits to the bridle. But it is not enough that he becomes obedient, and transports his master from one country to another: he must also brave the same dangers with him, and second him in his boldest attacks.

Almost every animal takes to flight at the mere sight of a tiger; and his appearance has something in it peculiarly terrific to the horse. Yet is this animal here brought to look his foe in the face, and not to run off till a certain signal is given.

The Guanche sets out without the smallest supply of provisions; immense barren plains are before him, which only produce a few stalks, that serve for the nourishment of cattle. When the Guanche is hungry, he seeks after, and soon finds, innumerable herds of wild horses; he catches one of these animals, throws him down, cuts off a piece of his flesh with a knife, and restores him to liberty. He quenches his thirst at a spring; and then begins his chase after wild beasts. He calls aloud for them, and spurs on his horse towards the monster he intends for a victim. The hoarse roar of the tiger is heard,—there he stands and a terrible combat begins. It is not force, but skill, which conquers. The Guanche whirling his lupo; he speaks, he calls aloud, he is ready for his enemy. His terrible enemy, with his belly almost touching the ground, is astonished to see any being awaiting his approach, and provoking him; his eyes roll furiously, he opens his vast jaws still red with the blood of his last victim; and, indignant at finding an opponent, he seeks with his eye for the place on which he means to spring. The Guanche is all the time tranquil, firm, and prudent, governing his astonished, but obedient courser with his feet; he makes him retreat without turning his face from the tiger, who follows him step by step watching for a false movement. The Guanche knows this; he makes his horse rear; the tiger darts forward and is caught; the horse springs away on his hind legs with all his power, dragging the ferocious beast after him. The Guanche turns round at times; and if his lupo has caught only the neck, he flings a second, which binds his legs; he is now the conqueror. He dismounts, arms himself with two knives from his boots, and his victim expires. Having finished his day's work, he returns to Mount Video, sells the skin of the animal he has killed; caresses his horse, and hastens to seek new danger.

You may easily suppose, however skilful these astonishing people may be, that the irregular springs of such an enemy as the tiger, may often enable him to escape the lupo, and compel the Guanche to engage in another species of combat more dangerous than the former. In such cases the horse plays the principal part, though the man makes the attack. When it happens that the lupo has missed, which I can assure you is very seldom, the Guanche arms himself with his two knives, and defends himself very courageously. The horse sees the danger of his master, and in place of galloping off, presents his chest to the enemy. He knows that if he turns away he will have no defender. His blood flows, but his courage never for one minute fails; he knows also that his master will not forsake him. If the tiger, exhausted by fatigue allows the horseman a single moment's respite, it is all over with him; the lupo, which is always ready at the saddle-bow is again laid hold of; and for a Guanche twice to miss his aim, is almost unexampled.—Arago.

THE PRINCE DE CONDE.—The Prince de Condé acquired reputation in his youth.—Instances were related of his courageous behaviour, at the battle of Ardenbeck, in the seven years war. It was said that on being requested to remove ten paces to the left, in order to avoid the fire of a battery, which was making horrid slaughter by his side, he replied to M. de Turenne, I find none of these precautions in the history of the Great Condé.

He afterwards distinguished himself at the battle of Minden, in 1759, charging the enemy at the head of his reserve, over a piece of meadow, strewn with the bodies of officers of the gendarmes and carabiniers. His talents displayed themselves to still greater advantage when he had a separate body of troops under his command, with which he gained several advantages over the Prince of Brunswick. Louis XV. in way of reward, gave him the enemy's cannon; and the Prince of Brunswick, afterwards visiting him at Chantilly, and not finding the guns there, the Prince de Condé having had them removed out of sight, said, You were determined to conquer me twice—in war by your arms, and by your forbearance in peace. The battle of Johannesburg carried his reputation to its height alone, for with an inferior reserve, he gained a complete victory over Prince Ferdinand. He held his council of war in the midst of a fire of musketry, and remained master of the field of battle.—Med. Campan.

DR. FRANKLIN AT THE FRENCH COURT.—Franklin appeared at court in the dress of an American cultivator. His straight unpowdered hair, his round hat, his brown cloth coat, formed a contrast with the laced and embroidered coats, and the powdered and perfumed heads of the courtiers of Versailles. This novelty turned the enthusiastic heads of the French women. Elegant entertainments were given to Doctor Franklin, who, to the reputation of a most skilful philosopher, added the patriotic virtues which had invested him with the noble character of an apostle of liberty. I was present at one of these entertainments, when the most beautiful woman out of three hundred was selected to place a crown of laurels upon the white head of the American philosopher, and two kisses upon his cheeks. Even in the palace of Versailles, Franklin's medalion was sold under the king's eyes, in the exhibition of Sevres porcelain.

When the news of his (Franklin's) death arrived in Paris, in 1790, a society of printers met in an apartment of the Cordeliers convent, to celebrate a funeral festival in honour of the American philosopher. His bust was elevated upon a column in the middle of the room. Upon the head was placed a civic crown: below the bust were compositors' cases, a press, and other emblems of the art, which the sage had cultivated. While one printer was pronouncing an eulogium upon Franklin, workmen were printing it, and the speech composed and pulled off as fast as uttered, was copiously distributed among the spectators brought together by this entertainment.—Med. Campan.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

CAPTAIN PARRY'S EXPEDITION.

A contradiction of the account in our last Number relative to this interesting Expedition has appeared in several of the daily papers; but as we have heard nothing from any official authority on the subject, we are inclined to place confidence in the reports which reached us, and which were derived from a source than which there is none better entitled to credit in the Kingdom. From the language which we employed in communicating the intelligence, it must have been evident that the facts stated were vouched with some degree of doubt, though we very naturally fell into the sanguine and gratifying hopes they were so well calculated to excite. If in this we have run any risk of causing severe disappointment to the relations and friends of our gallant Countrymen engaged in the arduous service, we can only say that our own disappointment will be equally bitter; but one of the contradictions, insinuating that our motive was cruel towards these parties, is unworthy of any answer. We are not in the habit of inserting the slightest matters without as far as possible investigating their truth, and had we not had good grounds for the statement in question, we should not have ventured to publish it. We know not what reason may exist elsewhere for concealing or keeping back the news.—Lit. Gaz.

PROSPECTS OF CAPTAIN PARRY.

An interesting paper has been read to the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle, on the probable situation, condition, and prospects of Captain Parry, and his brave fellow-adventurers, an inquiry surely not ill-timed at a season to us of joy and festivity, to them of dreariness and darkness. "It shewed the probability of their having succeeded in getting a passage through some inlet in the N.W. of Hudson's Bay, since, if this had not been the case, they would have returned, or at least been heard of. If they should have got beyond the Copper Mine River the first summer, it is a subject of hope rather than expectation, that they may have passed Mackenzie's and pushed through Behring's Straits, in which case we may expect intelligence very soon. But in this case, probably Franklin would have heard of them.—Or they may have been taken short by the climate before reaching the Pacific, and are now passing a second winter on this side of Behring's Straits;—still a fair hope may be entertained of their ultimate safety; but it may be the end of this year or the spring of the next, before we hear of them.—Or, thirdly, they may not have been able to find a passage to the Pacific; and then the question is, can they get back to the Atlantic before the open weather closes; or have they the means of passing a third Polar winter? Various presumptions are in favour of this.—But on a fourth, not improbable, supposition, of damage to the ships, or deficiency of, or injury to the resources, or sickness, disabling from exertion, their situation must indeed be wretched; and what ought the country, in contemplation even of its possibility, to do? First, to despatch directions to the governors of Canada, Hudson's Bay, and the North-West Company, directing them to equip different parties of natives, with proper supplies, to go in search, by the Copper Mine and Mackenzie's River, and other routes, with a security of being rewarded at any rate, and munificently in case of success. Secondly, that two or three small vessels be sent in different directions. Thirdly, that the Davis Straits ships be encouraged to sail a fortnight or more before the usual time, and explore the coast before they come to the fishing ground." Accounts have reached England since the above was read, via Russia, that two vessels answering to those of the expedition, had been seen by some Russian Colonists off Icy Cape. If so, the ships are now on their return by the Pacific Ocean.

FINE ARTS.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

BY B. R. HAYDON.

With the most perfect sincerity do we congratulate Mr. Haydon on having accomplished the FINEST PICTURE which his pencil has yet executed. We hope that we shall have to say of him, what Reynolds said of Rembrandt:—that 'his genius expands with his canvass.' The picture measures 22 feet by 15; and there is not a portion of it but what is appropriately occupied. We shall endeavour to describe this picture, and to tell our tale in as few words as possible.

Nearly about the centre of the composition stands the Saviour of the world. The words, 'LAZARUS, COME FORTH,' have passed his lips, and he waits in tranquil and confident expectation of the fulfilment of his command. His countenance, which is in profile, is calm, sweet, and godlike: a small bright glory incircles his head; above which, his right hand is raised, as if accompanying, or following, the words just uttered! His drapery is well disposed, and of a subdued tint, in French grey and crimson. You look for Lazarus, in the direction of our Saviour's eyes, and you absolutely start—as you see him in the corner of the picture—erect—with opened eyes of astonishment—his grave-clothes flung from off his head and breast—and his attention intensely fixed on the Power that had raised him from the dust. There is a very unusual, preternatural, ghost-like air, about this figure of Lazarus, which not only differs from all those of him which we have seen, but which we think singularly powerful, and appropriate. It has been usual with many of the old masters to occupy half their canvass with an ugly common-place object of an excavation of the earth, meant for a grave. Mr. H. has nothing of the kind. It is the occupier of the grave, and not the grave itself, which he wishes the spectator to behold. Two grave-diggers, however, of muscular forms, and starting back with amazement bordering on horror, occupy the foreground very successfully; and tell the tale as well as if we saw the excavation full 'eight feet deep.' Nor is the raised figure busied in disentangling himself from his bandages and cords, as in the famous picture of Sebastian del Piombo—with which, if report speaks true,* Mr. H.'s performance will probably some come in competition; but it obtrudes just sufficient to convince us that the GREAT MIRACLE has been accomplished, and that the raised Lazarus is not less sensible of it than the surrounding spectators.

Of these 'surrounding spectators' we could say a good deal more than our present limits admit of. Among them, the father and mother of Lazarus are particularly conspicuous—in fine character, and full of expression; and are among the finest parts of colouring in the picture. The head of the father is full of nature. Below them is Mary, the sister of the recently deceased. She is utterly absorbed in grief; and has not yet gazed on her restored brother. In the foreground, before our Saviour, is the figure of MARTHA, kneeling, with extended arms, and a handkerchief in her right hand. But we submit, either that the body and head are too large, or that the arm—particularly the right—is too small. And we would further observe, that the handkerchief appears of rather too modern a shape or character. There is one figure in the piece, above Martha—that of ST. JOHN—which is not only the finest in the composition, but perhaps one of the very finest in the modern school of painting. This tender-hearted disciple is, apparently lost between devotion to his master, and astonishment at the miracle just wrought. His whole figure, especially his countenance and clasped hands, are indicative of an intensity of feeling. We never noticed any thing finer; and the colouring is worthy of the drawing. Above, are two well-known Judaical characters—a pharisee and a sadducee, with phylacteries on their foreheads. The reluctant admission of the miracle performed is finely delineated in their countenances. To the right, is a most beautifully drawn and coloured head of a young woman, with a cinerary vase on her head, apparently copied from the Portland vase. Above, is a fine figure of a youth pointing with both arms, as it were, to the object of the miracle; and turning his head over his left shoulder, with an earnest entreaty of expression in his countenance, for his companions to come and witness the miraculous scene. Again, by the side of this youth, and a little above him, is a remarkably well conceived and coloured figure of a man, kneeling on a wall, in the act of prayer, in perfect rapture and astonishment at what has taken place. Several figures, to the left of him, half seen, scrambling over the same wall, denote the prevalence of the same feeling.

The back ground is a scene of temples and buildings near Jerusalem, irradiated by the partial gleams of light, which seem to dart along the picture from a passing thunder-storm. We do not pretend to have described all the principal figures in this very fine performance; but after observing, in addition, that the colouring throughout is sober, and yet glowing; after passing an unqualified commendation on the ochres and dark greens, which keep down the more radiant hues—and after expressing our intire conviction that the story is better told than we have ever yet seen it told—we beg to congratulate both Mr. H. and the public on this very fine acquisition to the BRITISH SCHOOL OF PAINTING. We do indeed sincerely hope, that no ungovernable prejudices on the one hand, and no precipitate, ill-judged encomiums on the other, may intercept the free exercise of every man's opinion, who has eyes to see, and a heart to feel. And we say, in conclusion, with the characters engaged in the transaction, 'COME AND SEE' for, of all the miracles performed by our blessed Saviour, this was one of the most solemn in its procedure, and most astonishing in its results. It was the type of his OWN AWFUL FATE.—Museum.

CORRESPONDENCE.

COBBETT'S GRAMMAR.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I see that my query on Cobbett's English Grammar, which you were so kind as to insert, has been answered in the last number of your Miscellany by one of your Correspondents; and, though much obliged to him for his candid opinion, I hope he will not be displeased at my giving proper reasons for not agreeing with him on the sentence in question. B. seems somewhat dissatisfied at my not being more "explicit" with respect to my doubts; in answer to this, I say that I did not consider it at all necessary, as my object was to know if the word "work" should be repeated in the same sentence, as it appeared there was only one verb; and by expressing it as I did, I could not suppose any person to be ignorant of my meaning. However, it has given B. an opportunity of introducing a part of the sentence to which I did not advert: but immediately after he comes to the point; and says that, a "work" being at so great a distance, he saw no great impropriety in the verbs being repeated. In answer to this I beg leave to say that how distant soever the nominative case and verb be, or how numerous soever the intervening clauses be, the same nominative case should not be repeated to the same verb: for "non scribitur Canibus," we are not to suppose that any person acquainted even with the rudiments of syntax would be at a loss to find the nominative case to "deserves." But repeating it is contrary to rule, therefore it is wrong. B. next says that "the two nominative cases may be easily reconciled on the grammatical principle of two words being put in apposition; here I would inform him that the same word was never put in apposition with itself; for by apposition is meant, that affinity which is between two different words, each pertaining to the same person or thing, and is so binding that it will admit of no variation of case: thus, "Cicero the greatest orator of the age;" we say that the word "orator" is put in apposition with "Cicero." But according to B.'s reasoning we could say, "Cicero" the greatest "Cicero" of the age; this requires no contradiction, as the impropriety of it is palpable.

It now of course devolves on me to answer B.'s query. He questions as to the correctness of the sentence "Your Majesty who is the only one." I say it is strictly correct; however, in order to be as explicit as possible, I shall answer his queries one by one. "Your Majesty who is the only one." Query, "of what person is 'your Majesty'?" I say it is the 3rd person. Q. Does the relative who agree with Majesty as its antecedent? I answer yes. Q. In that case of what gender is Majesty? I answer of the feminine. Q. How so, as "Majesty" cannot properly be called masculine or feminine? I give it gender by a figure of speech.* Q. Is that conformable to rule or custom? In answer to this I will give you the words of an author: "Yes: and it has been justly regarded as a great advantage in our language: we can whenever our subject will justify it, transform into masculine or feminine, nouns, which are strictly speaking neuter; and thus by giving the functions of life to inanimate objects enliven and elevate our style, and give to our expressions great additional dignity and force." There now remains one point more to be cleared with regard to the relative. B. says "and in that case should not the relative be which?" By making the relative "which" it must have "Majesty" as an inanimate thing for its antecedent, and of course of the neuter gender; and then the word Majesty as an inanimate thing "can be the only one that appears to have justly estimated the value of the people." I need not waste any time in proving the inconsistency of such language, as I am inclined to think that B. himself will find that I have been clear enough; observing however that "Your Majesty who are the only one" would be equally as correct as that in question.

With much respect I remain your's

REPOSITORY OF GENIUS.

"And justly the Wise-man thus preach'd to us all,—

"Despise not the value of things that are small."—
Old Ballad.

[The pronoun me, in the following lively and ingenious composition is printed with a capital, because it partakes, in some measure, of the nature of a proper name,—being the representative of the Subject of the Riddle,—one of the longest certainly, and perhaps one of the best Riddles that ever was composed.—Indeed it scarcely deserves the name of a Riddle, as the veil is so thin, and the features so prominent, that the Answer is discoverable on the first glance. As a mere Riddle, its length alone would be objectionable; but in the way of description, it might still admit of extension.—S. X.]

A RIDDLE,

BY A LADY.

Ladies, I your attention claim,
Nor doubt but soon you'll know my name;
And if my presence you're possessing,
You scarce need ask another blessing.
I am not power, I am not wealth,
Nor joy, nor innocence, nor health;
I'm not a husband, nor a wife,
(By some esteem'd the sweets of life);
Love I have known, but often fly,
The moment he approaches nigh.
I am not Hope,—Hope oft beguiles,
Smiles, and deceives you as she smiles;
But I, a friend, sincere and warm,
Profess no more than I perform.
I'm not Religion, but depend
On her, as on my dearest friend;
And have the privilege and honour
Still to attend and wait upon her.
Nor Cheerfulness herself am I,
Though of the self-same family;
You often see Us hand in hand,
Perhaps you'll fancy that content
By this description must be meant;
But no;—'tis said Content will dwell
With the lone hermit in his cell;
But should you seek for Me, I fear,
You would not often find me there.
The beggar, on his bed of straw,
From sloth itself content will draw;
In rags and dirt will sit and sing,
As blithe and merry as a king;
But I ne'er came within his hut,—
I hate a squalid and a slut;
And as for rags and dirt, I ne'er
In them did ever yet appear.
England's my birth-place,—'tis averr'd
No foreign language knows the word;
And English travellers declare,
I cannot live in foreign air!

* We allude to the renowned sale of the Gallery of Pictures of the late J. J. Angerstein, Esq.

But English travellers are nice,
And this, you'll say is prejudice;
Yet foreigners themselves have found
My native soil is English ground.

But I fear you grow weary; and so for your pleasure,
To finish my story, I'll alter my measure.

With a cheerful Old Maid, who, well pleas'd and contented
Has refus'd some good offers, yet never repented,
I oft am an inmate; on her I attend,
But am not so much the Old Bachelor's friend;
Since he frequently finds, if the truth be will own,
Man never was meant to enjoy me alone.
The truth is I'm shy, and on others depend,
Before I am fix'd as a permanent friend;
Must have all things neat and convenient about me,
Or else you'll soon find you must e'en live without me.
For instance,—in winter I always require
A hearth that's clean swept, and a good blazing fire.
At night, a warm room, with an excellent bed,
Beside some soft pillows to solace my head;
With a daily supply of good drink and good meat,
For I cannot exist where there's nothing to eat;
Yet I'm no epicure;—although I must own,
I would rather each day have two dishes than one.
But this as you please; I shall never contend,
For if you are happy—it answers my end.

But beside all these requisites, mentioned to you,
There are others,—and those of more consequence too;
Things which you must either possess or provide,
Before you can have me with you to reside:
Good sense, in the first place, I cannot omit,
Although I can live very well without wit;
But as for good temper, if ever she dies,
Be certain the full better half of Me flies.
With Jealousy, Envy, and low-minded Pride,
I cannot,—'tis not in my nature,—abide;
But Hatred and Malice, Contention and Spite,
If e'er they come near Me, will kill Me outright.
In fine, would you have Me, with all my perfections,
You must cherish good-will and the social affections;
Attend to my wants, and remember my threats,—
Preserve a clear conscience, and pay all your debts.

We understand that Miss Hammersley has concluded

Garden. Mr. Brown also leaves us for the Theatre-
Royal Drury Lane; and, during the Liverpool season,
Mr. Salter is engaged for the Theatre-Royal Birmingham.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

BALL DRESS.—Round dress of amber coloured crape, a puckering of gauze of the same colour at the border, finished by rouleaux, wadded very full of white satin, with full blown white roses, and a few leaves of green foliage: under each rose is an antique ornament of the rosace kind, composed of white satin, with a tuft of amber in the interior. The body of this beautiful dress is of satin, and is elegantly diversified by white silk cordon and fine blond; the front of the bust is finished by a narrow falling tucker of blond; and the shoulders ornamented by bows of white satin ribbon. The sleeves are white, and are trimmed to correspond with the skirt, except that the flowers are left out; they are finished by the rouleaux in points, with the rosaces in the centre of the sleeve, encircling the arm. The hair is arranged a la Sappho; and round the Lesbian braid at the back part of the head is placed a wreath of full blown roses and laurel leaves. The earrings and necklace are of fine pearls; the ear-pendants superbly set.

EVENING DRESS.—Dress of Urling's Patent Lace over a slip of lilac coloured satin. Three French tucks of white satin, falling one over the other, are placed at the edge of the border.
These are surmounted by a rich festoon trimming of white crape, consisting of full puffs, each festoon headed by an Astatic diadem, divided by pearls, which gives a most splendid effect to this truly novel and unique kind of trimming. The body and sleeves are elegantly simple, the former having only a slight ornament of fine lace round the bust, with a few puffs of lilac satin; the sleeves are very short, not full, and are bound tight round the arm with a broad band of satin.

WALKING DRESS.—A deep amethyst-colour silk pelisse of gras de Naples, wadded, and lined with pink sarsnet; a little wrapt and fastened down the front with hooks and eyes: corsage, made plain and high, ornamented with tasselled chevronnelles: circular projecting collar of velvet, of a deeper hue, than the silk; two rows of velvet are placed down the front and round the bottom of the skirt: sleeves nearly to fit, with velvet cuff, and full epaulette, intersected with velvet straps.

Ruff of Buckinghamshire lace; cap of the same, fastened under the chin with button and loop. Bonnet of the same silk as the pelisse, bound with broad velvet, and lined with pink satin:
the front bent a la Marie Stuart; the crown surrounded with inverted conical rouleaux of velvet, equi-distant, commencing with a silk knot: plume of ostrich feathers of a bright amethyst colour, placed on the right side, and falling low on the left shoulder.

VARIETIES.

MISTAKEN CIVILITY.—A gentleman mistaking a very small lady,—who was picking her way over a dirty channel,—for a very young one, snatched her up in his arms, and landed her in safety on the other side, when she indignantly turned up a face expressive of the anger of fifty winters, and demanded why he dared to take such a liberty. "Oh! I humbly beg your pardon," (said the gentleman,) "I have only one amends to make;" and he again caught her up, and placed her where he had first found her.

GANGANELLI (POPE CLEMENT XIV.) AND VOL-TAIRE.—In the course of an interview which an English gentleman had with the Pope at Rome, the latter inquired of the former the route he had come, which inquiry introduced his mentioning that he had visited Voltaire at Ferney, and indeed had charge of a message from that philosopher to his holiness. If he would be pleased to permit him, he would deliver it in the words in which he had received it. The gentleman said, that Voltaire had charged him with his very best respects to his holiness, and requested, as a great favour, that he would send him the eyes and ears of his Inquisitor-General. "Ah!" replied his holiness, "the old man has a mind to be pleasant; and, sir, if you return the same way, be pleased to deliver to him my best respects, and assure him, if it had been practicable, I would readily have obliged him; but the inquisitor-general of Rome has had neither eyes nor ears since Ganganelli has been pope."

BUTTON-HOLES.—A grave-digger, having buried a
Mr. Button, sent the following curious bill to his executors:—

"To making a Button-hole.....3s."

On reading this, one of them exclaimed,

O sun! O moon! and ye celestial poles!
Are graves then dwindled into Button-holes!

DR. JENNER.—The medical men of Gloucestershire have had a meeting for the purpose of promoting measures in honour of the late Dr. Jenner. It is proposed to erect a monument to his memory in, or near, the city of Gloucester.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.—We understand that several valuable papers of this celebrated mathematician are in the possession of Lord Portsmouth, who has intrusted them to Dr. Latham for the purpose of publication.

PARACHUTE ROCKET.—On Friday night week a newly-invented rocket was let off on Chatham lines, in the presence of the officers of the garrison, of a very peculiar and curious construction. After rising a considerable height in the air, it explodes, when a parachute, contained in the head of the rocket, is separated from it and suddenly expands, which has, depending from it, a fire-ball of considerable magnitude, which gives a most powerful light, illuminating the country for nearly a mile round. The parachute prevents the ball from descending to the earth, over which it hovers like a satellite. The rocket is intended to show the position and movements of an enemy's army, or any body of troops, by night.—Maidstone Gazette.

EPIGRAMS.

How D. D. swaggers, M. D. rolls!
I dab them both a brace of noddies:
Old D. D. has the Cure of souls,
And M. D. has the Cure of bodies.

Between them both, what treatment rare
Our souls and bodies must endure,
One has the Cure without the Cure,
And one the Cure without the Cure.

To Flavia's shrine two suitors run
And woo the fair at once:
A needy fortune-hunter one,
And one a wealthy dunce.

How, thus twin-courted, she'll behave
Depends upon this rule:
If she's a fool she'll wed the knave,
And if a knave the fool.

My thrifty spouse, her taste to please,
With rival dames at auctions vies;
She doats on every thing she sees,
And every thing she doats on buys.

I with her taste am quite enchanted;
Such costly wars, so wisely sought!
Bought, because they may be wanted;
Wanted, because they may be bought.

TO OUR READERS.

The Readers of the Iris will perceive from the "Bachelor's Dream," (our Compositor's initiatory lesson) that we are now prepared to redeem our promise presenting them with "an occasional treat."

A quantity of MUSIC TYPE having been CAST in London, at considerable expense, EXPRESSLY
FOR THE IRIS, we shall introduce a new feature, without infringing upon any other department of our publication,—by frequently giving TWO to FOUR EXTRA PAGES of ORIGINAL or SELECT
MUSIC.

In our Literary career, it has ever been our wish to elicit talent, and to foster unassuming merit; to correct taste by liberal strictures; and, for our general readers, to combine a select variety of amusing and instructive subjects. We can, in a very great measure assume, that our efforts have not been unsuccessful; and the pleasure we derive from this consideration, with the reliance we have on the same discerning Public, induces us cheerfully to submit to the present additional expense, in the pleasing expectation of rendering our publication still more entertaining and useful.

To our Musical Friends who have kindly offered their services in this department of our Miscellany, the Iris, we trust, will prove a most eligible medium for conveying Specimens of Talent and Scientific Attainment.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Watty is as usual—humorous and hard to please!—Why, in the name of common sense, should he object to the originality, or want of originality, of The Romance of Llewellyn?—
Our learned correspondent XI is seriously infatuated, and we certainly think that he should resort to defective measures.—Eustace de St. Clere might have been mistaken in his selections; but we think as a dissertator, he has given us much in a few paragraphs, as Lecturers usually comprise as many pages. Watty is generous, we have no doubt; but we are not of opinion that, because our readers will not give us an extra twopence-halfpenny, we should not study the wishes of our contributors.—We shall, on this score, be frequently open to W-y.—See Notice to Readers above.

The Romance of Llewellyn—The first part of the second Canto is received.—The difficulty of deciphering some characters, and of modernizing some parts of the style, unavoidably subjects this poem to irregularity in publication.

Mr. Gerard's humorous epistle; the Wearied Bachelor; R. T. on Peevishness, &c.; Juvenis on Death; J. W. to Mary;
J. A. Parnell; and Clio—are received.

An Eton Scholar's Lines have too close an affinity to "The Bachelor's Rejoinder."

J. W.'s Lines to Mary are susceptible of much improvement.
Edmund and Ann is not a plausible fiction; it is also ungrammatical, and devoid of melody.

Our Oxford-Street correspondent should prefer his complaint to the Managers of our Theatre. We, however, think that the removal of the evil stated is impracticable.

THE LIVERPOOL CONCENTRIC FRIENDS.

No. III.

All the Home Members being assembled at six o'clock, the

was entered, and, after the reading and approval of sundry communications from Friend Nol, a discussion took place upon a paper entitled—"Observations addressed to the Editors of the Public Journals upon the present mode of procuring bodies for the Schools of Anatomy."

The Human Dissectors have had many queries put to them, all of which, it appears, they decline answering; and we must still receive—instead of dispassionate sound argument, a string of interrogatories that pre-suppose us to be fully acquainted with all the arcana of surgery and medicine. The absolute right of having bodies procured, is assumed, without a single illustration of the necessity of dissection; and the ridiculous notion is foisted upon society, that, because a fracture or injury now and then occurs which renders amputation necessary, we must all, forsooth, consent to have the Burial Grounds robbed of the remains we instinctively regard, nay venerate—and all this for the purpose of supplying each student with a perfect, an entire body for dissection,—although, not one of these in every 500, will, when in practice, ever be adequate to, or have occasion for effecting amputations. But, the Dissectors' argumentative queries shall be put, and distinctly replied to.—

"Will these gentlemen [the Editors of the Public Journals] point out how Anatomy, and consequently Surgery, are to be taught without dissections?"

Now, that a Professor should call upon opponents to advocate his system—upon mere tyros to demonstrate the accuracy of his peculiar views—and upon those who demand particular arguments, to accede to the truth and positive necessity of his general assumptions—is, to say the best, somewhat paradoxical, and savours strongly of weakness, if not of sophistry.—But, in this way alone can human dissection be defended!

"Do they [Editors] expect an honourable and enlightened body of men to acquiesce in sentiments, and act upon them, to the subversion of their own profession, and of the science and practice of Surgery?"

That men should subvert sentiments, however dis-"honourable" and impious, by which they obtain an easy and affluent support, can hardly be expected. Nor can even "honourable and enlightened" dissectors suppose that mere egotism should cant an enlightened public out of reason and nature, and into an acquiescence with a contemptible jargon of the benefits it derives from—unsupported assertion.

"Is it not already melancholy enough in its effects upon the Surgeon, and in its consequences to Society, that the supply of bodies is not to be obtained but by bringing him in contact with, and compelling him as it were to employ, a set of wretches, who, by the VERY ACT, are rendered fitter for every species of Plunder, and Devastation, and Violence, and Murder?"

Here is, indeed, work for the Legislature; has there been such a declaration ever before made to the world? It must also strike every reader how careful the Dissector is to identify himself with the entire body of Surgeons!

"Will these gentlemen, [Editors] who are at the same time so fond of giving publicity to the transaction, and so suppliant in their invectives against it, point out some better mode by which bodies may be obtained, and thus insure to themselves the gratitude of the Surgeons more than of any other class of men?"

Surgeon and Surgeons, are irrelevant in all these sophisms, they should be expunged, and Dissector and Dissectors substituted. Surely "the honourable and enlightened body of" Dissectors ought not to be such monopolists of gratitude—let the Editors put merchants, tradesmen, and shopkeepers, in possession of a good trading commodity, or material, and without expense, and unquestionably, the latter will prove equally as grateful as the above "honourable and enlightened!"

"Do they [Editors] wish that Surgery should no longer be taught in this country—that its study and improvement should not keep pace with the advancement of the other arts and sciences—and that we should retrograde to those ages of ignorance, when our fellow-creatures were to be tortured with dressings of scalding oil, or subjected to all the horrors of the actual cautery for the stopping a bleeding vessel?"

Surgery cannot retrograde! The human body has been microscopically investigated, and, every part, not only fully described in words, but accurately delineated by the engraver, and most faithfully represented by the modeller. The words of a corresponding member are quite to the point:—"Why have Munros, Bells, Hunters, furnished such elaborate and exact representations from many thousand dissections, if these dissections can never be superseded by plates, models, or museums? Were they, with Boerhaave, Haller, Cowper, Cheselden, Albinus, and others, urged on in these terrible investigations, by purely an insatiable propensity? Or, did they act the part of nefarious impostors, in professing, that pursuits and labours would prove useful to society, which were only calculated to enrich themselves? It is, indeed, a poor museum that does not contain subjects which are sufficient to convey as much, and as accurate, information to the student, as he can possibly obtain from the actual dissection of a human body, in which, from putrefaction, there is a general dissolution of continuity. Mr. A.

would do well to consider this:—he should also fully and unequivocally explain what benefit can possibly result to society from an actual dissection of the trunk or extremities, every bone, muscle, gland, nerve, artery, and vein, nay, almost every fibre and particle of which may be now correctly shewn in plates, models, and natural and artificial subjects? Why should not lectures upon those parts be confined to these mediums? Were all the burial grounds and all the hospitals in Europe open to Resurrection Men and Lecturers, could they possibly ascertain more than that muscles, nerves, veins, &c. answer such and such purposes? Can they hope to explain the cause of muscular motion? to identify the active principle of nerves, or the nature of sensibility?"

"What are the people, on whose minds this pregnant mischief [the effort to abolish human dissection] is intended to operate? Chiefly the poor; the ignorant, and the unprotected!—Those very men for whose benefit our Dispensaries and Hospitals are founded,—who of all men are most exposed to external injury, and therefore of all men are most to be benefited by the improvement of Surgery—the Soldier and Sailor, whose station subjects them to every wound and violence which the human frame is capable of receiving! Good God! is it men like these, who stand in the hourly need of our services, that are to have their feelings excited?"

This is as false as it is fulsome, and as impious as false. For injuries amongst the lower orders generally, let us take Manchester as an example. Perambulate the streets of that town; visit its extensive manufactories (in which there are surely all the necessary facilities for the confusion of limbs); and sum up the number of those who have undergone amputation. Inquire next what proportion of these have been operated upon in the public Hospital, and then divide the remainder amongst the entire number of medical practitioners, and declare whether one living subject will fall to the lot of each Surgeon in the course of a dozen generations!! On inquiry amongst the sailors in our own town, we are at a still greater loss to account for the temerity of this contemptible sophist. What "wound or violence," that requires surgical aid do they acknowledge themselves peculiarly subject to? With soldiers, and the navy it is otherwise; but what situation furnishes the best treatise on gun-shot wounds? The Dissecting Room or the Field? The Anatomical Theatre or the Cockpit? Or how many of the students of Mr. Abernethy, of Mr. Brooke, or of any other of the Anatomical Lecturers, can, on receiving a military or naval appointment, proceed in the discharge of his professional duties, without further instruction? That there are many who do—soldiers and sailors can painfully demonstrate;—but, that there are great pains taken to initiate young Medical Officers into the duties of Hospitals, &c. may be readily ascertained at any of the principal depots.

Soldiers and sailors are seldom amongst their relatives; when deceased their mortal remains lie wholly under the controul of the medical officers; and these persons may and do examine them till curiosity is fully satisfied; when the parts all receive christian burial. Thus military and naval medical men, are, subsequently to their appointment, qualified in their respective departments, and soldiers and sailors seldom, scarcely ever, require the assistance of civil practitioners.

Now then, seeing the false assumption of the writer of the "Observations," what shall we say of his indignant exclamation? What shall we say of Human Dissection after hearing this, its audacious advocate? Is it really necessary? Society must decide. Yes, every individual must consider the subject, and determine how he shall resolve. Efforts are making to seduce the public writers; the New Monthly and others have already shown their liberality by affecting to despise the instinctive feelings of humanity; and a general bias in the same track is what is wished for. Hear the Abettor of Resurrection Men, declare his own views;—"All that I at present wish, is to secure a more rational view of the subject, and MORE FRIENDLY CO-OPERATION on the part of the EDITORS of the Newspapers."—i. e. He wishes to sound the public so as to obtain the liberty of transforming seats of benevolence into schools of pr fit. In conclusion, it may not be extraneous to inquire—What is to be expected from the dissections insisted upon? Are the Lecturers themselves intent over every subject? Or, do they merely endeavour to explain to their pupils what is already very well known? Unquestionably the latter is the real case; and all that they ever look for, or ever expect, is, now and then a solitary preternatural discovery which they add to their collections as a curiosity—but not as a matter that can ever benefit one in MILLIONS of persons.

EPISTLE TO ———, MANCHESTER.

(FROM A SCHOOLFELLOW OF LORD BYRON'S.)

DEAR SIR,

I sent you twenty stanzas in my last—
And therefore owe you nothing—on that score.
And now the breaking of the ice is past,
I am about to "challenge twenty more;"
And "kill them too" (providing that thou hast
Patience to read—like Bobadil of yore
I'll challenge them by twenties—run them thro',
And when they're finish'd, salt, and send them you—

Now twenty verses, are one hundred lines
And sixty—what a deal for me to spin—
In such dull days too—when the sun scarce shines
As many minutes—but I weave them in
The evening. 'Tis dark ere th' immortal dines.
To waste God's daylight so—it were a sin
So after dinner—as the lesser crime,
Rather than "rin-thier-out," I rest add rhyme.

Pity but I'd a more poetic name,
(Curse on't, I've the cognomen of a dog)*
It shoves one wonderfully on to fame.
Who would read poems written by a Hogg?
Or dream that he'd of poetry the fame?
The name would drag him back, as would a log
About his neck—(In this I'm not mistaken)
Bloomfield is better, to my taste—or Bacon!

"The Ettrick Shepherd" charms us—say why this is?
We all dance to the music of fine names—
Yea, even the Muses do—these oft sought misses.
These antiquated Heliconian dames;
'Twere time they brought their matters to a crisis
For Time the toughest of all tempers, tames.
They "stoop to conquer" as they older grow—
Cobblers and cow-herds, cau content them now—

They've got a Lord of late into their train,
And by the Lord! they give themselves such airs—
When Southey knocks—they bid him call again,
And Hunt—has more than once—been kick'd down stairs

* Ebenezer—Anglice Help.

Wordsworth, (who seldom took their names in vain)
They've sent him back—unanswer'd all his prayers—
Campbell has one in keeping—as I guess
And Rogers too—but both in idleness—

Sweet is the dawn of youth and love's bright day—
Sweet 'tis a sweet-heart's favours to obtain—
Sweet too is pleasure's rosy thornless way—
Sweet to a gamster's hearing—"seven's the main!"—
Sweet friendship's sacred barter, let me say—
Sharing each with the other joy and pain—
Sweet to a German palate is sour-cront
And sweet is sugar-candy—(that's sans doubt)

Friendship! above the rest—to thee be given
Due praise—thou art my ev'ry earthly joy—
Thou art man's foretaste bright on earth—of heav'n
God's only gift to him—without alloy—
When on life's ocean—we are tempest driv'n
Anchor and cable gone—still thou canst buoy
Our hopes—to where—when earthly friendships die—
(Your own good sense the next line can supply!)

Lord Byron talks about a "dreamless sleep,"
Uninterrupted by a single snore,
Calls Death—"the land of desolation deep"—
(And Life—a song to which there's no 'encore!')
A Night—on which no morning's dawn shall peep—
An Ocean bounded by no farther shore—
This may to him no cause of grief afford
Who all his life has liv'd—ay like a lord!

But hackney coachmen—or a galley slave
Or those who light our lamps—or black our shoes
All those who ev'n on Sundays do not shave
All vagrant Christians, and all wand'ring Jews—
And all the tribes, our charity who crave—
To this vile creed—their credence must refuse:
And oyster dredgers, justly might complain—
And wish that heaven had made them Musselmen.

(The last verse was the ninth, and this the tenth
I soon shall get on to my journey's end—
These pages are of such confounded length,
That if my muse, she will not condescend
To help me—I must trust in my own strength
And scribble on, whatever fate shall send;
'Better wear out, than rust'—a maxim true)
(When this line's finish'd, I am half-way thro'.)

If death (as he says) be a "dreamless sleep,"
We (Archy) have been dreaming all our lives
Striving to get, and when once gotten keep—
Health, wealth, and wisdom, children too and wives
We sow a field, which we are not to reap;
'Tis smothering us, when we have fill'd our hives:
It is a doctrine which I do abhor,
To say a man is no more—when he's mort.

All who are born must die. Spencean Death
With his dread scythe, does to a level bring Without distinction, all who have the breath
Of life within their nostrils—cobblers, king,
Churchman and chimney sweep, lye underneath
His sovereign sway—but this is not the thing
I meant to treat of—underneath the sod
Do we still lye, or rise to meet our God?

Mind is imperishable—well he knows
Byron who writes—"there's no returning spring
Which shall revive our ashes"—the repose
Of Hades has with him no terminating—
I wish some other subject I had chose,
For this to a conclusion I must bring;
I've beat him oft at marbles, but, ye gods!
To challenge him at rhyme, were dreadful odds.

If e'er I go to Scotland—"back again!"
(But that you'll say's a most unlikely thing
For any Scotsman—let the if remain)
I'll bring the very stone, that held the ring
On which our marbles lay—and be as vain
As if it had been trod on by a King;
If by the Lord o' the Manor I am bor'd
I'll "set him down" as an ill-manner'd Lord.

You put my last epistle in the Iris
"With all its imperfections on its head"—
And should this follow—what I would desire, is
That you revise the same; great is the need!
Of this said RAINBOW what I most admire, is
The very great diversity inquiry
Of matter it contains—but query, whether
It looks not strange, to send for fustian hither?

Poets, and Painters, (Peter Pindar says)
Should never, if they wish for fame, get fat;
If leanness constituted claim to praise
I am the immortal G—d, still for that—
But well I know that this is not the case
(I wonder what dame Fortune would be at)—
I know, indeed my knowledge is a curse
Lean is my person, lankier still, my purse.

I covet little, I am not like some
Who look with envy on a neighbour's lot
Wishing th' they'd my crust—and I their crumb
With justice you will own that I am not.
(Of their own merits, modest men are dumb)—
I only wish that I—like Walter Scott,
Could get a half a crown for every line,
O dear! what sterling merit, then were mine.

To think it should be so, how mad am I—
That brethren of the art cannot agree—
That ev'n the Royal Academy,
Is torn with envy and with jealousy—
Of all the vagrant-painting sons of Adam, I Am most averse to grumbling—Give to me
Those scenes of nature, smooth, and calm, and still
The thunders, and the tempests, take, who will.

I think the sea air, has improv'd my style
Given it a kind of piquant attic salt
For inspiration—I just walk a mile
On the sea beach—and when I make a halt
I take my tablets out—thine a muse a while (Wetting my wizen, with the juice of malt)
Then as the images pass thro' my brain
I note them down—for you to see again.

But, for the present—I'll lay down my pen
Seeing my paper draws toward an end;
And shall resume the subject once again
First time I have "anorra hour" to spend,
In sermon phrase I scarcely can refrain
From wishing that a blessing may attend
On what has now been said; and to his name
Be all the praise, who truly can lay claim.

BIOGRAPHY.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN.

(Abridged from Memoirs of the Life and Works of Sir Christopher Wren.—By James Elmes, M.R.I.A.)

Sir C. Wren was born at East Knoyl, Wilts (the rectory of his father Dr. C. Wren.) on the 20th Oct. 1632. His family produced several individuals distinguished for learning, at various periods from the time of Henry VII. Christopher being a delicate child was educated at home, till at an early age he was placed under Dr. Busby at Westminster. His genius soon began to display itself; for in 1645, when only thirteen years of age, he invented a new astronomical instrument which he dedicated in Latin, of a superior style, to his father; and also, in the same year, wrote an exercise on Physicks, and invented a pneumatic machine. Soon after this period, the Royal Society originated in private meetings, and when founded (Restoration of Charles II.) young Wren became identified with all its proceedings. Previously, however, he pursued his studies at Wadham College, Oxford, with extraordinary eclat, so as to be considered a prodigy of universal science.

His Juvenile Essay (it is justly observed) proved the fecundity, the ripeness, and the highly cultivated state of his mind; his zeal and his ardent enthusiasm in the pursuit of knowledge and literary honours.

This year, while the incipient architect of our beautiful metropolitan cathedral was cultivating the abundant soil of his natural genius, St. Peter's at Rome, its prototype and rival, was declared to the world of art as finished, under the auspices of Innocent X. and the superintendence of Bernini. This announcement of the completion of the largest and richest Christian temple in the world was an epoch in art, and was an affair of sufficient consequence to attract the attention, and secure the investigation of architectural principles by the youthful and aspiring Wren, who, more than any man, could say, Nulla dies sine linea.

Of the superiority of St. Paul's over St. Peter's, in point of mathematical construction, I shall speak in its proper place; but the completion of such a structure as St. Peter's, which was intended as the central church of the Christian world, was an affair of too much importance to the world, particularly to that of science, such as congregated about the Wrens, the Wards, the Wilkinsons, the Oughtreds of the day, the patriarchs of English science and art, not to have attracted notice and excited disquisitions.

This highly important epoch had doubtless an influence on Wren, and assisted him to accomplish St. Paul's alone, while St. Peter's was the work of more than twenty architects, supported by the treasure of the Christian world, and by the protection and under the pontificates of nineteen successive popes.

While Wren was pursuing, by sure and certain steps, his road to fame and eminence, Inigo Jones, his great predecessor and most formidable rival in architecture, died; as if to make way for his worthy successor in proper time, before he was thrust from the stage.

It would far exceed our limits to follow Mr. Elmes into the particulars of young Wren's scientific inventions and literary productions: suffice it to say, that he was eminently conspicuous in many of the greatest improvements of an age fertile in wonderful discoveries.

In 1657, he succeeded Mr. Rooke as Professor of Astronomy at Gresham College; and in 1660, the Royal Society commenced its meetings on the days, weekly, after his lectures were delivered. The Memoirs now are almost a narrative of the early progress of this Society: but Wren having been appointed Assistant Surveyor General, was soon called to more obvious public works. The theatre at Oxford, 1663, was his first public building, and the fame of its erection added largely to his celebrity. Pembroke College, Cambridge, was his next work; but even in the midst of these important concerns, he still continued devoted to his beloved philosophy.

A trip to the continent was the next important feature in the life of our immortal countryman. The attractions of Paris under the magnificent Louis XIV. were worthy of the closest investigation; and, perhaps, there never was a finer study for an English architect than France exhibited at the precise period of Sir Christopher Wren's visit. The building of the Louvre alone was a school of art. In 1666 the great fire of London seems as if providentially sent to open the widest possible field for the exercise of such a genius as London then possessed; and to call forth all the faculties of Wren.

The fire commenced on September 2, kept burning till the 8th, and on the 10th was still a heap of blazing ruins. On the 12th, Evelyn presented the king with a survey of the ruins, and a plan for a new city, with a dissertation upon it. Whereupon, after dinner, his majesty sent for him into the queen's bedchamber, her majesty and the Duke of York being the only other persons present; they examined each particular, and conversed on them for nearly an hour, and were extremely pleased with what he had conceived and delineated so promptly.

This model, or design, was soon after laid before Parliament and (though not executed)* having been preferred before those of Hooke and others, Sir C. was appointed deputy surveyor-general (to Sir John Denham, whom he afterwards succeeded,) and principal architect for rebuilding the whole city; having previously been nominated architect, and one of the commissioners for the reparation of St. Paul's. The Monument was begun in 1671, and finished in six years. It was at first used for astronomical observations, but the Royal Society were obliged to abandon their experiments on account of its vibrations. It is certainly, though hardly looked at in London, the finest column of its kind in the world. Bow church, Chesapeake, and St. Stephen's, Walbrook, Greenwich and Chelsea hospitals, and other buildings, make part of Wren's admirable works: but to detail them all would fill our paper, and we must refer our readers to a position as near Mr. Horner's as they possibly can reach over the dome of St. Paul's, for the clearest view of his astonishing labours, and say to them, in the emphatic words of his sepulchre, Si Monumentum requiris Circumspice.

Till his 86th year (A.D. 1718) Sir Christopher continued his mighty labours, and was then overthrown by the court influence of Mr. Benson, who superseded him, and disgraced his situation for only one year; while Wren retired to a peaceful retirement at his house at Hampton Court, full of years and honours, saying, 'Nunc me jabet fortuna expeditiis philosophari.' In this philosophical retirement he passed the greater part of the remaining five years of his life, occasionally coming to London, to inspect the progress of the repairs at Westminster Abbey, visiting his great work St. Paul's, and indulging, after such an active life, in contemplation and studies.

The life of this great and useful man began now to draw near a close; but accident, and, perhaps, disappointment at the ungenerous conduct of the king to him at so advanced an age, shortened that life which temperance and activity had so prolonged beyond the usual term of man's life. Till the time of his removal from the office of surveyor-general, he had principally resided at a house appropriated to his offices in Scotland Yard, Whitehall; but afterwards he dwelt occasionally in St. James's-street, and remained surveyor of the Abbey till the time of his death. He also rented a house from the crown at Hampton-Court, to which he made great improvements. Here he would often retire from the hurry and fatigue of business, and passed the greater portion of the last five years of his life in this calm recess, in those contemplations and studies which I have before enumerated.

In coming from Hampton-Court to London he contracted a cold, which, perhaps, accelerated his dissolution: but he died as he had lived, with the greatest calmness and serenity. The good old man, in his latter days, had accustomed himself to take a nap after his dinner; and on the 25th of February, 1723, the servant, who constantly attended him, thinking he slept longer than usual, went into his apartment, and found him dead in his chair. From a mask taken shortly after this event, which I have contemplated with calm delight, it was as placid as sleep, and resembling, as his admiring friend Steele says of Dr. South, 'that of the saints,' and might well be called 'falling asleep': for the innocence of his life made him expect it as indifferently as he did his ordinary rest.

STANZAS

TO A FRIEND ON HER MARRIAGE.

Fair Lady! 'midst the many smiles
Of love, of friendship, and of joy;
Amidst the many happy wiles
Which shed around their witchery;
Amidst the many gifts, that shower
Upon thy happy favour'd head,
Amidst this gay, and joyous hour,
No dazzling gifts have I to spread;
But tune my lyre, and raise my voice,
And bid my silent heart rejoice!
Could I but grasp some magic power,
To guide the hand of ruling fate,
Thou ne'er should'st know one gloomy hour,
Nor find one moment, desolate.
Turn not, then turn not from my theme,
However poor the simple lay,
For though it boasts no golden dream,
Thy worth, thy kindness to repay;
Yet would it ev'ry thought expel,
That did not spring to wish thee well!
Now is the world before thee—Life!
Like to the ever varied sea,
That rises into jarring strife,
Then calmly sleeps—so silently!
Life, troubled life, is now thy share,
Then look around, and mark the spot
Where 'midst its grief or frowning care,
Such sorrows and such thoughts forgot;
The soul may brood o'er joys to come,
And glory in a welcome Home!

Yet still beware, for there are joys
Which oft the weary heart elate;
Whose sweets, are merely fantasies,
And leave the poor heart desolate.
I've known them come in friendship's guise,
And win the too confiding breast;
Then, like the treach'rous tempest, rise,
And end the sunny hour of rest;
Dash from the lips the cup of joy,
And ev'ry cherish'd hope destroy.

But there's a bliss, e'en in a tear
That rises from the heart of worth,
It chases ev'ry anxious fear—
It gives our sweetest moments birth.
Whilst truth and virtue reign within,
And peaceful reason hovers nigh,
Strife, will not, cannot enter in,
But all is one soft harmony;
And ev'ry sweet, and tender tone,
Breathes purest happiness alone!

Oh! may such moments find thee here,
That like the silent, silver stream,
Enrich'd with sweets, and flow'rets near,
Thy life may pass one fairy dream.
And when at length the soul shall wake
To life, and light, and endless day,
When death this earthly spell shall break,
And sink to dust, this mortal clay,—
Then may thy happy spirit rise,
And claim high heaven's extatic prize!

THE FALLEN SON OF SWITZERLAND.

STRANGER.—I love a tale of tears—
Told specially at eventide
I love it—
For its enchantment ever breathes o'er me
Like distant bells upon a summer's eve
Stealing away earth's grossness
By their most simple ravishment.

Old Play.

I was born in Switzerland in the Canton of Uri. My parents inhabited a small village at the foot of St. Gothard, perhaps the most lofty mountain in Europe. Its situation was most romantic—above, rose stupendous crags covered with eternal snow, seeming as it were to form an imperceptible union with the white fleecy clouds—sometimes presenting a dazzling glimmer through the gloomy mists that rolled over them. The barren surface presented no species of vegetation, save a kind of moss and short grass, and a little stunted furze, which served for food for the Chamois goat; almost the only animal which nature exhibited. Our humble hamlet was situated at its base, so that it was protected from the heavy and frequent snow drifts, and from the excessive cold and boisterous wind. Sheep and goats, together with a few cows, were all our riches; yet we were in want of nothing—they supplied us with food and clothing, and our chief occupation was in providing for their sustenance. Each day brought its accustomed and constant employment, and each setting sun beheld us happy and content. My father was now old, his head was honored with hoary locks, and his brow with the furrows of venerable age;—his chief delight was to watch the innocent gambols of his grandchildren, in which he would frequently engage; or in beholding his two sons (myself and an elder brother) prosecuting our labour. To us would he recount the acts of his ancestors—the first inhabitants of the valley; whenever he touched upon these topics his countenance assumed a sudden glow, and patriotism appeared in every aged feature; he spoke feelingly and made a deep impression upon our youthful hearts. Many were the songs and traditions which he related, handed down from father to son, for many generations.

There is one in particular, which, though I could disregard, I shall never forget; and even now, while I repeat it, the recollections of former days, the remembrance of my boyhood, and the image of my departed sire, as he sat and sung, all crowd into my imagination, and fill my soul with indescribable emotions.

Sons of freedom wake to glory,
Draw the blade in freedom's cause,
For your sires and grandsires hoary,
For your liberty and laws;
See the drooping bride is clinging
Like the ivy to the tree,
And her arms is round you flinging.
Look on this—and dare be free!

2.

Spirit of departed Tell!—
Hear within thy sainted grave!
Shades of those that with thee fell,
Rise and bid your Sons be brave!
If the foeman at a distance,
Threaten blood, and sword, and fire,
May they meet a stout resistance,
May they meet a Switzer's ire!

In the same village lived a young man, the son of the chief or patriarch of our little State. While children we were intimate friends; but as we grew older, we became rivals and bitter ene-

* His plan, which has been engraved and is well known, was so arranged that the chief streets crossed each other in right lines, with smaller streets between them: the churches, public buildings, and markets, were so disposed as not to interfere with the streets, and four piazzas were designed at proper distances, into which several of the streets met.

mies of each other. We both placed our affections on the same lovely object, and jealousy soon ripened into deadly hatred.

One evening whilst returning from a visit to the fair Lisette, I met with Thierry (for that was the young man's name); high words passed between us, and a quarrel (for love is none of the coolest passions) soon ensued—we fought, and he fell! In vain I endeavoured to raise him from the ground, and convey him to the village—"William," said he, with his hand pressed upon his side, endeavouring ineffectually to stop the gush of blood, "your kindness is useless, for death is upon me—leave me to my fate—fly and save yourself." My attentions were, indeed, unnecessary, for he had scarcely said farewell, when he sunk back into my arms and expired!

How to act I knew not—my destruction appeared inevitable; besides, the disgrace and infamy I should bring upon our hitherto spotless house!—I was utterly ignorant in what course to direct my flight—unacquainted with the rout to any foreign country, without money, and without a friend. No time, however, was to be lost; I set off immediately, and passing through the Canton of Berne, soon gained the French frontier. As I was wandering onward, weary and exhausted with my journey, I perceived, approaching, a troop of horse; I cast a wistful glance towards them, and could not help reflecting on my own unfortunate condition;—worn out with hunger and fatigue, and covered with dust, while they were careless, happy, well mounted, heedless, and without anxiety for the morrow. I saw that they observed me, and this affected me the more; two of the officers whispered together for some time, and one riding up to me addressed me in my native Swiss. Rejoiced at this unexpected circumstance, my face brightened up immediately, and I answered several of his enquiries. He informed me that he and his men belonged to a regiment in the French service; that my person had attracted their notice, and asked if I was willing to go with them? After a little discourse, I consented, and was soon initiated into the tactics and duties of a soldier's life. Without vanity I may say that I possessed a tolerably fine appearance—just in the prime of life, tall and well proportioned; bred up in a wild and barren country, I was enabled to endure the fatigues of war. Being of the same nation as my commander, I obtained first his good opinion, and then a considerable share of his favour and confidence. By his interest and exertions I was promoted in a short time from the ranks, and in a few years after, having served in many battles, I had the honor of being entrusted with a pair of colors.

Rocquener and I were the warmest friends; and the acquaintance of such a man, the gayety of a military life, the perpetual change of place, scene, and character, had almost obliterated from my mind the thoughts of by-gone days; yet, notwithstanding this, when the boisterous mirth had somewhat subsided, when I had retired to rest, imagination would paint in forcible colours the hoary Gothard, our little valley, and still more strongly the innocent and no doubt disconsolate Lisette. But the morning came, and, with its cares, duties, and pleasures, banished the musings of an unhappy man.

The day of battle was near; the clouds of night were dispersing and the morning was to prepare us more fully for the engagement. The morning came, the battalions were reviewed, the lines were formed, and terrible was the conflict? Rocquener did all that bravery could do: twice I saved him from the foe's steel; but in vain—his days were numbered—and he died gloriously. We were maddened at the sight—charged furiously—and the day was ours!

My actions had not been unobserved by the Colonel; he bestowed great encomiums on my valour, and advanced me to the vacant post of my departed friend. My misery now drew on apace: for the greatest elevation of fortune can never secure against a reverse; nay, the sunshine of our life, is generally a forerunner of clouds and storms.

A few months after this broke out the celebrated wars between France and Switzerland, my native country. We marched immediately to the border of the empire, and into the Canton of Berne—need I say with what a heavy heart I obeyed the orders of my general; but a soldier must follow wherever he is led—the command is imperious. Happy are they who fight only against the foes, the unjust enemies, the oppressors of their country.—But what were my feelings, when we were commanded to proceed into Uri, my own district, the place of my birth, yea, even to St. Gothard, where lived all that I held dear in life! The Swiss were assembled in the valley of my fathers, we were at some distance from them; I was put at the head of a detachment, with orders to encamp near them for the night, and reconnoitre their numbers and strength.—This was indeed the most miserable night I ever spent—my soul was rent asunder—I felt all the desolation of grief, and the wildness of despair—I could not sleep—in vain I threw myself down in my tent, and endeavoured to get a little repose. And must I then (thought I) raise my traitorous arm against the land of my brave and patriotic ancestors—against the companions of my childhood—against my own blood. Must I see my native village in flames, and myself light the torch which is to consume and destroy it—unhappy man! to what a state has thy first crime reduced thee! Thou art lost for ever! I could not compose myself to rest, and looking out of my tent, I beheld the antique church and spire of our little hamlet, and could distinguish by the light of the moon my own happy and peaceful home.—What recollections then crowded upon me, and harrowed up my soul with keenest sensations. I threw a cloak over my shoulders, and with feelings which it is impossible to describe, wandered over the well known scenes of my boyhood. With what emotions I wandered over the little green where I had spent the innocent and only happy days of my life, I shall not attempt to express. I arrived undiscovered at my father's cottage—there he was, little altered from when I left home, surrounded by the most valiant youths of the place, who, regardless of repose, were keeping their vigils and preparing for a vigorous defence.

I was on the point of rushing in and throwing myself at his feet, when the door opened and my brother came out, apparently with the intention of carrying some communication to the main body of their little force. He was passing forwards, thinking I was one of the men, when I exclaimed in a tremendous voice, "Henry, Henry,"—"What, William!" said he, starting back in astonishment, "our long lost William, welcome to St. Gothard in the time of danger!" it cut me to the heart—I could not speak—but threw open my cloak, that the sight of my uniform might save me the painful expression—"Ha, is it so," said he, recoiling—"William, and a Gaul—impossible—forbid it heaven—but it must have been to escape suspicion.—Speak, relate what has befallen you since you retired so suddenly from our village, and say why this disguise!" "Oh, my brother," I answered,

"this is indeed no disguise—my fate is hard—but-but—" said I, choking with emotion, "is Lisette yet alive?" "No," said he, "but thy country still is free, live for Switzerland."—"Henry," replied I, "it must not be—I belong to France—I have served long—been treated well, and sworn allegiance!—I cannot bear my poor father's looks, tell him cautiously my misfortunes and my grief;—Brother, farewell! farewell for ever!—we meet not again!"—I forced myself from him, and wandered on to the church-yard; there I saw, and in the inanity of grief, worshipped at the grave of Lisette, the poor fallen lily!

As I returned, I could not resist the desire to have another and a last glance at my aged sire.—He was seated as before, with my brother and the other youths around him. His eyes were lit up with a sort of phrenzied fire, while his venerable locks fell over his face and shoulders. I never saw him so animated, he was exhorting the young warriors to deeds of valour, in one of the old mountain songs. His voice was clear and distinct, and his words were expressed with a pathos which might have moved the coldest heart. I knew them well, for I had sung them while a child; and the ideas associated with them were more than I could bear—I cast a parting look through the casement, and hurried away.—Restless and miserable, I passed the night agitated and harassed by the thoughts of my duty, and the yearnings and impulse of nature, and the love of my country!

The sun arose, and soon beheld the contending parties drawn out against each other. Not knowing what I did, careless of life, and abandoned to despair, I looked forward to death with pleasure. Amid the ranks of the patriotic Switzers, I beheld the form of my father, laid on a kind of wicker couch, and supported by four of his countrymen—my conscience smote me almost unbearably—we were commanded to charge—I moved instinctively, and advanced amidst the thick fire of my own countrymen—we fired, that is, the men did—I would rather have shot myself than fired upon my own friends—I may say relations; I looked upon my beloved father—there he lay raised on his couch—his eye beaming unutterable brightness, his white locks streaming over his unbonnetted brow, and one hand pointed in defiance against the invaders of his country;—his voice I heard, loud above the tumultuous war and din, encouraging and bidding his sons on to victory—I saw him fix, as I thought, his unearthly, bright, and glittering eye on me, but it was for an instant only—he sunk back—a ball had struck his aged temples—he fell bathed in blood! my brother rushed to him, his dying hands clasped him, and his dying lips blessed him; my brother looked with a deep feeling upon the enemy;—but his hour had also arrived, another ball smote him on the breast—he reeled back, and fell a corpse on the lifeless body of my father!

I uttered a scream of horror, and, turning my horse's head, galloped away; the Colonel ordered the men to fire upon me—they obeyed—but they discharged their pieces in the air.

EPIGRAM

Sent with a couple of Ducks to a Patient. By the late Dr. Jenner.

I've dispatch'd, my dear madam, this scrap of a letter,
To say that Miss ——— is very much better:
A regular doctor no longer she lacks,
And therefore I've sent her a couple of quacks.

DEATH OF JOHN PHILIP KEMBLE, ESQ.

The following melancholy intelligence has been communicated in a letter from Lausanne, dated 28th February, 1823.

"Dear Sir,—I have not forgotten your request, that, on my arrival at Lausanne, I should present your best recollections to your friend Kemble. I came here on Monday evening, the 24th instant, and the first news that I heard was, that he was expiring—not exactly so, however, in point of fact; for he died on the 26th instant. But, in fine, our great tragedian is no more! And he who, in histrionic art, could so well depict the final pangs of nature, has been called on, in turn, to act the part in sad reality. I have seen the physician who attended him, and, anxious to obtain particulars of the latter days of so great and worthy a character, for my own satisfaction, and your information, I hastily subjoin the result. On Sunday, the 23rd instant, he was, in his own estimation, so very comfortable that, on sending away his hair-dresser, he requested that he would say to his friend, Mr. Precote, that it would give him pleasure to learn, that, after the operation of shaving, his friend was as well as he was. In fact, he seemed on that day in particularly good spirits. The next morning he rose apparently quite well, breakfasted at nine, and subsequently went to an adjoining room to speak to Mrs. Kemble; and then, returning to his room, was observed to totter in his gait. Mrs. Kemble noticed this with anxiety, and assisted him to his chair, and, when seated, he took up a number of Galignani's Messenger; but, getting worse, his friend and physician, Dr. Schole, was sent for, who arrived instantly, and found him in the position described, but already altered and exhibiting very unfavourable symptoms; his left side had suffered a decided attack, and he could with difficulty articulate. He seemed extremely anxious to spare the feelings of Mrs. Kemble. Dr. Schole, with the assistance of his old-attached servant, George, helped him to his bed, and, in the act of conducting him there, a second attack took place, so suddenly, that his clothes were obliged to be cut asunder, in order that he might be the more speedily let blood. But nature was fast exhausting; nor could he ever make use of his speech after a few words which he had uttered on Dr. Schole's arrival. He, however, assented or dissented by signs of the head, until within two hours of his complete extinction. His last intelligible words were, "George, George;" and you may imagine the feelings of an attached servant to an excellent master, under such circumstances. In fine, a third attack on Wednesday, the 26th instant, just forty-eight hours after the first, proved fatal; and though, to a stranger, he might appear to suffer, it is the opinion of the Doctor, that he was long insensible to acute feelings of pain. The English clergyman was also present. His occupations here were his books and his garden: the latter was his predilection, and it was resorted to by him with the first rays of the sun, and kept in a state of cultivation rarely to be surpassed. The funeral is to take place to-morrow, and will, doubtless, be numerous and respectfully attended."

SCOTCH WIT.—Mr. Skirving, a Lothian farmer, immortalized, in a doggerel ballad, Lieutenant Smith, one of Sir John Cope's officers, at the battle of Preston Pans, in which the English were routed by the Scotch rebels. The affronted soldier challenged the poet to single combat at Haddington. "Gang awa' back," was the rustic bard's answer to the bearer of the challenge, "and tell Mr. Smith that I have no leisure to come to Haddington; but tell him to come here, and I'll tak a look o' him, an' if I think I'm fit to fecht him, I'll fecht him, an' if no, I'll do as he did—I'll rin awa'."

INFANT ADMIRATION.—A boy of three years of age, bearing a visitor of his father's make use of the popular saying, that "an honest man's the noblest work of God;" made this innocent annotation upon it: "No, sir, my mamma is the noblest work of God."

BOOKS.—A few drops of any perfumed oil will secure libraries from the consuming effects of mouldiness and damp. Russian leather, which is perfumed with the tar of the birch-tree, never moulders; and merchants suffer large sales of this article to lie in the London docks in the most careless manner, knowing that it cannot sustain any injury from damp.

SWALLOWING PINS.—Death is not unfrequently caused by swallowing pins, fish bones, &c. In these cases, the patient should immediately take four grains of tartar emetic dissolved in warm water, and then swallow the whites of five or six eggs; which will generally cause the substance swallowed to be brought up with the coagulated mass of eggs. "A maid servant of the Hon. Mr. Baillie, of Millerstone, in Scotland (says Dr. Turnbull) went to bed with 24 pins in her mouth. The consequence of which was, that in the night the family were alarmed with her cries. She was given the emetic and eggs above mentioned, and all the pins came up."

BRITISH INDIGO.—A discovery has been recently made, which promises the most important consequences in a commercial and agricultural point of view. About two years ago, 280 acres of land, near Flint, in Wales, were planted with the common holyhock, or rose mallow, with the view of converting it into hemp or flax. In the process of manufacture, it was discovered that this plant yields a beautiful blue dye, equal in beauty and permanence to the best indigo.

INFORMATION TO THE LADIES.—Plaid stuffs will neither shrink nor lose their lustre, by the following simple method of cleaning them, viz. wash them with soap and cold water, and starch and iron them before they are dry.

ASTRONOMY.—The planet Mercury is seen at present in great perfection, about an hour after sunset, in the western quarter of the heavens. It resembles a fixed star of the first magnitude, both in its size and by its twinkling, differing only in having a paler white light.

RECIPE FOR MAKING WOMEN.

A flit of spirit; gleam of love;
A spot of polar white;
A tint of beauty stain'd above;
A ray of summer light.

A still small accent whispers o'er,
And music aids the birth;
A soul of glory beams before,
And woman walks the earth.

EPITAPHS.

That thou wouldst pity take I humbly pray,
O Lord, on this my wretched lump of clay—
A broken pitcher do not cleave in twain,
But let me rise, and be myself again.

I went and listed in the tenth Hussars,
And galloped with them to the bloody wars—
"Die for your Sovereign,—for your country die!"
To earn such glory feeling rather shy,
Snug I slipped home; but Death soon sent me off
After a struggle with the hooping cough.

Here lye in the blessed hope of a joyful resurrection

The bodies of Prudence

Aged one—two—and three years.

Three children small Composed my all—
But envious death
Has stopped their breath,
And left, d'ye see,
My wife and me,
Above the knoe,
In sorrow's slough—
To help us through
The Lord alone,
Who hears our groan,
Knows how and when!
AMEN, AMEN.

There down at Katherines I kept a school,
Vended small wares, caught rats, and carded wool;
My wife excelled in making British wine,
But she's alive and is no longer mine;
For I am dead and she won't follow—
I can no longer whoop and hollow—

Reader, if thou dost wish to know
The name of him here lying low,
Look down upon this stone, and see
Wilcox conjoined with Timothy.

Tread soft, good friends, lest you should spring a mine!
I was a workman in the powder line.
Of true religion I possessed no spark
Till Christ, he pleased to stop my gropings dark.
The Rev'rend Vicar seconded the plan,
[A temperate, holy, charitable man,
Who left the foxes to enjoy their holes,
And never hunted aught but human souls]
To this Director's care 'twas kindly given
To point my spirit, bolt upright, to heaven.

Here lies John Adams who received a thump
Right in the forehead from the Parish pump
Which gave him his quietus in the end,
For many Doctors did his case attend.

REPOSITORY OF GENIUS.

"And justly the Wise-man thus preach'd to us all,—
"Despise not the value of things that are small."—
Old Ballad.

MR. EDITOR.—The superior excellence of the following composition will, to the judicious, be an ample apology, at least, for its unusual length. If a Riddle, or as it is now, perhaps, more generally called, an Enigma, possess genuine and intrinsic merit, the candid reader will not object to the number of lines which it contains; but, on the contrary, prefer one good riddle before two indifferent ones, of only half its length.—Should this composition meet the approbation of your readers, in general, I will, with pleasure, furnish you with copies of some other Riddles, from the same pen, neither shorter in extent, nor inferior in quality, to that which is now offered for insertion in your truly amusing and interesting Miscellany.

A RIDDLE.—BY A LADY.

(Never before printed.)

Dear Ladies, I come not your favour to court,
Since I have it already by common report;
And some of you certainly deem me a prize,
As dear to your hearts as the light to your eyes.
My character's dubious—nay, rather suspicious;
Though oft I am harmless, and sometimes judicious;
Sometimes at a very high price I am bought,
And often you'd think me too dear at a great;
Beware for your purchase of paying too high,
As those often do who are anxious to buy;
Who, when they have suffer'd and done much to gain me,
Oft find it a difficult task to maintain me.
I'm frequently useful in matters of weight,
Nay, oft am an agent employed by the state;
As a person of consequence sometimes I come,
Though never announced by a trumpet or drum.
Sometimes I'm a mean little venomous thing,
And oft in my tail I have carried a sting.
A cheerful appearance I sometimes put on,
Am serious sometimes as a grave Spanish Don.
Yet though various my nature, and different my aim,
I'm still in reality always the same.
My power is extensive, despotic my reign,
Since even the freedom of speech I restrain;
And many a fair female, loquacious and free,
Has really been awed into silence by me!
I'm often in love, as the ladies well know,
And while I exist shall ne'er cease to be so;
From his fetters I never can wish to be free,
For what's life without love, and what's love without me?
A little sung wedding's my joy and delight,
And there I appear in my element quite.
But when to a funeral I am invited,
The grave undertakers themselves oft are frightened:
So solemn my looks, and so dismal my dress,
I serve but to darken the scene of distress.
I often the sweetest sensations impart;
Sometimes I, assassin-like, stab to the heart.
I'm oft entertaining, oft quiet and mild;
Nay sometimes appear in the form of a child;
Yet even in that form much mischief have made,—
Indeed, to speak truth, 'tis a part of my trade;
And yet, I believe, I shall always find friends,
Though 'tis but to answer their own private ends.
Yet those whom I serve will too often disown me,
And frequently wish that they never had known me,
If you value your peace, my acquaintance you'll shun,
As some, I confess, have by me been undone.
And thus, as I've given you some reason to doubt me,
You're certainly better and easier without me;
But let me not, Ladies, your comfort annoy,
Since the breath of your lips can my being destroy.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. COBBETT'S GRAMMAR.

MR. EDITOR,—I am surprised that your correspondent "F." who seemed to be soliciting a favour, should be so little ready to acknowledge it: he says, "though much obliged for the candid opinion;" a very negative way of acknowledging a favour. I can assure him I did not write merely for the sake of writing, though your correspondent, it appears, did; it seems, that he has been setting a trap, pretending in the first instance merely to doubt whether the passage he quoted were grammatical, and now being certain, from my reasoning to the contrary, that it is wrong as being contrary to rule: what rule, however, he refers to, I know not.—He says, his "object was to know if the word 'work' should be repeated in the same sentence, as it appeared there was only one verb." Now how easy it would have been in his query, as I should have considered it quite necessary, to have said so; for though your correspondent F. in this instance "non scribit canibus," that is, is not writing to dogs, yet it appears there are persons, and those of the man-kind, who can be ignorant of his meaning when so vaguely or indefinitely expressed. In one part of his epistle he treats "work" as a substantive, and in another he represents me as saying that, I saw no impropriety in the verbe being repeated. Another error he makes in regard to the word, deserves, which he seems to quote, but from whence I know not.—With respect to the propriety or impropriety of repeating a nominative case after the introduction of many lines so dependent on that nominative as to make it necessary in repeating them in that connexion to separate the nominative case to a considerable distance from its verb, I do not consider that your correspondent has proved any thing; as to what he begs leave to say, he surely is not vain enough to expect that we should rest satisfied with his mere assertion. If there be a rule forbidding the repetition, he ought to have named it; I know of none. Now if we are right in paying any respect to the language of the Holy Scriptures, we shall find abundant examples of such repetition, and this in cases where the repetition is by no means so necessary as in the passage from Mr. Cobbett. I mention the Sacred Scriptures not because examples cannot be found in classic authors, but because the two or three instances I shall quote from thence, are such as have fallen under my observation since Mr. "F." did me the honour of a reply:—"No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him. He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said to me. The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me. The Comforter whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you. What man is there of you, who if his son ask bread will he give him a stone. For this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles," here follows a digression of 20 verses, after which St. Paul resumes "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you." Will your correspondent say, that this last passage is ungrammatical? Can he prove, by authority or rule, that any of the passages I have quoted from the Sacred Writings are ungrammatical? If they are not, then Mr. Cobbett's introductory sentence to his dedication also is not ungrammatical.—"F." says, according to my reasoning "we could say, 'Cicero' the greatest 'Cicero' of the age;" my reasoning warranted no such conclusion, but my reasoning was, as it is, that, if we could say, "Cicero, the greatest Cicero," which, however, I acknowledge is palpably improper, as there has been but one great orator of that name; then we could say the last Cicero was put in apposition with the former, in like manner as, if the repetition be correct, and I see no reason why I should alter my former opinion, "such a work" referring to, I still insist is put in apposition with, "a work having for its object," &c.

He proceeds:—"It now of course devolves on me to answer B's query." I do not see how, at least I did not intend, it should devolve on him; I took him merely to be an inquirer, and therefore in this respect to be ignorant, my query in common with his being intended, through the medium of your favour, Mr. Editor, to be addressed, as I conceived, to the public.

I have therefore, it appears, been greatly mistaken in regard to your correspondent's knowledge and intentions. I am sorry, however, I cannot agree with him in the decision he has made in his last paragraph: he tells me that "'Your Majesty who is the only one' is strictly correct, and that 'Your Majesty who are the only one,' would be equally as correct." This is very strange. What! may we either say "Your Majesty is the only one, or, Your Majesty are the only one?" Does he mean to say that Majesty, by a figure of speech of the feminine gender, is the antecedent to who, and who, so referring to and agreeing with that antecedent, is the nominative case to are; and that in sense it reads Majesty who are the only one?—I am satisfied of the propriety of "Your Majesty is the only one;" my query was, does who refer to majesty or to your? and I do not see that your correspondent has at all cleared up the difficulty. We need not be told that the Latin word majestas is of the feminine gender; we need not be told of the personification of words; that, in speaking of the sun, we may say "He is rising, he is setting," and that we can speak of virtue's fair form, that she is lovely, amiable, &c. This we all know very well; yet majesty as a female, I think, is something new, and I cannot see how your correspondent can separate the Majesty from the Queen, and, personifying it, say, that the Majesty, an animate thing, can be "the only one that appears to have justly estimated the value of the people." It should be kept in mind that Mr. Cobbett is addressing the late Queen, "Your Majesty," &c. I am, Mr. Editor,

March 12th, 1823.

Will any of your correspondents take the trouble, and have the goodness, to furnish me with an elegant translation of the following brief Latin Essay on Hypocrisy! I shall be much obliged.

Yours, Mr. Editor,

Tu recte vivis, si curas esse quod audis.—HON.

Nullum tam valde Virtuti præbet auxilium, in excellentia ejus monstranda, quam simulatoris labor, ad speciem solum sibi assumendam. Ex hoc datur menti verè sincere, præsidium contra pravos oppugnantis firmissimum.

Illis, qui externa ad leges virtutis conformant, ac simul animi correctionem haud unquam querunt, castigationis plurimum debetur severa. Qui honorem regis ac imperium usurpare conatur, sciens quòd nata alienus est, non tantum perpetratur malum, quantum qui sibi Virtutis arrogat privilegia, conscius quòd caret in mente ad ea iuribus.

Ex illis minantibus hypocritæ periculis horrendis, judicari potest, quanta sincero isti accidant beneficia, qui pro regnorum copiis perversilibus, mentis probationem commutare spernit.—Nunc, dubitans! "utrum horum" persuadet tibi Ratio, id cuncta per secula retineas futura.

[The following two letters are replies—the first, to a few lines addressed by the Editor to the writer of the Strictures on the paper of Mr. Abernethy; the second, to a communication which was transmitted through the Iris Office.—ED.]

MR. EDITOR,—Your anxiety springs from a delicacy which reflection cannot fail to remove. Have, I, Sir, animadverted upon Surgeons generally? Have I stigmatized Medical Practitioners indiscriminately? Certainly not;—the enlightened, the qualified, the liberal, cannot, will not, be offended! The galled jades are, the incompetent, the illiberal, in short, Sir, the Professional Aristocrats!—These men would involve their practice in profound mystery; they would attach to it the most ridiculous importance; they would persuade the multitude that every licensed practitioner, concentrates in his own breast, nice discrimination, profound knowledge, and the most elaborate skill; and these qualities they would render still more exclusive, by a mystified representation of long, of arduous, of appalling investigations. The sun-scorched missionary is not influenced by a philanthropy—The enterprising navigator cannot feel a love of science—The most intrepid warrior never experienced a courageousness and fortitude—no, none of these, even in the pursuits or undertakings of their own choice and discretion, can be actuated by a ruling passion, at all, or in any degree, equal, to the love, the perseverance, and the magnanimity, which necessarily support, the medical aristocrat in his self-disinterested practice. Believe me, Sir, the able, the judicious practitioner, rests calm and confident in the evidences of his skill which every where surround him; he depends upon a reputation in which mystery, and arrogance have no share; and he warmly approves of every just exposure of duplicity and impudence. I am, &c. N. NOL.

TO MR. TENACULUM TOURNIQUET.

SIR,—Passing over the mighty import of your mod de guerre, I shall proceed to answer your inquiries relative to my health and profession. 1.—I am in good health. 2.—I am not a Medical Practitioner. 3.—It is now ten years since I have been visited as a patient.

Now, Sir, although entitled to a reply, I shall not require why these interrogatories have been put; because they appear to me frivolous, absurd, and in no manner connected with my essay, which you affirm to be "superficial and extremely fallacious." But, Sir, if superficial, it is the more easily refuted; it will need the less labour of research and of penmanship. The essay is before the world—it is a direct attack upon the assumed importance of certain clandestine practices, for which the sanction of law is implored; and it behoves all who would attach utility to the dissection of human bodies, to reply to it by a full and fair refutation of its errors and falsehoods. However, this, I presume, cannot be so easily effected; facts are stubborn things, and these are what I have exhibited, and what my public opponent must contend with. You speak of "Amputations"—pray under what professors do our most expert and successful operators study? where do they qualify themselves with most effect? Can the Dissecting Room ever supersede the Hospital? A Dead subject the Living one? No; no, Mr. Tourniquet, the pupils of Mr. Abernethy will appear very dolts, bunglers, mere stalking horses for death and torture, in the schools of Cooper!

You wish me "to re-consider the subject—the benefits the living derive from anatomical examinations of the dead"—All this I have done, and am the more thoroughly convinced of the truth of my former writing; and, with regard to myself, I most solemnly protest that I would not deliver up a deceased infant of my family to be backed, mutilated, and carved on your tables, and to macerate in your tubs—not, for all the blessings the most interested (who are the only eloquent) of your school can describe, or even imagine. I remain, &c.

N. NOL.

MR. EDITOR,—Observing a notice of Dr. Franklin in your last week's Iris, I thought another of a different description would not be unacceptable. It is taken from a little work called "La Cassette Verte," (a kind of Twopenny post-bag of its day) published at the Hague in 1779: the author giving as a reason for retiring into Holland to publish his work that the Bastille was a sworn enemy to the Liberty of the Press.

Manchester, 10th March, 1822. Your's, T. V.

TO M. DE SARTINE.

My dear Friend,—I have been to the Queen's Levee, which was of a frightful duration: and your ambassadors from America have had their audience. Enough in all conscience to give me the head-ache and to excuse me from writing; but as I am aware you are very anxious to know if they were to her taste, or passable. All considered, so so! But to whom are you obliged? To the Countess Jule de Polignac, and to me. We had great difficulty I assure you in prevailing upon the Queen to endure them. Unfortunately Mademoiselle Bertin had been with the Queen in the morning; and she had so ridiculed these ambassadors, that, on their entrance, her Majesty had the greatest difficulty to keep herself from laughing. I am not surprised at it, for in truth my dear friend they were most slovenly dressed; and what is singular, there was not one that had an air of distinction about him. It was in vain we praised the simplicity of their manners, and their contempt for all formality—"On my word (said the Queen) it must be confessed that they are but rabble!" But, said I to her, did you look at the white hat of Dr. Franklin, it is the emblem of innocence; his spectacles, said the Countess, that of economy (one of the glasses was broken). "Assuredly (said the Queen) this Dr. Franklin is very singular in every thing." We all laughed at this sally, and the Queen recovered her good humour. The Duke de Coigny who was present, assured the Queen that the Dr. singular as he was, with his white hat and his one eyed spectacles, had discovered the secret of putting lightning into bottles; that he could by uncorking them, cause as many evils as Pandora did, by opening her box, or the companions of Ulysses, by untying their leathern bags. This made us all laugh heartily, though we did not understand the meaning of it. In short we have hitherto managed things pretty well. But for God's sake, my friend, send some dancing masters and French tailors to these barbarous ambassadors, and above all prevail upon his Excellency the Dr. to get his spectacles repaired. Adieu. LAMBALLE.

Versailles, 22nd March, 1788, Sunday Evening.

STENOGRAPHY.

Pray, Mr. Editor, have you, or any of your ingenious Correspondents, who may have acquired "a liking for the nick-nackerils of knowledge," heard any thing of a most curious and novel invention, constructed on the principle of a keyed instrument, being a kind of mechanical Short-hand Writer? The person using it as I have been informed, in following a speaker, instead of writing the words, or the letters of which they are composed, plays upon the machine with his fingers, the characters employed being those which are used in printing, and the spelling, according to the abbreviated mode practised in Short-hand, where, on an average, about ten letters out of every thirty, are omitted.

An American invention has also lately been mentioned, for the purpose of setting up printing types, by the means of a keyed instrument, contrived for that purpose. Really, Mr. Editor, I should not be at all surprised, if we were soon to hear of the singular experiment of a compositor, in the gallery of the house of commons, setting up the type for the columns of a newspaper, at the same time that the members are delivering their speeches! Should this ever be accomplished, I dare say your vicarious correspondent, Mr. Watty, will think it quite as deserving of being commemorated by Sir Richard Phillips, in his Book of Wonders, as his own marvellous feat of reading that extraordinary volume, "from the beginning to the end," as proposed in his Letter to you, printed, like all other musical compositions, without a date, in your publication of Saturday last.

ON CLERICAL CRITICISMS.

The improvement of society depending so greatly upon its moral principles, and these principles being by the bulk of mankind, in a great measure, derived from the cheap and periodical diffusion of knowledge, by the means of the literary journals of the day, the conducting of these journals has, in consequence, obtained a higher claim to notice than that to which they would at first appear entitled. Every man who uses the means which the power of the press gives him of scattering the seeds of knowledge, at a cheap and accessible rate among the people, is deserving of the respect of his countrymen; provided he uses his power with that due caution which its importance demands. It ought not to be considered sufficient, that at the end of his editorial career, he should be able to say that the public have received no injury from his exertions—for the public do, and ought to expect that the evident tendency of his writings should be directly beneficial. We will, therefore, in examining the propriety of the Clerical Criticisms, which have appeared in a weekly paper lately published in Liverpool, set down as an established principle, "That not only every subject of a directly evil, but also all those of a doubtful tendency, ought to be excluded from the pages of a public work."

The church, I believe, ought not to be considered as a school of eloquence, but as an establishment for the dissemination of the precepts and doctrines of Christianity; and consequently that every thing which may tend to obstruct this end, though it may possibly increase the taste of the public in critical oratory, ought to be considered as an evil; allowing this to be true, let us see how far strictures upon the eloquence of the Pastors of the church can aid the religious improvement of their flocks.—To assist us in this inquiry, we will divide the Ministers of the Gospel into two classes, ranging under one those who are eloquent, and under the other those who are not; that we may be able to judge of the effect which such critiques would be likely to have upon their respective congregations. We will then, in the first place, take a glance at the probable effect of such criticisms upon the flock of an eloquent Pastor.

Consistently with the acknowledged frailty of human nature, it is impossible that any man should be so perfect an orator as to escape faultlessly the scrutinizing eye of the refined critic; I think it, however, very possible for a minister to have that share of eloquence which will cause him to be thought almost perfect by the less censorious eye of a general audience. When, therefore, a congregation has this opinion of the excellence of their minister, they hear him with unmingled delight, and his precepts sink into a somewhat prepared soil. But the moment the officious critic draws the veil from their eyes, or rather renders their sight keener, they begin to perceive imperfections in their Pastor, which otherwise would have remained disregarded; and from doubting his merit as an orator, they begin to question his opacity as a teacher. If this be the probable effect of these criticisms with those who sit under an eloquent preacher, a fortiori this pernicious effect will be much increased with those who have as their Minister a perhaps able Divine and good man, but one who is deficient in many of the requisites of the accomplished orator. His hearers were formerly to hear him for the sake of the wholesome and saving doctrines he administered, and did not regard so much the manner in which they were wrapped up; but having read and learned something of criticism, they now look for the harmony of periods, and the delicate artifice of connexion; they now scrutinize his mode of delivery, and the inflexions of his voice, and thus becoming dissatisfied with their Minister for having faults about which they before were indifferent, the probability of their receiving benefit from his instructions is much diminished.

The doctrines and exhortations which the Minister has been delivering in the pulpit, formerly had an opportunity of producing their proper effect upon the congregation, by their becoming the subject of conversation among the people after having left his presence, but now his mode of delivery forms the only topic for discussion, and his merits and demerits as an orator are fully canvassed. This, I acknowledge, may tend to cultivate in them a taste for oratory, but, what is of infinitely greater importance, it will at the same time tend to obstruct their religious improvement.

From the principle I laid down at the commencement of these remarks, I think it would follow, that if I could merely prove that the tendency of clerical criticisms was merely negative, that they ought not to fill up the columns of a public journal. But if I mistake not, I have proved that their tendency is not simply negative, but directly evil; and, therefore, that there can be no doubt of the impropriety of their admission.

These remarks have not originated in any offence which I have taken to the manner in which the particular criticisms to which I advert, have been conducted; for I have no doubt they have been penned with a due attention to candour and impartiality; but it is to clerical criticisms in general that I object. At least to the insertion of them in those publications, which, from their cheapness, form the source of information to so large a portion of the community. With persons who have had a regular classical education, and who have laid up a large store of knowledge, their effect would of course not be prejudicial, but as these form comparatively so small a part of mankind I think the clerical notices which have appeared in a Liverpool paper, by infusing a smattering of the art of criticism among its readers, have caused a cavilling spirit to be introduced where humility and a teachable spirit ought alone to prevail.

FAREWELL.

Farewell, farewell! whate'er my lot,
Oh thou canst never be forgot!
No change of fate, no change of clime,
Not absence, nor the lapse of time,
Can dull the feelings of the breast
Once with thy pure affection blest.
Though that affection bless no more,
Though ev'ry joy of life be o'er,
Though hope no more can bloom for me,
Yet mem'ry fondly turns to thee,
And fancies, that, as once thy smile
Could sorrow's keenest pang beguile,
It still may some kind balm impart
To calm and soothe a broken heart.

Thus, when the dove forsook the ark
To wander o'er that ocean dark,
The vast abyss whose billows curl'd
Triumphant o'er a rain'd world,
Anxious she roam'd the boundless space,
But no-where found a resting place,
Till wearied, and of hope bereft
Again she sought the friendly ark,
And found in that frail, lonely bark
One melancholy refuge left.

STANZAS.

Oh, sweet is the eve to the bosom that loves,
Delightful the stillness which reigns;
When nought can be heard in the walks of the grove,
Save the night-bird's melodious strains.

And sweet is the smile that fair Cynthia bestows,
As she tinges the meads with her light;
And the brook, by yon cot, which meandering flows,
Breathes a charm to the beauty of night.

Ah then as the hours imperceptibly fly,
With the maid I adore let me rove;
And hear her lov'd voice in kind accents reply,
While I vow that for ever I'll love.

Oh, blest be the hour, when she said she'd be mine,
And I caught the dear maid to my bosom;
And blest the affection which two hearts entwined,
The love which e'en death cannot part.

TAKING ADVICE.

Sir John Danvers once sent an invitation to Sir Richard Onslow, and Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper (afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury), to dine with him at Chelsea; he requested they would come early, as he had affairs of moment to communicate to them. When they arrived, and had taken their seats, Sir John opened the business, by saying, that he had made choice of them both, on account of their correct judgment, and particular friendship for him, in order to consult them on a subject of the utmost consequence to himself. He had, he said, been a widower many years, and he began to want some person to relieve him of the trouble of housekeeping, as well as to take some care of him, under the growing infirmities of age. For this purpose, he had thought of a suitable person, who was well known to him; this was, in short, his housekeeper.

The gentlemen knowing the woman very well, and thinking it by no means a suitable match, particularly as Sir John had sons and daughters marriageable, to whom it would be mortifying, were much against it. Sir Richard Onslow frankly began to point out to Sir John the impropriety of a person, of his age, marrying; and particularly such a woman. He was going to enter upon a description of her person, and to set her out in such colours, as could not have pleased any man in a wife; when Sir Anthony interrupting him, said, "Give me leave, Sir Richard, to ask our friend one question before you proceed;" so addressing himself to Sir John, "Tell me truly, Sir John," said he, "are you not already married?" Sir John, after a short pause, answered with a smile, "Yes, truly I was yesterday." "Well, then," replied Sir Anthony, "there is no more need of our advice; pray let us have the honour to see my lady, and wish her joy, and so to dinner." As they were returning to London in their coach, "I am obliged to you," said Sir Richard, "for preventing me running into a description which I am sure could never have been forgiven me. But how could it enter into your head to ask a man who had solemnly invited us on purpose to have our advice about a marriage he intended, and gravely proposed the woman to us, and suffered us seriously to enter into the debate; I say, Sir Anthony, how could you ask him, after all this, whether he were already married, or not?" "The man, and the manner," replied Sir Anthony, "gave me a suspicion, that having done a foolish thing, he wanted to cover himself with the authority of our advice."

JEMMY DAWSON.

Shenstone's pathetic and affecting ballad of Jemmy Dawson has drawn tears from every person of sensibility, or possessing the feelings of humanity; and it will continue to be admired as long as the English language shall exist. This ballad, which is founded in truth, was taken from a narrative first published in the Parrot of the 2nd of August, 1746, three days after the transaction it records. It is given in the form of a letter, and is as follows—

"A young lady, of a good family and handsome fortune, had for some time extremely loved, and was equally beloved by Mr. James Dawson, one of those unhappy gentlemen who suffered on Wednesday last, at Kensington Common, for high treason; and had he either been acquitted, or found the royal mercy after condemnation, the day of his enlargement was to have been that of their marriage.

"I will not prolong the narrative by any repetition of what she suffered on sentence of death being passed on him; none, excepting those utterly incapable of feeling any soft or generous emotions, but may easily conceive her agonies; beside, the sad catastrophe will be sufficient to convince you of their sincerity.

"Not all the persuasions of her kindred could prevent her from going to the place of execution: she was determined to see the last of a person so dear to her, and accordingly followed the sledges in a hackney-coach, accompanied by a gentleman nearly related to her, and one female friend. She got near enough to see the fire kindled which was to consume that heart she knew was so much devoted to her, and all the other dreadful preparations for his fate, without betraying any of those emotions her friends apprehended; but when all was over, and that she found he was no more, she threw her head back into the coach, and ejaculating, 'My dear, I follow thee! I follow thee! Lord Jesus! receive both our souls together,' fell on the neck of her companion, and expired the very moment she had done speaking.

"That excessive grief which the force of her resolution had kept smothered in her breast, is thought to have put a stop to the vital motion, and suffocated at once all the animal spirits."

In the Whithall Evening Post, August 7th, this narrative is copied with the remark, that "upon enquiry every circumstance was literally true."

A ballad was cried about the streets at the time, founded on this melancholy narrative, but it can scarcely be said to have aided Shenstone in his beautiful production.—Relics of Literature.

MELANCHOLY MISTAKES.

A few years ago, a fire took place in Whitechapel, in some houses principally occupied by lodgers. So rapid were the flames, that it was with the utmost difficulty that the wretched inhabitants could be rescued. A poor woman, with a large family, who had just escaped, was kneeling, with her children around her, to return God thanks for their preservation, when she found that her youngest child, an infant, was still missing. With a courage and desperation which maternal affection, heightened by despair, alone could have prompted, she flew, half naked as she was, up the blazing staircase, flew into the room, snatched the babe from the cradle, and bore it in triumph to her family group; a triumph, alas! short-lived, for the child was not her own. Misled by the smoke which filled the building, she had entered a wrong apartment, and rescued the child of one of her neighbours, instead of her own. She hastened back, but by this time, the whole building had fallen in, when she sunk senseless on the ground, and died in a few hours.

A somewhat similar, though not so distressing, an event, occurred during the rejoicings at Paris, on the marriage festivities of the Dauphin, afterwards the unfortunate Louis XVI. In the Place Louis XV., there were very brilliant fireworks prepared; but by some accident, the scaffolding prepared for them took fire; the rush of the crowd, and the crash of coaches, was such, that several persons were trampled to death under the horses' feet, and others were killed by the pressure.

One man, of the name of Pierre Dubois, who went to see the promised amusements, took with him a young woman, to whom he was next day to have been married. When the disaster of the scaffolds caused every person to seek his safety in immediate escape, Pierre and his mistress hastened from the fatal scene, and being strong and athletic, he was enabled for some time to protect her from the immediate pressure of the crowd; but the danger and the terror increased, and she exclaimed, "Oh! I am falling, I can go no farther." "Courage!" cried the lover, "I can still save thee, if thou wilt get upon my shoulders." He soon found that his shoulders had received their burden, and animated by new courage, he forced his way through the crowd, and reaching a place of safety, he set down his precious burden, expecting, in the smile that would greet him, an ample recompense for all his toil. Half intoxicated with joy at his having rescued his beloved, he turned round to receive her embrace, when, alas! he found that it was a different person, who had taken advantage of his recommendation, and that his own Henrietta had been left to perish in the crowd.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER,

From Monday March 10th, to Friday March 14th, 1823.

Monday—Kenilworth: with No Song no Supper. Queen Elizabeth—Mrs. Bunn.

Tuesday—Kenilworth: with how to die for Love. Elizabeth—Mrs. Bunn.

Wednesday—Kenilworth: with Lock and Key. Elizabeth—Mrs. Bunn.

Friday—Kenilworth: with the Agreeable Surprise. Elizabeth—Mrs. Bunn.

The New Play of KENILWORTH has been the chief attraction of the week; the scenery was elegant, and Mrs. Bunn appeared as Queen Elizabeth, Mr. Salter as the Earl of Leicester, Mrs. McGibbon, as Amy, Mr. Browne, as Michael Lambourne, and Mr. Bass as Tressilian. As much of the effect of our best theatrical pieces unquestionably depends upon the ability and spirit of the principal actors, the play of Kenilworth could not fail to afford much pleasure.—The Dramatis Personæ were illustrious and their representatives did them ample justice. The deportment, and tone of voice of Mrs. Bunn, were such as characterised her illustrious archetype.—The self-assurance and weakness, the conflict between the high and politic feelings of majesty and the almost irresistible power of the softer passion—were peculiarly striking. The very person of Mr. Salter obtains a prepossession in his favour in every distinguished character;—but this were saying little, Mr. Salter personified Leicester with judgment, spirit, and ability. His retort upon the "Princess" when she would intimidate him by reminding him of the fate of his ancestor, contrasted with his silence under her former animadversion—was prompt and spirited. Mrs. McGibbon was most happily cast.—Amy's filial and conjugal feelings,—her affection for an aged parent and her regard for the wishes of her husband,—her remembrance of early attachment to a man from whom she is separated by being affianced to another, and her entire demeanour under a mysterious treatment,—are all such as we must ever approve; but, under the magic influence of Mrs. McGibbon, these, and all the better feelings of the heart, command unmingled admiration. Mr. Browne's Michael Lambourne was the genuine Lambourne of Sir Walter. We like to see Mr. Bass in honourable character—his Tressilian gave the utmost satisfaction.

For I have learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth, but hearing oftentimes
The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh, nor grating, though of ample power
To chasten and subdue. WORDSWORTH.

IN a former paper we stated a few particulars respecting an excursion made by the President and his nephew; and, as nothing particular occurred at our last meeting, we shall now, in performance of our promise, resume the subject.

A person seldom experiences more genuine happiness than in setting out upon a journey of pleasure. Some of our enjoyments arise from hope, and others from possession; but there are very few of them in which these circumstances are combined. The case alluded to is, however, of the last mentioned description. We partake of all the charms of variety and contrast, while we delight ourselves with the contemplation of those prospective treats which have all the interest of uncertainty.

During their ride in the stage coach our friends met with nothing particular. The only interesting passenger was a quaker, with whom they had much conversation, and who evinced that shrewdness and caution for which his fraternity are so remarkable. His questions were so imposing, and his remarks, though always general, so very keen, that our President thought for some time he was a man of superior attainments; but when, with much difficulty, our friend succeeded in his attempts to get some knowledge of the stranger's real acquisitions, he found, to his disappointment, that the stranger owed the impression he had produced entirely to his manner; and that while he artfully concealed his own ignorance, he shewed much acuteness, and seemed to experience much gratification, in detecting and exposing that of others.

The President, to assist his nephew's observation, remarked, on the first opportunity, "I hope, William, you did not neglect noticing the address of that quaker gentleman. That person," he added, "little as he knows, would be applauded for his intelligence, where another man, with ten times his information, would be overlooked."

Early the following morning, the weather being very fine, our travellers were in a Liverpool steam packet, on their way to the Welsh coast. The old gentleman was particularly cheerful. The dock, covered with spectators, which appeared to be receding from the vessel, was to him an object of interest; and the sea fowl which sported above the surface of the water, in which, as if to exhibit feats of their agility, they sometimes dipped the extremities of their wings, afforded him a topic for remark. "You see, William," said he, "that providence has given every creature some peculiar advantage. Man ought, therefore, to contemplate his own powers with becoming humility, since there is no animal, how insignificant soever he may consider it to be, which is not superior to him in some particular.

"What is yonder large black object which we see at some distance?" said the old gentleman to the Captain. "That, Sir," replied the Captain, offering our friend a small telescope which he held in his hand, "that is the wreck of the Dutch vessel which left Liverpool a few weeks ago, laden with a valuable cargo. She had made a good speculation, and was upon her return." "Was the cargo saved?" inquired the President. "No, Sir, such was the nature of it, that it was all lost excepting a small quantity of tobacco." "Alas!" said our worthy friend, "how uncertain are our hopes, even when they claim our greatest confidence! The crew, after having crossed in safety the ocean, and having made an advantageous exchange of property, were probably rejoicing at their success; and hardly suspecting that, while they were yet in sight of the port from which they had departed, their little wealth, and the vessel which contained it were to be scattered upon the waters." "It is often thus, William, with human life," continued he, addressing himself to his nephew, to whom he seemed anxious to convey instruction through the medium of every new object, "our hopes on land are often as frail as upon the ocean. I have known a young person begin his career of life, elated with all those hopes which the smiles of fortune and the caresses of friendship could impart; he has proceeded for a while, like that vessel, the envy or the admiration of those who witnessed his progress, until he, too, has struck upon a quicksand, and presented a wreck as sudden and unexpected.

"This sole memorial of his lot Remains.—He was and he is not."—Montgomery.

The old gentleman, after he had finished his reflections, turned quickly round to look at some other object. If he did so with a view to conceal his emotion, let it not excite surprise; he had, perhaps, more cause for his feelings than the reader may imagine, or need to be told.

The waves which, with silvery lustre, trembled in the sunbeam; the light-house, surrounded by its signals; and the Welsh scenery, presenting, in the most favourable part of the year, its mild and diversified beauties, called forth in succession the observations of our excellent friend.

The passengers were much amused during the voyage, with the anxious care which an elderly Welsh woman took of her husband, a good tempered old man, who on all occasions was ready to offer his assistance to the crew. When the sailors were shifting the sails, he insisted upon helping them; and it happened several times, that, while he was pulling at a rope, his good lady was, in a pretty similar attitude, holding him by the skirts of his coat. If he looked over the side of the vessel, she generally laid hold of him and intreated that he would beware of any accidents; and she seemed never content except when he was seated by her side on one of the benches in the middle of the vessel. There, however, he seldom remained long at a time; for his own restless disposition, or the mischievous invitations of the passengers, whose mirth was always excited by the distresses of the old lady, rarely allowed her to be at ease for many minutes together.

Our friends, after taking a little refreshment at a small public house near the place where they landed, proceeded towards the ruins of Flint Castle. Being overtaken by a shower, they were obliged to seek shelter in a little cottage on the road side. The inmates, who spoke English very imperfectly, shewed our friends much civility. Observing our President to fix his attention upon a small engraving of our late queen, which hung against the wall, the host and his wife expressed great zeal for her cause. "You find, William," said our worthy friend, "that her Majesty, whose imputed frailties and faults have been equalled at least by her misfortunes, has found persons to commiserate her sufferings, even in this remote and humble cottage."

The rain having ceased, our travellers lost no time in getting to Flint. The sight of the interesting ruins of the castle, and the commanding and picturesque situation which it occupied, did not escape the observation of our worthy friend. They reminded him of the historical interest of the place: and he could not repress a sigh, while he recalled to the recollection of his nephew, that this bleak castle was the last retreat of the unfortunate Richard the Second,—the place where the royal fugitive was deprived of the last remnants of regal authority. Our travellers viewed the ruins in every point of view; and, before they left the place, the President put a few small fragments into his pocket, to carry home as memorials of his visit.

When they returned to the inn, our friend inquired at what period the castle had ceased to be inhabited, and he was answered that it had been reduced to its present ruined condition by Oliver Cromwell. "Ay, ay," said the old gentleman, "there is hardly a ruin in the country which has not been imputed to Oliver. He was, indeed, a wonderful personage, and he made sad devastation among the castles of the country; but tradition, which always magnifies extraordinary achievements, has given him credit for having done more than one man could accomplish. Whether he was justified in demolishing the castles of the nobility, I am not called upon to say: but, judging of the act by its effects, which were the diminishing of civil broils and petty tyranny, it is not going too far to claim the gratitude of posterity for a person, who, to say the least of him, had the spirit and energy of an Englishman."

He had scarcely finished his remark, before the sound of the horn announced that the packet was about to sail: they, therefore, hastened on board, and, without any further occurrence of particular interest, they were, in a short time, once more landed in Liverpool.

THE ROMAUNT OF LLEWELLYN.

CANTO II.

I.

Upon the wound, the corporal wound, there grows
Another cuticle, but 'tis a scar,
And o'er man's mind weeping with inward woes,
A gleam may sparkle like a lonely star,
And nerve his pilgrim steps against the war
Of troublous thought; that strife element—
But grief deep fixed, that fiercest, deadliest bar
To human bliss, that e'er pale Ate sent
Is as a sore fresh pricked, yftraught with anguishment.

II.

The wailing scourge may rangle and may bite,
May cut and torture; mercy 'twere to slay
The miserable, bleeding, writhing wight
That groans beneath the lash his hours away!
But virtue's soul it never can affray—
The mortal perisheth, th' immortal ne'er,
And souls that heavenward choose their sacred way,
Like pure integrity, with conscience fair,
Man's puny torments here, firm and unshaken bear!

III.

What leech can cure the breast that bleeds with woes?
What leech can cure a hidden malady?
What hand can quell grief's deneful hidden throes?
Or heal the wounds deep in the heart that lie?
Who can escape the lightning of heaven's eye?
Mountains may screen, unsounded billows rise
And swallow and devour, he cannot fly!—
Nor can one fly from grief which will surprise,
The soul that shuns it most, and with mad pleasure flies!

IV.

The revel and the masque with wassail dight,
The ball of pleasure, and the bourne of bliss,
The garment, decked with gold and trappings bright,
Shroud many a heart that throbs in deep distress—
Covering the naked form of wretchedness!
As in the sheening waste the glittering wave,
Gleams o'er the wild and desert emptiness—
As lovely flowers are strown upon the grave
And as the Asphaltic fruits, no strength or substance have.

V.

So is it with them, theirs is outward gleaming,
The raven's gloss, the bitter smile of death,
The icicle ybright to outward seeming,
Sparkling and glittering but cold beneath,
And smelling of stern winter's horrid breath—
So is it with them, they may smile but smiling,
They gi'd a heart that deeply sorroweth,
They may sing high, shout loud, derne care begniling,
There is a wound within in all these joys defiling!

VI.

There is a poison in the wassail cup,
A taint in beauty, and a withering blight—
Mildews the flowers we fondly gather up—
The good, the fair, the beautiful, the bright,
The crested warrior and the statesman dight;
The Paladin and lozell—all must feel
The woes that gnaw the heart no longer light—
There is no armour proof—no triple steel,
To guard against the griefs these earthly scenes reveal.

VII.

Thus thought Llewellyn, as the vessel bounded
Over the billows, and the breezes sung
In her white sails, and like strange music sounded,
From some forgotten lyre unearthly rung,
And as the rolling surge she backward flung,
Cleaving the dark blue waters all before her,
She seemed some wild thing from the ocean sprung,
And as the brinish deep in restless triumph bore her,
She looked as one who called the proud heart to adore her.

VIII.

There is upon the ocean far away,
A rank, uncultured, and uneasured isle,
Where misty mountains rear their summits gray,
Where forests darken, and fierce currents boil,
Where hapless wretches in unceasing broil,
Consume beneath the scourge their manhood's prime,
Where despot tyrannie holds his dark coil,
It is the realm of slavery and crime,
Of deepest, keenest woe not to be seared by time.

IX.

Thither the vessel bears Llewellyn wight
Aboon the billows—and as one blind goes
Over an unknown path in wintry night
Without one guiding star, one ray that throws
Its glimmer after twilight's sudden doze,
May wander on unconscious, careless where,
While gathering danger round and round him grows,
And death and peril on each hand do stare—
So he rushed on his fate, nor seemed one jot to care.

X.

Meantime a heavy swell comes o'er the sea,
The surge beats lustily the vessel's side;
And the celestial fire conspicuously
Gleams o'er the surface of the waters wide.
The night winds o'er the exulting surges ride,
And from their home the huge sea lions creep,
Enderkening the rolling mighty tide,
That rushes onward still with swirl and sweep,
Cresting with foam and spray the bosom of the deep.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

Notes taken at advising the Action of Damages and Defamation, Alexander C.....m, Jeweller, in Edinburgh, against Mr. James R.....ll, Surgeon there. By G. C. Esq.

Lord P.—nt (Campb.—l.) Your Lordships have Petition of Alex. Cunningham against Lord B.—s Interlocutor.—It is a case of Defamation and Damages for calling the Petitioner's Diamond Beetle an Egyptian Louse.

You have the Lord Ordinary's very distinct Interlocutor on pages 20 and 30 of the petition: "Having considered the concordance of the Pursuer, answers for the Defendant, and so on, finds in respect it is not alleged that the diamonds on the back of the Diamond Beetle are real diamonds, or any thing but shining spots, such as are found on other Diamond Beetles, which likewise occur, though in a smaller number of other Beetles, somewhat different from the Beetle libelled, similar to which there may be Beetles in Egypt, with shining spots on their backs, which may be termed Lice there, and may be different not only from the common Louse mentioned by Moses as one of the plagues of Egypt, which is admitted to be a filthy, troublesome Louse, even worse than the said Louse which is clearly different from the Louse libelled; but the other Louse is the same with or similar to the said Beetle, which is also the same with the other Beetle, and although different from the said Beetle libelled, yet as the same Beetle is similar to the other Beetle, and the said Louse to said Beetle, and the said Beetle to the other Louse libelled, and the said Louse to the other Beetle, which is the same with or similar to the Beetle which somewhat resembles the Beetle libelled, assolizes the Defender, and finds expenses due."

Say away, my Lords.

Lord M.—b.—k. This is a very intricate and puzzling question, my Lord. I have formed no decided opinion, but at present I am rather inclined to think the Interlocutor is right, though not upon the ratio assigned in it. It appears to me there are two points for consideration:—1st, Whether the words libelled amount to a conviciam against the Beetle. 2d, Admitting the conviciam, whether the Pursuer is entitled to found upon it in this action.

Now, my Lord, if there be a conviciam at all, it consists in the comparatio, or comparison, of the Scarabæus, or Beetle, with the Egyptian Pediculus, or Louse. The first doubt regards this point, but it is not at all founded on what the Defender alleges, that there is no such animal as an Egyptian Pediculus in rerum natura; for though it does not actually exist, it may possibly exist, and whether its existence is in esse or posse is the same to this question, provided there be termini habiles for ascertaining what it would be if it did exist. But my doubt lies here—How am I to discover what is the essentia of any Louse, whether Egyptian or not? It is very easy to describe it by its accidents as a naturalist, Aptera (or that it is a little, filthy, yellow, greedy, despicable reptile; but we do not learn from this what the proprium of the animal is in a logical sense, and still less what are its differentia. Now without these it is impossible to judge whether there is a conviciam or not; for in a case of this kind, which sapit naturam delicti, we must take the words in meliori sensu, and presume the comparatio to be in melioribus tantum. And I here beg that the parties, and the bar, and general—(Interrupted by Lord H.—m.—d.)—Your Lordship should address yourself to the chair.") I say, my Lord, I beg it may be understood that I do not rest my opinion upon the ground that veritas convicii excusat: I am clear that although the Beetles actually were an Egyptian Pediculus, it would afford no relevant defence, providing the calling it so were a conviciam; and there my doubt lies.

With regard to the 2d point, I am satisfied that the Scarabæus, or Beetle himself, has no personi standi in judicio, and therefore the Pursuer cannot insist in the name of the Scarabæus, or for his behoof. If the action lies at all, it must be at the instance of the Pursuer himself, as the Verus Dominus of the Scarabæus, for being calumniated through the conviciam directed principally against the animal standing in that relation to him. Now abstracting from the qualification of an actual damnum, which is not alleged, I have great doubts whether a mere conviciam is necessarily transmitted from one object to another through the relation of a damnum subsisting between them; and if not necessarily transmissible, we must see the principle of its actual transmission here, and that has not yet been pointed out.

Lord H.—m.—d. We heard a little ago, my Lord, that this is a difficult case. I have not been fortunate enough, for my part, to find out where the difficulty lies. Will any man presume to tell me that a Beetle is not a Beetle, and that a Louse is not a Louse? I never saw the Petitioner's Beetle, and what is more, I don't care whether I ever see it or not; but I suppose it's like other Beetles, and that's enough for me.

But, my Lord, I know the other reptile well. I have seen them, my Lord—I have felt them ever since I was a child in my mother's arms; and my mind tells me that nothing but the deepest and blackest malice ranking in the human heart could have suggested this comparison, or led any man to form a thought so injurious and insulting. But, my Lord, there is more here than all that—a great deal more. One would think that the Defender could have gratified his spite to the full by comparing this Beetle to a common Louse—an animal sufficiently vile and abominable for the purpose of defamation.—Shut that outer door there.—He adds, my Lord, the epithet "Egyptian." I well know what he means by that epithet—he means, my Lord, a Louse which has fattened in the head of a gipsy or tinkler, undisturbed by the comb, and unmolested in the enjoyment of its native filth. He means a Louse ten times larger and ten times more abominable than those with which your Lordship or I am familiar. The Petitioner asks redress for this injury so atrocious and so aggravated, and as far as my voice goes, he shall not ask it in vain.

Lord C.—g. I am of the opinion last delivered. It appears to me slanderous and calumnious to compare a Diamond Beetle to the filthy and mischievous animal libelled. By an Egyptian Louse, I understand one which has been found in the head of a native Egyptian, a race of men who, after degenerating for many centuries, have sunk at last into the abyss of depravity in consequence of having been subjugated for a time by the French. I do not find that Turgut, or Condorcet, or the rest of the economists, ever reckoned combing the head a species of productive labour. I conclude, therefore, that wherever French principles have been propagated, lice grow to an immoderate size, especially in a warm climate like that of Egypt. I shall only add, that we ought to be sensible of the blessings we enjoy under a free and happy Constitution, where Lice and men live under the restraints of equal laws—the only equality that can exist in a well-regulated state.

Lord B.—l.—to. Aww for refusing the petition. There more Lice nor Beetles in Fife. They call Beetles Clokes there. I thought when I read the petition, that the Beetle, or Bettie, had been the thing that the women has when they are washing towels or napery, and things for dadding them with. And I see this Petitioner is a jeweller till his trade, and I thought that he had made one of their Beetles, and set it all round with diamonds, and I thought it an extravagant and foolish idea; and I see no resemblance it could have to a Louse. But I find I was mistaken, my Lord, and I find it is only a Beetle Cloke the Petitioner has; but my opinion's the same it was before. I say, my Lord, Awn for refusing the petition I say.

L—d W—st—lee. There is a case abridged in the 3d volume of the Dictionary of Decisions (Chalmers versus Douglas,) in which it was found that veritas convicii excusat, which may be rendered not literally, but in a free and spirited manner, according to the most approved principles of translation. "The truth of a calumny affords a relevant defence." If, therefore, it be the law of Scotland, which I am clearly of opinion it is, that the truth of a calumny affords a relevant defence; and if it be likewise true that the Diamond Beetle is really an Egyptian Louse, I am really inclined to conclude, though certainly the case is attended with difficulty, that the Defender ought to be assolized.—Refuse.

Lord J. C. R—e. I am very well acquainted with the Defender in this notion, and have a great respect for him, and esteem him likewise. I know him to be a skilful and expert surgeon, and also a good man, and I would do a great deal to serve him, or to be of use to him, if I had it in my power to do so; but I think on this occasion that he has spoken rashly, and, I fear, foolishly and improperly. I hope he had no bad intention—I am sure he had not. But the Petitioner, for whom I have likewise a great respect, has a Clock, or a Beetle—I think it is called a Diamond Beetle—which he is very fond of, and has a fancy for; and the Defender has compared it to a Louse, or a Bug, or a Flea, or something of that kind, with a view to make it despicable or ridiculous, and the Petitioner so likewise, as the proprietor or owner of it. It is said that this beast is a Louse in fact, and that the veritas convicii excusat. And mention is made of a decision in the case of Chalmers against Douglas. I have always had a great veneration for the decisions of your Lordships, and I am sure will always continue to have while I sit here; but that case was determined by a very small majority, and I have heard your Lordships mention it on various occasions, and you have always desiderated the propriety of it, and I think have departed from it in some instances. I remember the circumstances of the case very well. Helen Chalmers lived in Musselburgh, and the Defender, Mrs. Baillie, lived in Fisher Row. And at that time there was much intercourse between the genteel inhabitants of Musselburgh, and Fisher Row, and Inveresk, and likewise Newbigging; and there were balls, or dances, or assemblies, every fortnight, and also sometimes, I believe, every week. And there were likewise card-assemblies once a fortnight, or oftener, and the young people danced there also, and others played at cards; and there were various refreshments, such as tea and coffee, and butter and bread, and I believe, but I am not sure, porter and pegus, and likewise small-beer. And it was at one of these assemblies that Mrs. Baillie called Mrs. Chalmers a ———, or an adulteress, and said she had lain with Commissioner Carnel, a gentleman whom I knew well at one time, and had a great deal of respect for;—he is dead many years ago. And Mrs. Chalmers brought an action of defamation before the Commissioners, and it came by advocacy into this Court; and your Lordships allowed a proof of the veritas convicii, and it lasted a long time, and answered in the end no good purpose even to the Defender himself, while it did much harm to the character of the Pursuer.

I am, therefore, for refusing such a proof in this case; and I think the Petitioner and his Beetle have been slandered, and the petition ought to be seen.

Lord P—k—t. It should be observed, my Lords, that what is called a Beetle is a reptile well known in this country. I have seen many a one of them on Drumsheriein Muir. It's a little black beastie about the size o' my thoom-nail. The country-people call them Cloks, and I believe they call them also Maggy wi' the many feet. But this is no the least like any Louse I ever saw; so that in my opinion, though the Defender may have made a blunder through ignorance in comparing them, there does not seem to me to have been any animus injuriandi; therefore I am for refusing the petition, my Lords.

L—d M—n. If I understand this—a—a—a—In-terlocutor, it is not said that the—a—a—a—Egyptian Lice are Beetles, but that they may be, or—a—a—a—resemble Beetles. I am, therefore, for sending this process to the Ordinary to ascertain that fact, as I think it depends upon that whether there be—a—a—a—conviction or not. I think also that the Petitioner should be ordained to—a—a—a—produce his Beetle, and the—a—a—a—Defender an Egyptian Louse; and if he has not one, he should take a diligence—a—a—a—to recover Lice of various kinds, and these may be—a—a—a—remitted to—a—a—a—Dr. Monro, or to—a—a—a—Mr. Playfair, or to other naturalists, to report upon the subject.—Agreed to.—*Lit. THE WEARIED BACHELOR.

The happy day arrived; with dark and unpropitious scowl the clouds hung over head, and threatened to deluge the town: the morning passed slowly but quietly over, and four o'clock had tolled its grateful sound, when I sallied forth towards home. Scarcely had I commenced my route, when the long threatening clouds announced the approach of the tempest by gathering more densely together, and a few straggling drops, like scouts sent from an army, warned me that the whole force of the collected mass was about to descent. It were needless to observe, that when I reached home, I was as completely drenched as if I had been dragged through a horse-pond, which, together with a most violent head-ache, augured a blight to all my expectations. However, not to be daunted, I sat down in a comfortable flannel dressing gown, and, all things considered, I think I did not fail in my duty towards one of the finest turkies my farm-yard ever produced, which, together with a string of delightful sausages, made by the never-failing Jenny, soon put me to rights, and, when the labours of the toilet were completed, I flattered myself, as I looked in the full length glass, that the tout ensemble was tout comme il faut.

The coach was rather tardy in arriving, and every five minutes I grew more nervous lest I should be disappointed, and obliged to walk, in a torrent of rain, through the muddy streets—but, at half-past eight, my ears were regaled by the sound of the carriage wheels, and in less than a quarter of an hour I was at Goodwill's door.

My heart beat high as I entered the room, which was, by the time of my arrival, unpleasantly crowded, and as my name was announced, that most awful ceremony to a bashful man, I fancied every eye was turned upon me, as if they had known where and for what my own glance; Goodwill drew me on towards a very agreeable young lady, a particular friend of his: but I was too much absorbed in my own thoughts to pay any attention to her, and, when dancing was announced, I darted to the door, leaving my new acquaintance to find a partner elsewhere, in hopes of encountering the eyes of Selina.

Every one had left the room, and on looking round I saw not one remaining to keep me company.—In the greatest anxiety I threw myself on a couch which was at hand, and lay in a kind of stupor for a length of time, without any interruption.

After a lapse, as I suppose, of about an hour, I was aroused from my lethargy by a gentle tap of a fan upon my shoulder, Mrs. Goodwill at the same time introducing me to Miss L—, a young lady of no great beauty, but with a very amiable expression of countenance. After a few remarks, such as generally pass between partners, who never before met, she observed my almost total silence, and with that significant and searching look by which a female may almost penetrate into the deepest thoughts; hoped that nothing of a serious nature had transpired. When I had assured her to the contrary, and endeavoured to enter more into the spirit of the evening, she informed me of a most melancholy event, which had thrown my Selina, and her relatives into the deepest affliction and distress—a near relation, in all the ardour of youth had, after a slight frost, been tempted upon the ice, which breaking, he sank in the flood to rise no more. She then told me that, having seen Selina in the morning, she was requested to deliver a packet, at the same time giving into my hands a sealed paper, and perceiving that the chord was touched, in the most obliging manner requested me to permit her to withdraw, which afforded me, as intended, an opportunity of escaping the busy throng.

I immediately drew from my bosom the sacred charge; it was in the fair characters of my lovely Selina's hand; and, although in the utmost solicitude, and full of expectation, yet some indescribable sensation almost prevented me from opening it.

Reflection for a moment succeeded; the most unfavourable result was anticipated; and hopelessness being predominant, I was prepared to enter upon the perusal, whatever should be the decision.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I am sorry that a regard and attention which arose from respectful friendship, have unfortunately excited feelings in your breast, which I never intended nor for a moment thought of. Single life may, in some stage or other, prove lonely, and not altogether the most desirable; but, I assure you, Sir, I cannot be yet persuaded to exchange it for the matrimonial.

The cares of a family require a mind that has some experience; in fact, that is in a degree matured. And, Sir, whilst my own tender age inclines me to question my capability of maintaining that order and discipline, without which, domestic life is irregular and often distasteful, candour obliges me to declare, that the disparity of our years must ever preclude the possibility of our union. What, my dear Sir, is the misery of a widow lady with a young family! And should my thread of life prove shorter than that of mortals generally, and yours not be considerably prolonged, what would become of a family of tender orphans! These, Sir, are considerations which should have some weight, as well as those arising from a dread of single life.

SELINA.

This is a BACHELOR'S FARE! And, I presume, unless I can thaw and wheedle some frozen maiden heart into a supposed attachment, I must accept of some old widow, whose affection can only spring from interest; unite with some hare-brain, who cares only for dress, novels, and Lord Byron; or submit to the solitary or villanous life of a Bachelor!—Oh, dear! oh, dear!

But, pray Mr. Editor of Miss Iris, to which species, in your "Classification of Bachelors," do I belong?—Hear my confession. First, Sir, a pretty face and well-proportioned form; a lively address, with a little see-saw of the hands and expressive twitch of the features; a smart taste in my costume; and a liberal supply of cash. Then, Sir,—(to describe my internals is not quite so easy) a few grains of levity; a few more of affection; and a decent quantum of arrogance. My literary acquirements not too profound; and my general sentiment a little sarcastic. In fact, Sir, I begin to dread that I am confirmed in some pernicious habits which will, or ever should, keep me a bachelor. Yet, I am neither treacherous, nor licentious; never could feel reconciled to injure the sex of my mother and sisters; nor to debase myself by giving occasion to my being pointed at as a libertine, or seducer. This description of creatures I abhor; they are my scorn; and, however elevated they may be in life, I hold them as being only deserving of contempt, even the contempt of the most humble. Thus, Sir, I consider there are many worse, but that there are few possessed of honourable feelings, more unfortunate than the wearied bachelor—

IGNOTO.

THE GLDWICK HERMIT.

There is now living at Glodwick near Oldham, a person of the name of William Butterworth a very singular and eccentric character. About five years ago he built himself a cot with the voluntary assistance of a few of his nearest neighbours, which is finely situated upon a hill; the prospect from it is beautiful and extensive.

The populous towns of Manchester, Stockport, Oldham, and Ashton under Lyne, besides several smaller villages; the counties of York, Chester, Derby, Stafford, and the Welch Hills, may all be seen at or within a few minutes walk of his residence, and with the help of a glass the ancient City of Chester. His cot is rudely built, on one side nearly level with the ground, but in the inside it has a very comfortable and neat appearance. It was his intention originally to have lived retired, but the number of his visitors increasing daily, particularly on Sundays, (none of whom he admits during divine Service) induced him to make an addition of several tents, &c. for their convenience, so that, if wished for, he can accommodate parties with tea &c. His person is as singular as his habits—a red coloured suit, made after the Spanish costume, is his common dress, with boots and hat to correspond.—Add to this a beard, about nine inches long, and you will conclude that the recluse makes no ordinary appearance. He appears very comfortable and contented, and is always glad to see any persons whose curiosity induces them to pay him a visit.

HORACE.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S SCALES.

In days of yore, as Gothic fable tells,
When learning dimly gleam'd from grated cells;
When wild astrology's distorted eye,
Skimm'd the fair field of true philosophy,
And, wandering through the depths of mental night,
Sought dark predictions 'mid the worlds of light;
When curious alchymy, with puzzled brow,
Attempted things which science laughs at now,
Losing the useful purpose, she consults
In vain chimeras, and unknown results.

In those grey times there liv'd a rev'rend sage,
Whose wisdom shed its light on that dark age;
A monk he was, immur'd in cloister'd walls,
Where now the ivy'd ruin crumbling falls,
'Twas a profound seclusion that he chose
The noisy world disturb'd not that repose.
The flow of murmur'ing waters day by day,
And whistling winds, that forced their tardy way
Through rev'rend trees of ages' growth, that made
Around the pile a deep monastic shade;
The chaunted psalm, or solitary pray'r;
Such were the sounds that broke the silence there.

'Twas here, when his sacerdotal rites were o'er,
In the depths of his cell, with his stone-cover'd floor,
Resigning to thought his chimerical brain,
He form'd the contrivance we now shall explain:
But whether by magic, or alchymy's powers,
We know not; indeed, 'tis no business of ours;
Perhaps it was only by patience and care,
At last that he brought his invention to bear;
In youth 'twas projected, but years stole away,
And ere 'twas complete, he was wrinkled and grey.
But an æcis is secure unless energy fails,
And at length he produced the 'Philosopher's Scales.'
What were they? you ask—'you shall presently see;
These scales were not made to weigh sugar and tea;
Oh, no! For such properties wondrous had they,
That qualities, feelings, and thoughts they could weigh Together with articles small or immense,
From mountains or plants to atoms of sense.
Nought was there so bulky, but there it could lay,
And nought so ethereal, but there it would stay,
And nought so reluctant, but in it must go;
All which some examples more clearly will show.

The first thing he tried was the head of Voltaire,
Which retained all the wit that had ever been there;
As weight he threw in the torn scrap of a leaf,
Containing the prayer of the penitent thief,
When the skull rose aloft, with so sudden a spell,
That it bounced like a ball on the roof of the cell.
One time he put in Alexander the Great,
With a garment, that Dorcas had made, for a weight,
And, though clad in armour from sandals to crown,
The hero rose up and the garment went down.
A long row of almshouses, amply endow'd
By a well-esteem'd Pharisee, busy and proud,
Next loaded the scale, while the other was prest,
By those mites the poor widow dropp'd into the chest;
Up flew the endowment, not weighing an ounce,
And down the farthing's worth went with a bounce.
Again he perform'd an experiment rare;
A monk, with austerities bleeding and bare,
Climb'd into the scale, in the other was laid
The head of our Howard, now partly decay'd;
When he found, with surprise, that the whole of his brother
Weigh'd less by some pounds than this bit of the other.
By further experiments, no matter how,
He found that ten chariots weigh'd less than one plough.
A sword, with gilt trappings, rose up in the scale,
Though balance'd by only a tenpenny nail.
A shield and a helmet, a buckler and spear,
Weigh'd less than a widow's uncrystallized tear.
A lord and a lady went up at full sail,
When a bee chanc'd to light on the opposite scale.
Ten doctors, ten lawyers, two courtiers, one earl,
Ten counsellors' wigs, full of powder and curl,
All heap'd in one balance, and swinging from thence,
Weigh'd less than a few grains of candour and sense.
A first water diamond, with brilliants begirt,
Than one good potatoe, just wash'd from the dirt.
But not mountains of silver or gold could suffice
One pearl to outweigh—'twas the pearl of great price.
Last of all the whole world was bowl'd in at the gate,
With the soul of a beggar to serve for a weight,
When the former sprung up with so strong a rebuff,
That it made a vast rent, and escap'd at the roof,
Whence balance'd in air, it ascended on high,
And sail'd up aloft a balloon in the sky,
While the scale, with the soul in, so mightily fell,
That it jerk'd the philosopher out of his cell.

MORAL.

Dear reader, if e'er self deception prevails,
We pray you to try the philosopher's scales;
But if they are lost in the ruins around,
Perhaps a good substitute thus may be found:
Let judgment and conscience in circles be cut,
To which strings of thought may be carefully put;
Let these be made even with caution extreme,
And let impartiality serve for a beam.
Then bring those good actions which pride overrates,
And tear up your motives in bits for the weights.

OLD CHINA.

I have an almost feminine partiality for old china. When I go to see any great house, I inquire for the china closet, and next for the picture gallery. I cannot defend the order of preference, but by saying, that we have all some taste or other, of too ancient a date to admit of our remembering distinctly that it was an acquired one. I can call to mind the first play, and the first exhibition, that I was taken to; but I am not conscious of a time when china jars and saucers were introduced into my imagination.

I had no repugnance then—why should I now have?—to those little, lawless, azure-tintured grotesques, that under the notion of men and women, float about, uncircumscribed by any element, in that world before perspective—a china tea-cup.

I like to see my old friends—whom distance cannot diminish—figuring up in the air (as they appear to our optics), yet on terra firma still—for so we must in courtesy interpret that speck of deeper blue, which the decorous artist, to prevent absurdity, has made to spring up beneath their sandals.

I love the men with women's faces, and the women, if possible, with still more womanish expressions.

Here is a young and courtly Mandarin, banding tea to a lady from a salver—two miles off. See how distance seems to set off respect! And here the same lady, or another—for likeness is identity on tea-cups—is stepping into a little fairy boat, moored on the hither side of this calm garden river, with a dainty mincing foot, which in a right angle of incidence (as angles go in our world) must infallibly land her in the midst of a flowery mead—a furlong off on the other side of the same strange stream!

Farther on—if far or near can be predicated of their world—see horses, trees, pagodas, dancing the hats.

Here—a cow and rabbit couchant, and co-extensive—no objects show, seen through the lucid atmosphere of fine Cathay!

I was pointing out to my cousin last evening, over our Hyson, (which we are old fashioned enough to drink unmixed still of an afternoon) some of these speciosa miracula upon a set of extraordinary old blue china (a recent purchase) which we were now for the first time using; and could not help remarking, how favourable circumstances had been to us of late years, that we could afford to please the eye sometimes with trifles of this sort—when a passing sentiment seemed to over-shade the brows of my companion. I am quick at detecting these summer clouds in Bridget.

"I wish the good old times would come again," she said, "when we were not quite so rich. I do not mean, that I want to be poor; but there was a middle state;"—so she was pleased to ramble on,—in which I am sure we were a great deal happier. A purchase is but a purchase, now that you have money enough and to spare. Formerly it used to be a triumph. When we coveted a cheap luxury (and, O! how much ado I had to get you to consent to it in those times!) we were used to have a debate two or three days before, and to weigh the for and against, and think what we might spare out of, and what saving we could hit upon, that should be an equivalent. A thing was worth buying then, when we felt the money that we paid for it.

"Do you remember the brown suit, which you made to hang upon you, till all your friends cried shame upon you, it grew so thread-bare—and all because of that folio Beaumont and Fletcher, which you dragged home late at night, from Barker's in Covent-garden? Do you remember how we eyed it for weeks before we could make up our minds to the purchase, and had not come to a determination till it was near ten o'clock of the Saturday night, when you set off from Islington, fearing you should be too late—and when the old bookseller with some grumbling opened his shop, and by the twinkling taper (for he was setting bedwards) lighted out the relic from his dusty treasures—and when you lugged it home, wishing it were twice as cumbersome—and when you presented it to me—and when we were exploring the perfectness of it (collating you called it)—and while I was repairing some of the loose leaves with paste, which your impatience would not suffer to be left till day-break—was there no pleasure in being a poor man? or can those neat black clothes which you wear now, and are so careful to keep brushed, since we have become rich and fiscal, give you half the honest vanity, with which you have flattered it about in that over-worn suit—your old corbeau—for four or five weeks longer than you should have done, to pacify your conscience for the mighty sum of fifteen—or sixteen shillings was it?—a great affair we thought it then—which you had lavished on the old folio? Now you can afford to buy any book that pleases you, but I do not see that you ever bring me home any nice old purchases now.

"When you came home with twenty apologies for laying out a less number of shillings upon that print after Lionardo, which we christened the 'Lady Blanch'; when you looked at the purchase, and thought of the money—and thought of the money, and looked again at the picture—was there no pleasure in being a poor man? Now, you have nothing to do but to walk into Colnaghi's (as W—— calls it) and buy a wilderness of Lionardoes. Yet do you?

"Then, do you remember our pleasant walks to Enfield, and Potter's bar, and Waltham, when we had a holyday—holydays, and all other fun, are gone, now we are rich—and the little hand-basket in which I used to deposit our day's fare of savory cold lamb and salad—and how you would pry about at noon-tide for some decent house, where we might go in, and produce our store—only paying for the ale that you must call for—and speculate upon the looks of the landlady, and whether she was likely to allow us a table-cloth,—and wish for such another honest hostess, as Isack Walton has described many a one on the pleasant banks of the Lea, when he went a fishing—and sometimes they would prove obliging enough, and sometimes they would look grudgingly upon us—but we had cheerful looks still for one another, and would eat our plain food savorily, scarcely grudging Piscator his Trout Hall? Now, when we go out a day's pleasuring, which is seldom moreover, we ride part of the way—and go into a fine inn, and order the best of dinners,

'Tis all of heaven this earth can give,
'Tis an immortal dream,

And lustre of the day.

never debating the expense—which, after all, never has half the relish of those chance country snaps, when we were at the mercy of uncertain usage, and a precarious welcome.

"You are too proud to see a play any where now but in the pit or boxes. Do you remember where it was we used to sit, when we saw the battle of Hexham, and the Surrender of Calais, and Bannister and Mrs. Bland in the Children in the Wood—when we squeezed out our shillings a-piece to sit three or four times in a season in the one-shilling gallery—where you felt all the time that you ought not to have brought me—and more strongly I felt obligation to you for having brought me—and the pleasure was the better for a little shame—and when the curtain drew up, what cared we for our place in the house, or what mattered it where we were sitting, when our thoughts were with Rosalind in Arden, or with Viola at the Court of Illyria? You used to say that the gallery was the best place of all for enjoying a play socially—that the relish of such exhibitions must be in proportion to the infrequency of going—that the company we met there, not being in general readers of plays, were obliged to attend the more, and did attend, to what was going on, on the stage—because a word lost would have been a chasm, which it was impossible for them to fill up. With such reflections we consoled our pride then—and I appeal to you, whether, as a woman, I met generally with less attention and accommodation, than I have done since in more expensive situations in the house? The getting in indeed, and the crowding up these inconvenient staircases, was bad enough,—but there was still a law of civility to women recognised to quite as great an extent as we have ever found it in the other passages—and how a little difficulty overcome heightened the snug seat, and the play, afterwards! Now we can only pay our money, and walk in. You cannot see, you say, in the galleries now. I am sure we saw, and heard too, well enough then—but sight, and all, I think, is gone with our poverty.

"There was pleasure in eating strawberries, before they became quite common—in the first dish of peas, while they were yet dear—to have them for a nice supper, a treat. What treat can we have now? If we were to treat ourselves now—that is, to have dainties a little above our means, it would be selfish and wicked. It is the very little more that we allow ourselves beyond what the actual poor can get at, that makes what I call a treat—when two people living together, as we have done, now and then indulge themselves in a cheap luxury, which both like; while each apologises, and is willing to take both halves of the blame to his single share. I see no harm in people making much of themselves in that sense of the word. It may give them a hint how to make much of others. But now—what I mean by the word—we never do make much of ourselves. None but the poor can do it. I do not mean the veriest poor of all, but persons as we were, just above poverty.

"I know what you were going to say, that it is mighty pleasant at the end of the year to make all meet—and much ado we used to have every Thirty-first Night of December to account for our exceedings—many a long face did you make over our puzzled accounts, and in contriving to make it out how we had spent so much—or that we had not spent so much—or that it was impossible we should spend so much next year—and still we found our slender capital decreasing—but then, betwixt ways, and projects, and compromises of one sort or another, and talk of curtailing this charge, and doing without that for the future—and the hope that youth brings, and laughing spirits (in which you were never poor till now), we pocketed up our loss, and in conclusion, with 'lusty brimmers' (as you used to quote it out of hearty cheerful Mr. Cotton, as you called him), we used to welcome in the 'coming guest.' Now, we have no reckoning at all at the end of an old year—no flattering promises about the new year doing better for us."

Bridget is so sparing of her speech on most occasions, that when she gets into a rhetorical vein, I am careful how I interrupt it. I could not help, however, smiling at the phantom of wealth which her dear imagination had conjured up out of a clear income of poor—hundred pounds a year. "It is true we were happier when we were poorer, but we were also younger, my cousin. I am afraid we must put up with the excess, for if we were to shake the superfluous into the sea, we should not much mend ourselves. That we had much to struggle with, as we grew up together, we have reason to be most thankful. It strengthened, and knit our compact closer. We could never have been what we have been to each other, if we had always had the sufficiency which you now complain of. The resisting power—those natural dilations of the youthful spirit, which circumstances cannot straiten—with us are long since passed away. Competence to age is supplemental youth; a sorry supplement indeed, but I fear the best that is to be had. We must ride, where we formerly walked; live better, and lie softer—and shall be wise to do so—than we had means to do in those good old days you speak of. Yet could those days return—could you and I once more walk our thirty miles a-day—could Bannister and Mrs. Bland again be young, and you and I be young to see them—could the good old one shilling gallery days return—they are dreams, my cousin, now—but could you and I at this moment, instead of this quiet argument by our well-carpeted fire-side, sitting on this luxurious sofa—be once more struggling up those inconvenient stair-cases, pushed about, and squeezed, and elbowed by the poorest rabble of poor gallery scramblers—could I once more hear those anxious shrieks of yours—and the delicious Thank God, we are safe, which always followed when the top-most stair, conquered, let in the first light of the whole cheerful theatre down beneath us—I know not the fathom line that ever touched a descent so deep as I would be willing to bury more wealth than Cressus had, or the great Jew R—is supposed to have, to purchase it. And now do just look at that merry little Chinese waiter holding an umbrella, big enough for a bed-tester, over the head of that pretty insipid half-Madonnaish ohit of a lady in that very blue summer-house."—Lon. Mag.

JOHN PHILIP KEMBLE, Esq.

From the Literary Chronicle.

"Pride of the British stage,
A long and last adieu.—CAMPBELL.

Such were the opening and the concluding lines of the ode which one of the first of living poets addressed to the first of living actors, on his retirement from the stage; and they may now be addressed to him with equal propriety, when he has quitted the scenes of life, for the realities of eternity; for even

"The player must desert his mimic scene,
To die indeed,"

and pay that debt of nature from which no portion of humanity is exempt.

John Philip Kemble, whose death has been announced, in a letter from Lausanne, as having taken place in that city, on the 25th of February, was born on the 2nd of February, 1757, at Prescott, in Lancashire. His father, Mr. Roger Kemble, who married Miss Ward, the daughter of a country manager, in Wales, was manager of a company of comedians, and thus the subject of our memoir was not only connected with the stage by descent, but by early association. His father was a Roman Catholic, who, after placing his son at the seminary of Sedgely Park, in Staffordshire, sent him to the English college at Douay, with a view to qualify him for the priesthood. This celebrated seat of learning has produced many learned, accomplished, and eminent persons; and, at the time Mr. J. P. Kemble was a student, he distinguished himself by the strength of his memory and his talent for elocution. Having gone through his academical course with much reputation, he returned to England before the age of twenty, without the consent of his family. He arrived at Bristol, and walked to Gloucester, when, finding that his father's company was at Brecknock, he followed him to that place, but met with a cold reception; his father, not only refusing to acknowledge him, but even to relieve his necessities, which were urgent. The performers, however, with that liberality which eminently distinguishes the perhaps too thoughtless but amiable character of the profession, entered into a subscription for assisting him, to which, it is said, his father, with great reluctance, was induced to contribute a guinea.

Denied paternal support and protection, Mr. Kemble left Brecknock, and joined Chamberlin's itinerant company at Wolverhampton. Here, in 1776, he made his first appearance on any stage, in the character of Theodosius, in the Force of Love, with considerable success. His profits, however, were scanty, and his wants great; in order, therefore, to procure more money and reputation than his situation afforded him, he joined with the manager of Cheltenham Theatre, in order to give a miscellaneous entertainment. Young Kemble was to lecture, and his partner to entertain the company with legerdemain. Kemble gained great credit by his eloquence, and his coadjutor by his dexterity, but neither of them made money. After this, Mr. Kemble joined a company at Worcester, where he remained until his sister (Mrs. Siddons) introduced him to Mr. Younger. From this time his improvement was rapid, until he attained the highest reputation and celebrity in his profession. It was about this period he produced Belisarius, a tragedy, and The Palace of Mercy, a poem.

He afterwards united himself to the York company, and went with the manager, Tate Wilkinson, to Edinburgh, where he delivered a lecture on oratory, which was highly spoken of. In 1782, he joined Mr. Daly's company in Dublin, where he first appeared in Hamlet. In The Count of Narbonne he likewise acquired great applause. His attempts in comedy were certainly not attended with equal success. When Mrs. Cowley's Belle's Stratagem was first represented in Dublin, he performed the part of Sir George Touchwood; and here his biographers observe, that he discovered more spirit behind the scenes than before them; for the manager, Mr. Daly, who played Doricourt, having requested he would exert himself a little more, and take example from him, it so offended our hero, that he immediately changed his dress, and could not be prevailed upon to resume it until an apology was made by Mr. Daly.

A curious anecdote is related of Mr. Kemble, which happened about this time. During his first performance of Mark Anthony, in All for Love, his attention was arrested by an antiquated figure, with a listening trumpet to his ear, and he could scarcely preserve his gravity. Being in a very pathetic scene, his endeavour to restrain his muscles was mistaken for agitation. At length, unable to contain himself, to the great astonishment of Octavia (Mrs. Inchbald) and her children, and the still greater astonishment of the audience, he burst out into an immoderate laugh, and it was a considerable time before he could sufficiently recover a command of countenance to enable him to conclude the performance.

Mr. Kemble had before this time commenced author. At Liverpool, in 1778, he produced a tragedy in the pool of Belisarius, in the following year, a farce, entitled, The Female Officer, (sometimes called the Projects), produced at York; and, in 1780, an alteration of The Comedy of Errors, called, Oh! It's Impossible. About the same time, he published a collection of verses, under the title of Fugitive Pieces, with which he was so much dissatisfied, that, the very day, after they were in print, he destroyed every copy of them he could recover from the publisher, or elsewhere: and rendered them so rare, that a copy of these birth-strangled poems, a few years ago, sold for 3l. 5s. At York, Mr. Kemble tried what was then called, a new species of entertainment, consisting of the recitation of popular pieces in prose and verse; and, in Edinburgh, he delivered a lecture on sacred and profane oratory.

On the 30th of Sept. 1783, Mr. Kemble made his first appearance on the London boards, at Drury Lane Theatre, in the character of Hamlet, and was received with immense applause. In the year 1787, he was married to Mrs. Brereton, widow of the late Mr. Brereton, and daughter of Mr. Hopkins, formerly prompter of Drury Lane Theatre. We shall venture to relate an anecdote which led to this event, though we have reason to believe Mr. Kemble has never had occasion to regret the circumstance which accelerated the attainment of his domestic felicity.

"A certain nobleman having discovered in his daughter symptoms of a lurking passion in favour of our hero, sent to request an interview. In the course of the conference which took place, his lordship very politically observed, that to prosecute the enterprise, on the part of Mr. Kemble, would be a fruitless and vain attempt—that proper and effectual means of precaution would be adopted to render the completion of such a project abortive; and finally, that even in an extreme case, no pecuniary advantage would accrue. Yet, as he wished to keep his mind at ease, and not be under the necessity of standing sentinel over his daughter, he was willing to make a proposal, by acceding to which, Mr. Kemble would at once consult his own interest, and secure his lordship's peace. His lordship then proceeded to state, that provided Mr. Kemble would quiet his paternal apprehensions, by taking to himself a wife, he would give him the sum of 4000l. within a certain given period, after the celebration of the nuptials. With respect to the person of his future partner for life, he left Mr. Kemble (with the exception of one lady,) to his own unbiassed choice, only stipulating that the match should take place within a fortnight at the farthest.

"In consequence of this conversation, our hero began to cast his eyes about him, and soon fixed his choice on Mrs. Brereton. The courtship was instantly commenced, and Mrs. Brereton once more consented to become a bride.

"In due course of time, Mr. Kemble waited upon his lordship to claim the performance of his promise. His lordship received him with great politeness, and congratulated him on his nuptials; but when he proceeded to refresh his lordship's memory with respect to the promised dowry, he was rebuffed in a strain of the most cutting and severe irony;—a talent, indeed, for which his lordship was eminently celebrated. He was asked what interest his lordship could have in his domestic arrangements? On what plea he expected to be paid 4000l. for marrying a pretty girl? Was he in earnest, or was he acting? His lordship was fully sensible of, and duly admired, his great theatrical talents, but there was no occasion for him to assume the actor in the present instance—his lordship would take an early opportunity of witnessing his excellent performance on the public stage; meanwhile he begged leave to assure him of the high sense he entertained of his professional merit; and, with these remarks, his lordship very politely took his leave."

BRITISH INSTITUTION GALLERY.

Rubens Chapeau de Paille.—This picture well merits the celebrity that has resounded throughout the world of Art, though it is confined to the portraiture of a handsome and engaging young woman. It is one of the most perfect portrait specimens of the chief attributes of the Flemish Printer's works—splendour of light and colour, and a penetrating spirit of nature. Nothing on canvass was ever more vital. Genius has almost "breathed into it the breath of life."—She is dressed in a large black Spanish (not straw) hat and feather, with her flaxen hair seen under it on each side of her smooth and broad forehead; a black bodice or waist, crimson and swelled sleeves, grey scarf, and white open cape. This dress is different from the flowing simplicity of the Greeks, so nobly adopted by the Italian Painters, but possesses much constrained elegance, especially in the felicitous way in which the light waving feather and scarf and full sleeves give ease and contrast to the more compact bodice, and in the relief which the white, black, and red dress gives to the fair face, hands, and bosom. The bosom is collapsed, but notwithstanding this defect, Rubens and Nature have rendered it a pillow for Affection and for Care to repose upon. The light in the picture, which shews every part of it with an unglaring distinctness, and which shines from a blue and nubilous is here brightest, so that the bosom, with its azure streaks and alabaster surface, looks like a double domed sanctuary of light—that emblem and effluence of Deity. The spectator's attention is divided between this duplicated delight, and the throne of the soul's expression, the face. It possesses the sweetness of innocence, and the sobriety of thought. The eye, in its living liquidness, is a clear grey, large and reflecting, and would become the face of even one of Raffaele's pictures of Minerva. The nose, which appears a little too decidedly Roman, and which the painter has therefore given nearly in front, is otherwise well formed. The mouth is a poet's and moral philosopher's exemplification of goodness, of tranquillity of mind, and beauty. The chin becomes and aids its expression, and finishes the fine oval of the entire head. The hands are lifted up towards the bosom, one resting with mild grace on the left arm, the other holding the scarf with a contrasting earnestness. The complexion throughout is a delicate carnation whiteness, tinted here and there with blue. Throughout there is nothing of the coarseness so common in Rubens's women, but a refinement of sentiment, and in many respects of shape, that would become any Italian Master, with a correspondent finish in the execution. The utmost harmony and richness address the eye in the picture colour, as does the most delicate character in the complexion and mind of the represented lady. The flutes of Rudel and Nicholson are not more delicate and mellifluous. She is one of Art's blandishments, or rather of Nature's representatives. In the meridian of youth, the visual epitome of mental and of much personal beauty, and painted by one of the most favoured sons of Genius, in his most felicitous hours.* The pictured fair has become one of the darlings of taste—of all who see her.

* She was Rubens's first love, but died without being married to him. In the painting there is indication of a delicate constitution. It has been an heirloom in the possessor's family at Antwerp: 20,000l. are said to have been refused for it, and it has come into England in consequence of the death of the last heir. No copy has ever been permitted to be painted from it.

Solution of No. 46, in the Iris No. 33, by Jack at a Pinch.

The 12 gallon cask will evidently be filled in 38 minutes, and the liquor will then instantly begin to overflow, and continue to do so for 28 minutes.

Let us then suppose s equal to some exceedingly small portion of time; $m = 480'' = 8'$; $a = 12$ gallons, and $b = 8$ gallons. Now, as $m : 1 :: s : \frac{s}{m}$ the quantity of inferior gin run into the cask during the time s ; and, as $a + \frac{s}{m} : \frac{s}{m} :: b : \frac{bs}{am + s}$ the quantity of the superior kind of gin run over in the same time. Consequently, the quantity of the best gin left in the cask, at the expiration of the time s , will be,

$$b - \frac{bs}{am + s} = \frac{bam}{am + s}$$

$$\text{Again, as } a + \frac{s}{m} : \frac{s}{m} :: \frac{bam}{am + s} : \frac{bams}{(am + s)^2}$$

$$\text{And, } \frac{bams}{am + s} - \frac{bams}{(am + s)^2} = \frac{b(am)s}{(am + s)^2}$$

$$\text{Also, as } a + \frac{s}{m} : \frac{s}{m} :: \frac{b(am)s}{(am + s)^2} : \frac{b(am)s^2}{(am + s)^3}$$

$$\text{And, } \frac{b(am)s^2}{(am + s)^2} - \frac{b(am)s^2}{(am + s)^3} = \frac{b(am)s^3}{(am + s)^3}$$

A series is hence evident, of which it is necessary to determine the last term.

If we now take t for the number of times s is contained in 28'; we have $$\frac{b(am)^t}{(am + s)^t}, \text{ a formula that will}$$ designate the quantity of superior gin left in the cask at the expiration of 28'. The quantity s may be here taken at pleasure; let us then suppose $s = 1''$; the formula, $\frac{b(am)^t}{(am + s)^t}$ will then in numbers, be, $8 \times$ $(5760)^{\frac{1}{1680}} \div (5761)^{\frac{1}{1680}}$; which, in log, is $\log. 8 - (\log. 5761 - \log. 5760) \times 1680 = \log. 5.976$ gallons, the quantity of superior gin in the cask at the end of one hour.

The value of the mixture left in the 12 gallon cask will then be $(5.976 \times 10) + (6.024 \times 6) = 95.904$ shillings = £4 15s. 10d. 848; and the value of the mixture run over, will be $(2.024 \times 10) + (3.5 \times 6) = 41.24$ shillings = £2 1s. 2d. 88.

DESCRIPTION OF A PIECE OF PLATE PRESENTED TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE CANNING.

The most minute description of this splendid specimen of British art, can convey to the mind only a very faint idea of the richness and beauty of the original. It is a centre ornament or candelabrum, forty-two inches high, and upwards of sixty in circumference at the base. It is silver gilt, and weighs upwards of one thousand ounces. The base is in the tripod form, and rests upon three tortoises. In the plinth are three compartments, six inches wide by two and a half high. The first compartment contains a view of the port of Liverpool. A ship under sail appears in the foreground of the picture, and in the background George's Dock Pierhead, with St. Nicholas's Church, the Town-hall, St. Paul's, St. George's, and St. Thomas's Churches in the distance. The second compartment contains a representation of a section of the Town-hall. The scene chosen is that of an election. Hastings are erected in the front: bars for several candidates are open: a crowd of spectators is congregated before them; and a coach, filled with voters in the interest of Mr. Canning, accompanied by music and flags, having inscribed on them "The British Constitution," "The Friend of the Pilot that weather'd the storm," "Canning for ever!" &c., is in the act of approaching Mr. Canning's bar. The right honourable gentleman appears in the centre of the bar, surrounded by his friends, in the act of addressing the multitude of spectators, some of whom are elevated upon the hustings, loudly cheering their favourite candidate. The "State of the Poll" appears on the side of Mr. Canning's bar; and, in the distance, the lofty buildings on the north side of Dale-street are seen, their windows and roofs crowded with spectators. The third compartment exhibits a view of the interior of the House of Commons. The speaker is in the chair: the mace is on the table before him: the benches are crowded with members; and Mr. Canning is represented as standing on the floor, in the act of addressing the Chair. The base of the pedestal represents a coral rock. Upon it, at the angles, are seated three beautiful classic figures, under palm-tree leaves. The first figure is emblematical of SCIENCE. In her hand she holds a book, written in Oriental characters, which she is in the act of perusing. At her feet are spread a variety of appropriate scientific instruments and symbols. The second figure is a personification of NAVIGATION. The compass rests upon her knee; and in her hand she holds the log-line and lead. On the right, at her feet, a staff, with a union jack on it, an anchor and cable, a rudder, a capstern, and other nautical emblems are appropriately disposed: on the right, a buoy. COMMERCE is the third figure. She holds in her right hand a laurel crown, and in her left a palm branch, emblematic of the peace and harmony which commercial intercourse creates amongst the different nations of the globe. Various appropriate symbols are displayed at her feet. On the right appear a bale of goods and other articles of commercial traffic: on the left, a cornucopia, or horn of plenty, the caduceus, &c. &c. These three personifications of the Genius of Science, of Navigation, and of Commerce are exquisitely beautiful. The figures are most chastely executed, and the drapery is well disposed. They are amongst the most prominent excellencies of the design. On the pedestal, between these figures, are three tablets. The first tablet exhibits the arms of the borough of Liverpool, tastefully executed. The next displays Mr. Canning's arms, richly embossed, with the motto—Ne cede malis sed contra. The third contains the inscription, very neatly executed, on a flat gold field, in raised bright letters. It is as follows:—

PRESENTED

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
GEORGE CANNING,
BY A NUMEROUS BODY OF HIS FRIENDS, FREEMEN AND INHABITANTS OF LIVERPOOL, ON HIS BEING APPOINTED GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA,
JULY, 1822.
IN GRATEFUL ACKNOWLEDGMENT
OF HIS ZEALOUS AND IMPARTIAL ATTENTION TO THE INTEREST OF ALL HIS CONSTITUENTS, FOR A PERIOD OF TEN YEARS,
IN THE COURSE OF WHICH
HE HAS BEEN FOUR TIMES ELECTED
THEIR REPRESENTATIVE IN PARLIAMENT;
AND IN TESTIMONY OF THEIR RESPECT,
AS WELL FOR HIS PRIVATE VIRTUES
AS FOR HIS DISINTERESTED AND INDEPENDENT PUBLIC CONDUCT;
AND OF THEIR ADMIRATION OF THOSE TRANSCENDENT TALENTS,
AS A STATESMAN AND AN ORATOR,
WITH WHICH HE HAS UNIFORMLY AND FEARLESSLY MAINTAINED THE TRUE PRINCIPLES OF THE BRITISH CONSTITUTION.

A handsome fluted naval column springs from the pedestal. Its base is begirt with a cable; and three dolphins are represented disporting themselves at the angles. On the upper part of the column, and surrounding it, are inscribed, "Election of 1812," "Election of 1816," "Election of 1818," "Election of 1820;" the four periods at which Mr. Canning was returned to Parliament as representative of Liverpool. Above these inscriptions appear the prows of three ships, with figura-heads; the first representing a native of Asia, the second of Africa, and the third of America. The capital of the column is beautifully obaste. From it issue acanthus leaves; attached to which are branches for nine lights. The summit of the whole is crowned by a beautiful classic figure, emblematic of the Genius of Liverpool, her right hand resting on a ship's rudder, and her left on a broad and glittering shield, with the fabulous bird, the LIVER, depicted on it. On her head she wears a mural crown; and her drapery falls in simple elegance over her finely proportioned form.

As a work of art, this splendid piece of plate is decidedly of the first class. There is an unity and elegance in the design, equalled only by the exquisite manner in which its various parts are finished. The work reflects the highest credit on Mr. Chantry, the designer, and on the various artists who have been employed in executing this beautiful specimen of British genius and skill.

We understand, that the whole cost of the plate will be about one thousand guineas.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR,—In a contemporary paper of the 18th instant, a writer who signs himself "Who would be an Emperor?" introduces a list of the Roman Emperors thus:—

"Perusing lately the History of the Empire of Rome, I was led into a melancholy train of reflection on the instability of human greatness. If the following table will be at all interesting to any of your readers, it is much at your service. Perhaps it may not be strictly correct to call Julius Cæsar the first Emperor; but, as he was the first who assumed absolute authority, I have ventured to call him so, in preference to his immediate successor.—I am, Sir, your humble servant,
WHO WOULD BE AN EMPEROR?"

Now, Sir, in a small volume, published a century ago, and entitled "THE MORALS OF PRINCES," page 388, there is an interesting table, a copy of which I enclose you, and from which it may be left to your readers to decide which of the two persons, "Count Comassi," or "Who would be an Emperor?" really is the Historical reader, reflector, and writer! The public is now so imposed upon by would-be-writers, readers, reflectors, and mathematicians, as to make it incumbent upon every man of sense to explode the pretensions of these insignificant "MAGPIES."

ON THE DISINTERMENT OF THE DEAD.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—From the considerations which have recently appeared in your paper, relative to the present greatly agitated subject, the disinterment of the dead, I have been induced to send the following observations, which, though hasty and unconnected, will, I trust, prove acceptable. It may appear ill-timed, and even presumptuous, in an individual like myself, endeavouring to ratify a practice which has received the disapproval of the legislature; and which has likewise been so strenuously advocated by the prompt and able endeavours of Mr. Abernethy; but, nevertheless, since so peculiar an interest still hangs on the subject, I feel justified in offering my opinion.

Perhaps no subject ever presented itself, on which the public were more closely linked by concurring sentiments, and certainly none ever had a greater claim to their unanimous attention.—It is, as one of our literary friends aptly expresses it, a plea to the 'sympathies of nature,'—a call to humanity herself. Admitting this, we cannot wonder that the public should take umbrage at a practice so discordant with the finest feelings of the breast, nor can we be surprised that the heart should sicken at the brutality to which it seems allied.—But this subject, moreover calls their attention, inasmuch as the most valuable of earthly blessings is through its means so carefully maintained: and though the idea of dismembering a body chills their senses with horror, they cannot but admit that their sympathy is awakened with feelings of a kindred nature.—They prize the effects, yet condemn the cause. While they would willingly sacrifice the root as noxious and offensive, they would preserve the stem as salutary and beneficial.—Feelings so instinctively woven with each other, and yet affecting the mind so differently, must consequently operate strongly on the sceptical and inconsiderate, and cause them to disavow the usefulness of that which wounds their sensibility. They judge from their momentary feelings, and applaud or condemn indiscriminately, without reference to that cool and deliberate reasoning which is the test of every species of knowledge. Under such influence, I repeat, it is not to be wondered at, that so universal a censure should have been passed on the practice of disinterment and dissecting the human subject.—But though the mind recoils at the thought of disturbing the sanctity of the dead, does it not feel a corresponding satisfaction in the assurance of its contributing to the welfare of the living? Is humanity to blush because she finds a certain but painful remedy for counteracting the evils of the afflicted? Let us pause ere we too rudely designate a practice that is only offensive in the thought.

The late proceedings of the legislature on this subject, together with the clamour of contending parties, have done much to prejudice the public mind, and have so far excited in it a disgust that no subsequent argument or representation, however clearly illustrated, will easily appease.—The practice which has ever been equally unnatural and disgusting, was before viewed by the more rational portion of the community, as one in which they were vitally concerned,—but now, through the interference of a few petty scribblers, who have represented the acquisition of medical knowledge as totally unconnected with the examination of the human body, and who have promulgated a notion that it is a mere compulsory measure specified in the existing laws of the college,—the public deem it nothing less than a gross infringement on their rights and religious enactments. The offence seems rather to exist in giving publicity to the practice, than to the practice itself.—But in considering this subject;—the most prominent question is, can anatomical knowledge be gained by any other means less repugnant to the feelings than human dissections?—or what will compensate for the want of this practice?—Every one who can lay claim to common candour or common sense, will be readily convinced that anatomy and physiology form the basis of medical science, and that without them the hand of the surgeon is benumbed, while the sagacity of the physician is mocked. Then who can affirm that an actual development of the structure of the human fabric is unnecessary or uncalled for in the study of this art?—Nature herself must be consulted,—and her innumerable springs of vital action, too minute for the pencil of art, must be severally traced before she rewards her votaries with a knowledge of her secret wonders. What avails the most accurate delineation of the whole, or a portion of the animal frame, or even the most perfect anatomical preparation to the practical surgeon? Is a detached engraving, with a few petty references, or a mutilated viscus, an adequate substitute for the solid and undivided parts of the body, whose connections and approximations with each other, constitute the essence of anatomical knowledge? Can the scalpel be confidently employed on the living subject, when its only guide is a superfluous admixture of light and shade?

That the actual demonstration of the human subject may be superceded by plates, models, and museums, is almost too absurd to merit the pains of refutation. Neither descriptions by language nor pencil, nor any other artificial means, can give to the medical practitioner that confidence and noble daring which is an essential in the proper exercise of his art. Moreover, were it not for a minute survey and demonstration of the human subject,—a close observance of its mechanical organization,—the memory of the student, however close his attention, could not retain one third of the requisite information. In short, the whole frame must meet his touch, as well as his sight.

Notwithstanding the rapid progress which the noble art of medicine has made during this and the last century, (which in the main may be attributed to the accessory means of hospital dissections), it should be remembered that it is as yet only in its infancy. The prevention, therefore, of anatomical demonstration is the removal of its firmest support—and will not only retard its future progression, but hazard its downfall. The recent proceedings of the legislature have in part succeeded in placing this obstacle to its advancement, and since the grounds of their impeachment are strongly biased by public feeling and party prejudice,—they render abortive every measure that might be suggested to counteract its pernicious influence. Mr. Abernethy's proposals for remedying the prohibition of disinterment are certainly the most reasonable that could be offered, as well as the most efficient for maintaining the dignity and celebrity of medical science, and whilst they effect this, they would doubtless be the means of deterring much of that crime and depravity which the most rigorous discipline of the legislature has as yet been unable to suppress.

It would be needless to trespass further on your columns by commenting on the vituperative and illiberal strictures of either your friends of Liverpool, or your Greek-lettered correspondent. They need only be read to be condemned. Your's respectfully,

March 17th, 1823.

TO A FADED BEAUTY.

Oh, where is the beauty which once was admir'd,
And where is the rose-bloss that glow'd on thy cheek;
Now pale are the features each bosom that fir'd,
And the smile once so haughty, is humble and meek.
Proud Syren of beauty, thy triumph is o'er,
Proud fair one, thy shining meridian is past;
And the music of flattery assails thee no more,
And the charms which thou boasted, are faded at last.

Why trembles the tear in thy languid blue eye?
Why stifles the sob, which thy bosom hath torn?
Ah, thou mournest the loss of that fair vermeil dye;
Thou mournest for pleasures that ne'er will return.

Despised and neglected, a prey unto sorrow,
Thou remember'st the charms which were thine, but in vain,
Thus the flower which is blooming to-day, shall to-morrow
When faded as thou art, be thrown on the plain.

And like it, thou art blotted from beauty's fair page,
For Nature demanded each grace that she lent;
Then prepare thy proud heart for the wrinkles of age,
And share in thy turn the keen smile of contempt.
Salford, March, 10th, 1823. J. W.

IMPROMPTU.

TO H—H—

So Harriett you chide me and ask me my reason,
For not thinking one of those "pretty girls" fair,
I'll tell you, so do not find fault with my taste love,
You happened yourself to be there.

The stars in the night-time are all very well love,
They pale 'neath the radiance and lustre of day;
And so in thy presence the charms of each beauty,
Contrasted, are faded away.

THOS. HALL.

LINES TO

Though wide oceans between us triumphantly roll,
Yet the last look thou gav'st me still lives in my soul!
Though the speech of my country no longer I hear,
Yet thy fault'ring farewell is still fresh in my ear!

I know that I ne'er more shall gaze on thy charms,
And I know they are destined for happier arms;
I know thou art chang'd and my love is despised,
Yet that love I still cherish—those charms are still prized.

And thou canst not forget me.—My spirit shall dwell
For ever on thine, like a powerful spell!
In vain would'st thou bid the remembrance depart,
It closer and closer shall cling to my heart.

In thy loveliest musings, my name shall be there,
In thy mirth shall it mingle—intrude on thy prayer!
And oft in the visions of night shalt thou see,
The form that has wither'd and faded for thee.

VARIETIES.

SIR W. SCOTT'S NEW NOVEL.—Two volumes of the new novel are already printed. The title-pages of the work, however, have not yet been struck off; least, as in the case of Peveril, some German manufacturer of romance should forestall the name. This scheme of title-stealing was devised by a bookseller at Leipzig, to anticipate a rival in the trade who contrived to secure the earliest impressions of Sir W. Scott's novels. As he could not get the real book in time, he employed a doctor—not of medicine—to write a novel under the name of the advertised work, and this he passed off on the Germans as being a translation from the Scotch.

A SHREWD ENQUIRY.—A man of Fashion, residing at no great distance from Grosvenor-square, who is remarkably ill-looking, but very vain, keeps a valet, whose countenance is not much more amiable than his own. One day, the servant, while dressing his master, offended him, and he exclaimed, "What an ugly dog!" The fellow, who observed his master at the time very attentive at his glass, said, "Which of us do you mean, sir?"

AN AMERICAN COURT OF JUSTICE.—A Virginia gentleman who had visited Pittsburgh, to attend a trial, gave a singular description of the manners of an American court of justice. Neither counsel nor judge, as is well known, wear a gown. The barrister retained in the present instance, being incommoded by heat, first stripped off his coat and then his waistcoat. In an interval of pleading, he put a segar in his mouth, and deliberately smoked it, till the opposite counsel had wound up his reply.

PUFFING.—The following instance of theatrical puffing surpasses any thing we recollect in this country. At the Theatre, in Vienna, a whale makes its appearance on the stage. The Affiche says, "this vast monster of the deep, by the most ingenious mechanism, is made to vomit forth wine (Tokay wine!) from his nostrils, and every spectator, willing to pay one florin, may receive in his own basin Tokay wine of the value of three florins."—Credat?

Friday.—For the Benefit of Mrs. Bunn.—Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland: with High Life Below Stairs. Queen Elizabeth and Mrs. Kitty—Mrs. Bunn.

On Wednesday evening MRS. BUNN personated Donna Olivia, in Mrs. Cowley's Comedy of "a Bold Stroke for a Husband." Of the witchery of countenance and gesture, Mrs. B. gave many examples; and her mockery of her musical lover, Don Vincentio, by a faithful observance of the instructions of her father, Don Cesar, was not one of the least mortifying specimens of female artifice and perversity. MRS. HALL, as Donna Victoria, was very interesting; a little more spirit, and this lady's performance would entitle her to a marked distinction.—Her voice and appearance are prepossessing; but, the former is somewhat too plaintive, and that too in parts in which cheerfulness, if not vivacity, should be predominant. The character of Don Julio was very well sustained by MR. BROWN. When MR. BASS destroyed his epistle to Donna Victoria, his repentance and seriousness were injudiciously betrayed—there was something of levity in his countenance, and flurry, or agitation in his manner, which completely counteracted the legitimate intention. MR. REES might be, in reality and truth, a humorous, whimsical, old fellow—he is ever at home in the capricious, petulant, and jocular.

ESSAY

ON CALORIC AND COLD, AS CONNECTED WITH
ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM.

Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas.

CALORIC is the cause of expansion of all bodies, solid and fluid. By its intense action solids pass into the fluid state, as is seen in the fusion of metals, and fluids become gaseous, as is observed in steam-engines. Excessive heat causes the separation of organic molecules in three kingdoms of nature, to which, after analysing causes and effects, I add a fourth, to which I give the name of meteorical. This comprehends water, atmospheric air, and ether, in which vast space, the powerful empire of caloric is particularly established. This great agent gives birth to the electric fluid, and by rarifying water, air, and ether, gives life and motion to all nature. The sun is its primary source, and volcanos, are its various reservoirs. We may thus, I think, explain how mount Hecla, and so many other volcanos, placed by the hand of the Creator in icy regions, vomit perpetual flames, while those situated in temperate climates, or under the torrid zone, are subject only to periodical eruptions. It is thus that I also explain why, before the famous eruption of Vesuvius in 1779, the sun was for many days deprived of its rays and usual heat, which circumstance has been observed to take place more or less before every eruption. These reservoirs are intended to counterbalance the other agent of nature, which tends to the condensation of organic molecules, and without which the earth would shortly be consumed, and by which, without the first, it would soon be reduced to an inert mass, which is proved by the congelation of spirits, and the change of quicksilver to a solid state, in approaching the poles. The former is to be considered as the primary support of life, as is evinced in the process of incubation, and the latter as the final cause of death, which is proved by its usurping the place of the former, in a body that has ceased to live. The reservoirs of this last are situated about the poles, and on the tops of mountains. The absence of such reservoirs in this country, is the reason why places under the same latitude as others in Europe, are subject, notwithstanding, to much greater vicissitudes of cold and heat. In fact, instead of mountains for ever covered with snow and ice, we have here merely immense lakes, which receive and transmit successively, heat and cold, with the same facility as these are transmitted to them. The presence of the Andes, and the elevation of the soil in South America, sufficiently explain why the heat is not so excessive under the equator, as it is in North America. The above circumstances equally explain why the sky is here more serene than in Europe, why the summers and winters are so long, that they absorb, as it were, spring and autumn. The last season is here so fine, that it seems a spring in which nature throws off, instead of putting on, a new dress. This remarkable temperament, has given rise to the name of Indian Summer. In favour of what I have advanced, without having the temerity, however, to wish to put myself in comparison with the immortal Newton, I would observe, that before him, it was unknown why the vast bodies which roll over us, with so much harmony, without clashing or confusion, were so preserved in order. To him alone belongs the honour of having been the first to declare, that if these bodies performed their revolutions without interrupting and destroying each other, they obeyed the law of the Creator, who had assigned to each a power of repulsion and attraction. The existence of the two great agents above-mentioned, and their known action in balancing each other for the preservation of this sublime creation, aid me in penetrating to the cause of repulsion and attraction, which are also the effect or result of two other agents; I have reference to the electric and magnetic fluid.

I have already observed, that caloric is the parent of electricity, and I will prove finally, that in proportion as that agent takes possession of a body, which conceals within itself the magnetic fluid, that fluid leaves the same. For instance, a piece of iron rendered magnetic, loses almost entirely its power of attraction when raised to a white heat, and it does not recover that power until cold again returns; whence, it necessarily follows, that magnetism and electricity are diametrically opposed, as are heat and cold, and that if caloric is the parent of the one, cold must be the parent of the other. As I have already proved that the poles and high mountains are the reservoirs of that agent to which I give the name of frigoric, it follows that the magnetic needle obeys its influence by turning towards the former, and that its attraction is always augmented, in proportion as it is placed in an elevated situation, that is to say, in proportion to the degree of cold. To these two proofs, which would be alone sufficient to confirm my doctrine, I will add a third, capable of subduing scepticism itself; viz. the attraction of the north pole of a magnet, by the south pole of another, and the repulsion of the latter by the south pole of the former, and vice versa. Truth, like the sun, illuminates the world; and like him, can never be obscured by the sombre shades of night. The sun is a body of fire, from which proceeds light and caloric. Light is only an attribute of caloric, but caloric is the parent of electricity, the effects of which are always accompanied and rendered sensible by light. By the rule that all extremes meet in a point, I advance, that as cold is the opposite extreme to heat, it is the parent of a fluid as necessary to the existence of nature, as caloric itself, with this difference, that the effects of the former are rendered sensible by light, while magnetism being entirely void of that quality, acts without striking our senses, except by its effects. Hence it follows naturally, that caloric may act by reflection, and that cold cannot. I am of opinion that the great phenomenon of Aurora Borealis, is produced by a combination of electricity and magnetism, accompanied by the absorption of light.

ON THE DECLENSION OF DRAMATIC EXHIBITIONS.

"Whatever contradicts my sense
I hate to see, and never can believe."
ROSCOMMON.

Amongst the numerous spectacles which the caterers of public taste have instituted as combining utility with pleasure, none have suffered so great a Declension as the Drama. Whether it be the effect of an overstrained desire on the part of its managers to render it doubly attractive, or a disaffection of public zeal in behalf of scenic representations,—or whether, like many other species of philosophy which flourished in former ages, the Drama has already risen to its extreme climax, and is now in its retrogression,—is altogether an inquiry fraught with considerable doubt and obscurity. Certain, it is however, that the tide of popularity flows towards the momentary impulses of sensual feeling, rather than the more substantial excitement of mental gratification. Though both may be indulged to a certain extent in the Drama—yet through some inconceivable mishap, the former has entirely engrossed the precedence of the latter. Morality is changed into obscenity,—wit into buffoonery; and that which is calculated to soothe the passions, and instil every virtuous principle, is so mutilated and abused, as to render the finer feelings callous to sensibility and defenceless against every attack of vice. Most of those active instructions which are admirably adapted for the improvement of our species, and which were once duly estimated as the flower of dramatic genius, are now trampled underfoot, for some paltry burlesque, and unintelligible mimicry, which tend both to deprave the understanding and demoralize the social habits. Indeed the prevalence of public taste towards low and vulgar scenes has gained such an ascendancy over the moral inculcations of the Drama, that what was intended to destroy corruption and substitute refinement, now, only serves to give additional lustre to sin, and offer a loose rein to the passions. The notions of tragedy now existing are nothing more than a display of knight-errantry, and the chivalric exploits of adventurous lovers. Comedy is metamorphosed into buffoonery, and instead of exposing the deformities of vice and resisting its alluring influence, it is made to display all its pleasures, and open all its avenues. Rope-dancing and juggling have engaged that attention which was formerly devoted to the more refined branches of scenic exhibition; in short, the grand intention of the Drama is destroyed, and in place of it is substituted all that weakness of intellect and depravity of taste can invent. Hence are our modern plays justly imputed by some to be instruments of destructive pleasure.

The Drama has also suffered much from this contagion of false taste operating on its performers. Seeking no other patronage than popularity, they give loose to the most disgusting gestures and expressions merely to gain the plaudits of a vulgar mob. The tawdry dresses which are exhibited on the stage, and which are intended for the same end, are equally disgusting and ridiculous. So it is, that our best samples of Dramatic poetry are made to convey a meaning far different from what they really inculcate, and whilst the same course is followed, there is little hope of the Drama regaining its pristine celebrity, or of the public taste recovering its original purity: on the contrary, vulgar grossness will stand unimpeached, and the mind be ultimately unable to distinguish virtue from vice.

In like manner to the representations of the Drama, its poetry has also suffered considerable deterioration. But of this my remarks must be brief. Few are the authors of our own times, whose productions in this line can vie with the least celebrated of ancient writers, or even with some of a more recent date. The age of Elizabeth, and a few succeeding years, produced by far the most successful specimens of dramatic poetry,—yet these have intermingled with their more brilliant passages, a strong tincture of licentious feeling. Indeed, none in that bright era deserve the name of plays, if we except the diversified touches of the inimitable Shakespeare. He wrote to the point—"he gives," says a celebrated writer, "a living picture of all the most minute and secret artifices by which a feeling steals into our souls; of all the imperceptible advantages which it there gains; of all the stratagems by which every other passion is made subservient to it, till it becomes the sole tyrant of our desires and aversions." Some such secret charm should be intermingled with every dramatic spectacle which is intended to operate on the heart and understanding, through the medium of the passions.

With these advantages of good writing and elegance of taste, it is much to be regretted that those times did not afford appropriate accommodations for their better display: and at the same time it reflects a corresponding censure on our own neglect, who possess such ample means for rendering dramatic exhibitions both highly salutary and entertaining.

One of the most notorious objections to stage representations, has arisen from the careless and indifferent selection of the plays.—It would be an act of great injustice and illiberality to the present age, to avow their total deficiency in dramatic entertainments suited as well to the improvement of the moral habits of men: on the other hand, our catalogue shines with many choice samples of dramatic talent, which are calculated not only to arouse the dormant principles of virtuous action, but even to instil it when it is wanting. The drama was justly held up as a school of morality in the ruder ages of the world—and our day could boast of much more of its efficacy, were it not partly corrupted in the various channels through which it runs.—We have, however, so much left as to warrant its utility; and as much also, as would do honour to our national literature, did it but receive half the encouragement and attention it deserves.—It is to be wished, that those who cater for the public palate, would endeavour rather to improve its taste by serving up less extravagant delicacies, and feast the understanding with more simple and nourishing food.

BIOGRAPHY.

JOHN PHILIP KEMBLE, Esq.

Although Mr. Kemble appeared on the London boards with success, in 1783, yet the principal characters, both in tragedy and comedy, were, at that time, in the possession of Mr. Smith, and it was not until his retirement from the stage in 1783, that Mr. Kemble was promoted to that decisive lead in the tragic path, which he so long maintained with increased powers and popularity.

In 1788, Mr. Kemble became manager of Drury Lane Theatre, an office which he held uninterruptedly for eight years, amply justifying the discernment that had placed him in it, by the many material improvements which he made in the general conduct of the business of the stage, in the regular decorum of representation, in the impartial appointment of performers suited to their real abilities, and in giving all characters their true and appropriate costume. Macbeth no longer appeared dressed in black silk stockings with a bag and a small sword, nor did our stage cottages possess register stoves or splendid pier glasses. The beauty of fitness was studied; the department of the painter and machinist attended to, and to the study and attention of Mr. Kemble, the drama is at present indebted, for the propriety and magnificence of its scenery and decorations. His groupings, his processions, all his arrangements, while they were in the highest degree conducive to theatrical effect, were yet so chaste and free from glare and undue pompousness, that they appeared rather historical than dramatic, and might have been safely thrown upon the canvass by the painter, almost without alteration.

In 1796, Mr. Kemble resigned the management of Drury Lane Theatre, but shortly afterwards resumed it, and held it until the end of the season, 1800-1. In 1802, he visited Paris and Madrid, for the purpose of studying the French and Spanish stages, and on his return in the year 1803, having purchased a sixth share of the property of Covent Garden Theatre, he succeeded to the management of that concern, which he conducted for many years.

In 1817, he took his final leave of the stage to the great regret of all lovers of the drama. A public dinner and a gold cup were presented to him soon after. At this dinner, which was held at the Freemason's Tavern, on the 27th of June, 1817, Lord Holland presided; and among the company were the Duke of Bedford, Lord Erskine, Lord Mulgrave, Lord Essex, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Aberdeen, the Marquis of Worcester, Lord Petersham, Major-General Phipps, Mr. Croker; M. Talma, the French tragedian; Mr. T. Moore, Mr. Campbell, and Mr. Crabbe, the British poets; Mr. West, President of the Royal Academy; Mr. Flaxman, Mr. Haydon, and many other artists; Mr. Dauncey, Mr. Reynolds, and several other members of the Bar, &c. &c.

After dinner, and the usual toasts had been drank, Lord Holland exhibited a drawing of a piece of plate, intended to be presented to Mr. Kemble, the vase itself being then unfinished; it was, however, executed soon afterwards, in the most exquisite workmanship, and bore the following inscription, a copy of which was read by Lord Holland:—

'To John Philip Kemble, on his retiring from the stage, of which, for thirty-six years, he has been the ornament and pride, which, to his learning, taste, and genius, was indebted for its present state of refinement—(great applause)—and which, under his auspices, consecrated to the support of the legitimate drama, and more particularly to the glory of Shakespeare—(applause)—attained to a degree of splendour and prosperity before unknown, this vase, from a numerous body of his admirers, as a mark of their gratitude and respect, was presented by the hands of their chairman, on the 27th of June, 1817.'

Lord Holland, in a neat speech, begged Mr. Kemble to accept this mark of their esteem, and Mr. Young delivered a complimentary ode, written by Campbell, but not in his happiest style. After the health of Mr. Kemble had been drank, that gentleman rose, and addressed the meeting in the following terms:—

'Gentlemen, for your presence here to-day, and the favour you have done me, in drinking my health, I beg to offer you my most heartfelt and sincere acknowledgments. Unused, as I am, to extemporaneous public speaking, it will not appear extraordinary that I should be a little embarrassed in addressing an assembly in which I see so many persons highly valued for their genius and talents. I shall, therefore, gentlemen, be obliged to confine myself to saying, that this is the greatest honour that could possibly be conferred on me; and as it is a distinction that never has been shown to any of my predecessors, I therefore feel, gentlemen, how far your favour exceeds every thing my deserts could justly challenge. Gentlemen, the terms in which you have been pleased to convey to me your approbation of my professional exertions and of my private conduct, leaves me nothing to say, but that I am very proud you think so highly of me. Your noble chairman, gentlemen, has done me the honour of attributing to me much more merit than I can pretend to; his feelings have led him, I fear, very much to overrate my services; but I can truly say, that when he attributed to me a strong desire to discharge my duty fairly in the different parts of my profession, as far as my honest endeavours to deserve that praise could be considered as entitling me to it, so far your noble chairman has spoken of me only with justice. The manner in which you have been so kindly good as to step forward, in order to hand down to posterity my exertions on the stage, is too flattering to my feelings not to affect my heart most deeply. I receive the gift, gentlemen, with affection, with gratitude; and it is pleasing to me to hope, that I shall still be remembered, even when that mark of your kindness has faded away, since my farewell has been sung by the muse that dictated the "Pleasures of Hope."

On the same day, a deputation from the performers of Drury Lane Theatre, comprising Messrs. Rea, Downton, Johnstone, and Holland, anxious to record their testimony of respect for the advantages accruing to the stage from Mr. Kemble's professional exertions, waited on him with an address.—Mr. Kemble thus retired into private life, with honours unknown even to the distinguished excellence that preceded him, and he has almost ever since resided on the Continent—only once visiting this country, and that to do an act of fraternal kindness—nothing less than transferring, to his brother Charles, the whole of his interest in Covent Garden Theatre. The recollection of Mr. Kemble's histrionic talents is too fresh in the memory of most of our readers to require much eulogium. He combined, in an eminent degree, the physical and mental requisites for the highest rank in his profession. To a noble form and classical and expressive countenance he added the advantages of a sound judgment, indefatigable industry, and an ardent love and decided genius for the art of which he was so distinguished an ornament. He possessed, besides, what we have always regarded as an essential characteristic of a first-rate tragic actor, an air of intellectual superiority, and a peculiarity of manner and appearance, which impressed the spectator at the first glance with the conviction that he was not of the race of common men. His voice was defective in the under-tones necessary for soliloquies, but, in declamation, strong and efficient, and, in tones of melancholy, indescribably touching. No music was ever heard which could better revive the tale of past times. It was indeed one of the most exquisite beauties of his performances, that one passage frequently recalled to the mind 'a whole history.'

Mr. Kemble has left an amiable widow to lament the loss of an affectionate partner.

THE MAID OF CLYDE.

You rosebud gay the garden's pride,
Bedeck'd with dew of summer's breath,
Awhile its blushing charms doth hide,
Then blooming scents the vale of death,
Where Helen sleeps, the Maid of Clyde.

E'en so from infant years she grew,
And charm'd each comely rural swain,
Her soul was pure, no guile she knew,
And wisdom sought her smiles to gain.

Just like the rose her sweets spread wide,
Chaste as by purest angels worn;
Eclipsing the proud dames of Clyde,
Who beauty boast, yet meet with scorn.

She soared beyond all earthly joys,
And hop'd alone for heaven:
Her Father heard her humble cries,
And sent his angel here below,
To snatch her from this world of woe.

HANORRY.

THE PARK.

(From the Magic Lantern.)

"In Fashion's Ring, behold us drive,
The most-unfashioning feels alive."—Old Song.

Having a visit to pay in Piccadilly last Sunday, and finding my friend from home, the crowds of well-dressed pedestrians that almost impeded my way, moving towards the Park, tempted me to stroll into that gay rendezvous of fashionables, as well as unfashionables; and I entered, though not without some difficulty, the gate at Hyde Park Corner.

Those who have passed through Hyde Park, on a fine Sunday, towards the end of May, can alone form an idea of the gay scene that presented itself to me.

Carriages, of every description, from the splendid vis-a-vis and elegant chariot, down to the vulgar city coach and more vulgar gig: next to the well-appointed curricule followed a shabby hired whisky; while the cabriolet, with its Dandy driver, was contrasted by its next neighbour, a vehicle partaking the joint qualities of a taxed-cart and Irish jaunting-car, conducted by a butcher-like looking man, accompanied by a large female, whose cheeks might in colour out-vie his primest ox-beef.

In the drive, which is now considered the fashionable one, and for which I can assign no other reason than its being the most disagreeable part of the Park, the crowd of equipages from Hyde Park Corner to Cumberland Gate, is so great, that carriages are sometimes detained stationary for half an hour at a time; while the promenade, at each side, is a moving mass, in which hats and bonnets, with occasional peeps of pretty faces, are alone visible. Each person that you meet complains of the heat, and the dust, and the crowd, but still perseveres in giving this side of the Park the preference, to the cool and more agreeable one near the Serpentine river; or the still more delightful umbrageous walks in Kensington Gardens: surely this preference is a convincing proof of the influence of fashion, which we daily see demanding fresh sacrifices of taste and comfort from her votaries. The equipages do not present a more striking difference to each other than do the persons who occupy them.—In the splendid vis-a-vis, with its emblazoned coronet and supporters, sits, or rather reclines, the pale and simply-adorned woman of fashion, the languor of whose countenance exhibits the ravages of crowded rooms, and late hours, and who enters into this scene to kill an hour on this dulllest of all days, according to fashionable phraseology. Her coachman, with his knowing white wig and rich livery, seems conscious of his and his owner's superiority, and regards the other carriages with apparent contempt; while the footmen, with all the impertinent non-chalance so peculiar to the servants of the great, are exchanging smiles of recognition with their acquaintances, and making their observations on the scene around them. Next follows the gaudy, but ill-appointed coach of some citizen, crowded almost to suffocation with his fat and flashy wife, and rosy cheeked smiling daughters, whose bonnets look like beds of tulips, and whose white handkerchiefs, applied frequently to their foreheads, mark, in spite of their smiles, the yielding softness of their nature, and shew them to be in the melting mood. This is succeeded by the smart turn-out of some pretender to fashion, who desired to have a carriage exactly like Lady H * * *, but wished to have a little more brass on the harness, and more fringe on the hammer-cloth:—the coach-maker has been most liberal of both, and the poor would-be fashionable sits perfectly happy, fancying that the smiles with which the gazers regard her gaudy equipage, and ill-drest self, proceed from pure admiration. The Lord Mayor's coach, with all the paraphernalia of mayoralty finery, next fills up the line, while the smug faces of my Lord and Lady, with their offspring, the embryo Lord or Lady Mayoress, form a group that might be painted as a personification of so visible are its nutritious effects on their countenances.

A brown landaulet with red wheels now advances, the wretched horses of which, seem scarcely able to bear the weight of plated harness under which they are literally bending; and, as if to increase their misery, the shabby rattle-trap is filled by a group that would require the pencil of Hogarth to paint:—in the centre sits an elderly gentleman, whose rubicund cheeks, fiery nose, and blue-black wiry locks and whiskers give him a striking resemblance to the Saracen's Head, as portrayed on stage coaches. On each side of him sits a comely sultana-looking dame, large, languid, and listless, affecting all the easy negligence of high ton, which is ludicrously contrasted by the absurd vulgarity of the carriage, and the whole set out. Five smiling babes, the images of their blushing sire, arranged in picturesque attitudes, complete the party within; but what pen can do justice to the coachman and footman! The thread-bare broad-cloth livery, that was once white, faced with a colour meant to be scarlet, but much less vivid than the old gentleman's countenance, made for men of tall stature, and now worn by such as are of comparatively dwarfish size, hired on job for a few weeks; the hats turned up all round, and totally bereft of the beaver that once covered them, strikingly evince the love of shew struggling with the parsimony and inherent vulgarity of the master. This turn out excites universal derision, and the Dandies declare that it must belong to some East India or Dublin Castle dubbed knight, who has tempted one of the fair dames by his side to become his wife, for the pleasure of being called My Lady.

The elegant curricule, driven by its more elegant owner, the beautiful lady F * * *, now follows, and attracts all eyes, while this lovely female Phaeton, enveloped in capes and veils, scarcely deigns to shew a portion of those beautiful features, that have never been seen without exciting admiration. The fashionable and fascinating Lady S. H. * * * rolls along in her tasteful and splendid carriage, reclined in a corner of it, and covered by a transparent veil; while the crimson silk blinds, half drawn down, shed not "a dim religious light," but love's own rosy hue, over her faultless figure; and admiring Dandies, with uncovered heads, mark by their low bows, the profound feeling which she excites.

Here may be seen the "Gallant gay Lothario," perhaps still more generally known, as "Roméo," driving his car, which, alas! is no longer a triumphal one, being hailed by smiles of derision and contempt, instead of applause, whenever he makes his appearance in it. Its luckless owner sits elate, with head awry, and neck extended, looking round to meet the glances of admiration which he fancies he excites. Next to this fantastic vehicle follows the family coach of Mr. * * *, the plain substantial elegance of which, marks the good taste of its possessor; while the lady-like demeanour of his wife, and the cheerful ingenuous countenances of his children, who accompany her, bespeak a well-ordered and happy family.

The line of carriages is now broken by a tilbury, driven by a city Dandy, who has chosen the Park to make his debut in as a whip: the horse becomes restive, and the want of skill in his driver, excites the ridicule of his more dextrous brothers of the whip: the tilbury is entangled in the wheel of a coach, which causes a general stoppage, while heads are seen emerging from the windows of all the carriages round, anxious to ascertain the cause of delay; and the ladies in the next carriage are, between alarm and anger, almost unintelligibly vociferating from the windows to their servants to let them out; while their terror only seems to increase the merriment of the surrounding crowd, and to give fresh impetus to the unfortunate Dandy, who is malgré the advice of all the by-standers, with one hand reining back his impetuous steed, and with the other urging him on by applying the whip.

Next advance a male and female equestrian, who are apparently as little skilled in the riding, as the luckless Dandy is in the driving school:—the horse of the lady becomes frightened at the crowd, and the lady more than participates in his alarms; while her cavalier servant is so occupied in endeavouring to restrain the ardour of his own charger, that he can afford her no assistance, and her distress is heightened by hearing the peals of laughter all around her, and seeing the ridicule which her situation excites. But, as if to redeem the female name from the imputation of want of want of skill in horsemanship, the pretty and graceful Lady G * * *, and the lovely Mrs. F. S * * are seen darting along like meteors; while the perfect command that they evidently possess over their coursers, and the easy elegance with which they manage them, can alone quiet the alarms the spectators would otherwise feel at the velocity with which they move.

To these succeeds a mighty host, including Peers, Commoners, the things y'clept Dandies, Citizens who ride their own bits of blood, and Apprentices who hire them for the day, and bestride them as they would their counters.—But vain would be the attempt to describe, or even to enumerate half the beauties, would-be beauties, fashionables, and apers of fashion, that are seen mixed up in the motly group of citizens, country folks, and trades-people, that figure in the Park on a fine Sunday, when every vehicle is put in requisition.

All is now alarm and confusion, for the tilbury driver, with his restive horse, again appears, and now excites more anxiety than he formerly did merriment, for his vehicle being disentangled from the coach, and his horse feeling the restraint removed, sets off with a rapidity that spreads terror all around.—Nothing is to be seen but horses plunging, and drivers and equestrians all endeavouring to avoid the dangerous contact. The same crowd that a few minutes before laughed at the disasters of this luckless whip, and enjoyed the alarm of the male and female equestrians, are now loud and sincere in their expressions of compassion at the dangers to which the former is exposed, and, with looks full of sympathy, are hastening to see the result, or to offer their assistance, when it is ascertained that the horse has been stopped in his career, and that no serious accident has occurred.

A few paces from the scene of the last disaster, a crowd is assembled to witness the restoration of a fat elderly gentleman to his seat on horseback, from which he had been thrown by the plunging of the animal.

In the fall, he had lost his hat and wig, and the poor man, though not hurt, has been so terrified, that the big drop rolls from his forehead to his cheek, which, mingled with the dust with which he is plentifully covered, gives him a most ludicrous appearance; this is not a little heightened by the servant, who is shaking the dust from his master's wig with one hand, while he is brushing his coat with the other.

Fright, shame, and indignation, are mingled in the old gentleman's looks, and the servant, who is one of the old school, is reproaching the crowd for their unfeeling conduct and rude jokes on his master's misfortune.

No. IV.

All the members being assembled the Deliberation Chamber was entered at six o'clock; when, after a few preliminary observations, the

HISTORICAL NOVELS

with which we are favoured by several unknown hands became the subject of discussion. Friend Ashbury Frivolous affirmed that they were the most interesting writings of our age; and Friend Paradox declared that their perusal afforded him a fund of information and amusement, and that they had such a corrective effect upon his taste, as to create an equal dislike for the idle fascinations of Romance, and for the dry and often unpolished narrative of History; whilst Friend Trueman confessed that to him they afforded no entertainment whatever.

Friend Medicos was of opinion that this difference of taste might be explained by supposing that there existed a predisposition of mind. And this should chiefly be attributed to the organization of the brain; and, in an inferior degree, to the prejudices arising from education and habit. This statement, as relating to a diversity of taste, was admitted; but, it could not be received as affording any criteria which would enable us to judge of the purity and correctness of taste itself. Friend Trueman now observed—

Whatever may be useful is valuable; and whatever can be neither useful nor injurious is a matter of indifference; but that, which has an injurious tendency, however slight, without possessing any quality from which superior advantages may be derived, is not to be desired; nay, it should be cautiously avoided.

Our Historical Novels are not useful. They answer no reasonable end. The imagination struggles to expand and embellish some historic fact, to divest it of its identity, and to exhibit it with false, yet feasible appearances. Hence, they do not convey any accurate historic information. They are not a substitute for history; nor are they a superstructure of genius. No; they are a collection of facts and falsehoods; the latter made in some measure plausible by description and factitious incident, and the former so ramified and distorted, by an ingenious turn for book-making, as to preserve a homogeneity or similitude of kind throughout the whole, and to render a separation impracticable. But that which astonishes me most, is, that when BYRON is condemned for taking a plot from the CANTERBURY TALES, the AUTHORS of these NOVELS should be eulogized for taking the same liberty with the HISTORY OF ENGLAND. This is an inconsistency which I have not yet heard discussed, and I much wish it to share some consideration.

The grounds upon which I have pointed out the inutility of the Historical Novels, will also serve to shew that they have an injurious tendency. Of essential and interesting study, History forms an important branch; and leading facts, with the time and place of occurrence, and their consequent and incidental circumstances should be carefully treasured in the memory. Chronological transposition and incorrect historical delineations never fail to render narrators, who fall into such errors, pitifully ridiculous; and, solely on this account, no historical works are much esteemed if inaccurate in either date or narration. Beauty of style will not compensate for the liberty taken by the Author of Pevelevil in involving persons in scenes which transpired many years after their demise; nor can the florid and minute descriptions of persons, things, and incidents, as given in this genus of trifles, be identified, to any considerable extent, with the originals as delineated or sketched in History.

But, it will be objected, our Historical Novels are only designed for entertainment; to "beguile the tedium of an hour," with light, and not too romantic, composition. All this may be admitted, and, were they purely works of fiction it would be correct; but, in these instances, it so happens that a taste for exaggeration and high descriptive colouring, supercedes the efforts of genius, and revels in a perversion of facts, which should ever be retained in the memory without deterioration. It is the PARTIAL IDENTITY, and the FACTITIOUS RESEMBLANCE which are injurious;—they confuse, they confound; and the consequence is, that, a reader who, before perusing the Historical Novels, had a pretty accurate recollection of the same historical facts which form their ground-work, has, at a short period after their perusal, retained merely what would justify his presumption in speaking generally, but not what would enable him to enter into the pure facts themselves, with any particularity. My opinion is that men of knowledge will ever look upon Historical Novels as being Literary trifles.

Friend Paradox could not sanction the allegations of the last speaker; yet, not being prepared to reply, he must for the present admit them. Friend Frivolous thought that, as a literary character, moving in circles in which every thing that issued from the pen of Sir W. My Lord, The Laureate, &c., was considered as having importance, he must of course peruse, and speak, as others, or relinquish his place in the ton. The President not having had sufficient leisure to read any of the works debated upon, did not think himself qualified to interfere. And, upon the whole, the sentiments remain individually as at the beginning of the discussion.

LINES TO ———.

Oh, if it be a crime to gaze
On thee, an I gazing—love,
I prithee, the seducing blaze
Of thy dark eye remove.

Or if it be a crime to think
How brightly fair they shine,
Oh! though I from the mandate shrink,
Send not their beams on mine.

Or if it be a crime to dwell
On thy fair form with love,
My faultering lip, that form must tell,
Its graces to remove.

I cannot deem thine eye less bright,
Nor that sweet form remove;
Still must I then, in fond despite,
Gaze on, and gazing, love!

CRITICISM.

ORTHOGRAPHY.—(No. VII.)

BY S. X.

Although the Dictionary of Dr. JOHNSON is justly considered a work of great and acknowledged merit, I am not one of those who implicitly bow to his authority, for all matters connected with the English language. His Orthography, for instance, is, in numerous cases, very singular, and in a few, decidedly erroneous, being contrary to the practice of the best classic writers of the present day.—ANON.

Right.

Classic. Also Arctic, Antarctic, Concentric, Critic, Domestic, Eccentric, Music, Prosaic, &c.

The letter c was not formerly used, Mr. Nares observes, as a final letter, because, in such a situation, it was doubtful in what manner it should be pronounced. Probably the additional letter k was originally adopted, on account of the final e, which anciently followed these letters. As long as that vowel [e] retained any sound, its regular effect, without the intervention of k, would have been to soften the preceding c; and if the c had been doubled, to mark the shortness of the antecedent vowel, the latter c would still have been softened by the final c. The only alternative then was, to write kk, or ck; and the latter, it appears, was preferred, being a sort of compromise between the sound and the etymology; but the final e has long been silent, and has therefore been dropped from such terminations. Hence, the use or necessity for the k having ceased, that letter also has gradually disappeared; and, in spite of the remonstrances of antiquated grammarians, and the very pointed example of your Derby correspondent, who signs himself WATTY, convenience and expedition, in the present case, sanction the omission of this superfluous letter; and it is now almost universally agreed to write arctic, antarctic, concentric, critic, domestic, eccentric, &c. instead of arctick, antarctick, concentrick, criticke, domestick, eccentrick, and so forth.

Words of only one syllable still retain the k, as stick, trick, &c. and for this very obvious reason; where a single letter forms a fourth, or a fifth part of a whole word, the eye is not so easily reconciled to the loss of it.—And this objection to the removal of the k from monosyllables, operates, partially, upon the dissyllables; as attack, bullock, cassock, frotick, ramack, shamrock, &c.; but the very numerous polysyllables, which first invited the innovation, have now swept away with them nearly all the dissyllables having the same or a similar termination.

Words compounded with monosyllables, ending in ck, preserve that orthography in the compound; as candlestick, planetstruck, &c. These words require, by analogy, the final k, as much as the monosyllables stick, struck, and so forth. Convenience and expedition, it must be allowed, have, in many instances, been the cause of "curtailing words of their fair and legitimate proportion" of constituent letters.

Knick-knackerils.—

More commonly, knick-knacks. But as a knacker is a fabrication of toys, or small work, I see no reason why knick-knackerils (if it be spelled with the incipient k.) may not be used, in ludicrous composition, to signify any petty contrivances, or trifles, whether literary or mechanical.

70. Skeptick—

Sceptic.—

The former was the spelling recommended by Dr. JOHNSON; but, as Mr. Todd remarks, it is not the form usually or anciently observed; and, maugre the authority and recommendation of Dr. JOHNSON, the old form, (with respect to the use of the letter c in the first syllable,) still maintains its ground. Bishop Hall, in 1608, (more than two centuries since,) wrote it scepticks.—Of all the authorities produced by Dr. JOHNSON, there is not one in favour of his own peculiar mode of spelling the first syllable, with a k instead of a c.

MR. EDITOR,—I now send you, what I conceive to be, a very useful paper on ORTHOGRAPHY, being No. VII. of the series which was begun in your first

Marad Shah, King of Bokhara. He was sentenced to die, and a herald went through the city of Bokhara, announcing the time of execution. An immense multitude attended, and the chief men of the city. I also went, and stood near Abdallah. He was offered his life if he would abjure Christ, the executioner standing by him with his sword in his hand. 'No,' said he (as if the proposition were impossible to be complied with,) 'I cannot abjure Christ.' Then one of his hands was cut off at the wrist. He stood firm, his arm hanging by his side, but with little motion. A physician, by desire of the king, offered to heal the wound if he would recant. He made no answer, but looked up steadfastly towards heaven, like Stephen, the first martyr, his eyes streaming with tears. He did not look with anger towards us. He looked at us, but it was benignly, and with the countenance of forgiveness. His other hand was then cut off. "But, Sir," said Sabat, in his imperfect English, "he never changed, he never changed! And when he bowed his head to receive the blow of death, all Bokhara seemed to say, 'What new thing is this?'"

Sabat had indulged the hope that Abdallah would have recanted when he was offered his life; but when he saw that his friend was dead, he resigned himself to grief and remorse. He travelled from place to place, seeking rest and finding none. At last he thought he would visit India. He accordingly came to Madras about five years ago. 'Soon after his arrival, he was appointed by the English government a mufti, or expounder of the Mahomedan law,—his great learning, and respectable station in his own country rendering him well qualified for that office. And now the period of his conversion drew near. While he was at Visagapatam, in the northern Circars, exercising his professional duties, Providence brought in his way a New Testament, in the Arabic language. He read it with deep thought, the Koran lying before him. He compared them together with patience and solicitude, and at length the truth of the gospel fell on his mind, as he expressed it, like a flood of light. Soon afterwards, he proceeded to Madras, a journey of 300 miles, to seek Christian baptism, and, having made a public confession of his faith, he was baptized in the English church at that place, by the name of Nathaniel, in the twenty-seventh year of his age. When his family in Arabia heard that he had followed the example of Abdallah, and become a Christian, they despatched his brother to India (a voyage of two months) to assassinate him. While Sabat was sitting in his house at Visagapatam his brother presented himself in the disguise of a fakir, or beggar, having a dagger concealed under his mantle. He rushed on Sabat, and wounded him. But Sabat seized his arm, and his servants came to his assistance. He then recognised his brother! The assassin would have become the victim of public justice; but Sabat interceded for him, and sent him home in peace, with letters and presents, to his mother's house in Arabia.

When Sabat forgave and interceded for his brother, he was no longer the fanatic and pitiless Mahomedan, but the professor of a religion which teaches mercy and forgiveness to our most implacable enemies.—Buchanan.

RUSSIAN AMUSEMENTS.—The principal amusement of the Russians during the cold season is the Ice Hill. At Petersburg, when the Neva is frozen over, a temporary stage of wood is erected about forty or fifty feet above the surface of the river, from the top of which is a steep descent, like the side of an abrupt rock. Against this are laid blocks of ice, which soon become a united mass, by means of torrents of water that are thrown along them, and harden in a few minutes. On the level, at about two hundred and fifty or three hundred yards distance, stands a similar erection, only placed a little on one side, in order to leave a clear road for the sledges darting from the opposite stage. The people mount the first of these stages by means of a flight of steps in the rear, and find at the top a sort of sledge, without projections of any kind, but in shape and flatness like a butcher's tray, most fantastically and rudely ornamented with carving and colours. This is placed on the margin of the declivity; the bearded native conductor seats himself upon it, very far back, his legs extending in front perfectly straight. The person to be conveyed takes his place before him in a similar attitude, and both remaining steady glide with inconceivable rapidity down the icy descent. The conductor bebind guides their course with his hands on the same principles as a vessel is steered, touching the contrary side to that on which he wishes to keep. To such safety do they attain by practice, that they will steer round groups of upset persons without doing the smallest injury.

Many go down in these sledges alone; and others, both men and women, on skates, flying forward in a perfectly upright position. Steadiness seems to be the chief accomplishment of the Russian skater, and the velocity of his motion the source of pleasure to the spectator. Here are not seen those graceful motions on the ice in which the skaters of other countries excel; not that the generality of men in this country are incapable of graceful attitudes; but the cumbersome of their dress, and the customary modes of this exercise, have never included any thing more pleasing to the eye than rapid motion.

The sensation excited by the descent in a sledge is at first extremely painful, but after passing a few times through the keen air, it becomes exquisitely pleasurable.

Even private individuals raise such ice-hills in their gardens, and the ball-room is often forsaken for the pleasure of gliding down them. To render this amusement more easy and agreeable, large chairs are fixed on skates, and guided by a man standing behind, and also provided with skates. At night these hills are illuminated with coloured lamps, which greatly heighten the effect of the scene.

Round these hills are erected wooden stages or booths, in one of which is exhibited a collection of curious foreign animals; in another, rope-dancing; in a third, a puppet-show; in a fourth, phantasmagoria, and so on. The price of admission to these sights is so trifling, that every one may share in the general gaiety.

The nobility and gentry drive about in superb sledges; and the Empress Catherine was often seen riding here among her people. A very large rich sledge was constructed for that purpose, capable of containing the whole imperial family; to which were attached, by chains, fourteen or sixteen smaller sledges, following in pairs, for her majesty's suite. These sledges were drawn by twelve or fourteen handsome horses, magnificently caparisoned, and in the evening illuminated with coloured lamps.—Shoberl.

SUNDAY MARKET AT MOSCOW.—The market on Sunday at Moscow is an entertaining spectacle. From five in the morning till eight, the spacious Place de Gallitzen is filled by a concourse of peasants and people of all classes, coming to buy or sell white peacocks, fan-tailed and other curious pigeons, dogs of all sorts for the sofa or the chase, singing-birds, poultry, guns, pistols, in short, whatever chance or custom may have rendered saleable. The sellers, excepting in the market of singing-birds, which is permanent and very large, have no shops, but remain with their wares either exposed upon stalls or hawking them about in their hands.

The pigeon-feeders are distinguished in the midst of the mob by long white wands, which they carry to direct the pigeons in their flight. The nobles take great delight in these birds: and a favourite pair will sell at from five to ten rubles. It is astonishing to see the feeders, by way of exhibiting their birds, let them fly and recover them again at pleasure. The principal recommendation of the pigeons consist in their rising to a great height by a spiral curve, all flying one way and following each other. When a bird does not keep the line of curvature which the others take, the feeder whistles, waves his wand, and its course is immediately changed. During such exhibitions, the nobles stake their money in wagers, betting on the height to which a pigeon will ascend, and the number of curves it will make in so doing.

In this market, Dr. Clarke fell into a singular mistake. Seeing several stalls apparently covered with wheat, he approached to examine its quality, but was surprised to find that it was in reality heaps of large ants' eggs. Near the same stalls were tubs full of pismires, crawling among the eggs and over the persons of those who sold them. Both the eggs and the ants are brought for sale as food for nightingales, which are favourite though common birds in Russian houses, where they sing in every respect as beautifully as in their native woods. The price of one of them is half song is about fifteen rubles. The Russians, by putting beads on their tables of tangible arithmetic, can make the birds sing at pleasure during the day; but nightingales are heard throughout the night making the city resound the melodies of the forest.

The stalls of fruit and food in the streets of Moscow prove very beneficial to the health of the people. At these places they obtain a wholesome dinner for a few copecks. A plate of boiled rice, over which is poured a little honey, here costs about a penny English. In the spring they sell, at these stalls, apples, which they have a remarkable method of preserving through the winter; baked pears; salad, salted cucumbers, which are antiscorbutic, and esteemed delicious by Russians of every rank; wild berries; boiled rice; quass; honey, and mead. As almost every table receives a formal benediction from the priests before it is considered fit for use, no Russian will touch any article of food until that ceremony has taken place. A particular church is set apart for the benediction of apples; and this is not given till the first apple drops from the tree, which is brought in great form to the priests. A Mahometan would sooner eat pork, than than a Russian unconsecrated fruit.—Shoberl.

ROYAL HAND-WRITING.—Oldys, in one of his curious notes, was struck by the distinctness of character in the hand-writings of several of our kings. He observed nothing further than the mere fact, and did not extend his idea to the art of judging of the mental character by the writing. Oldys has described these hand-writings with the utmost correctness, as I have often verified. I shall add a few comments.

Henry the Eighth wrote a strong hand, but as if he had seldom a good pen. The vehemence of his character conveyed itself into his writing; bold, hasty, and commanding, I have no doubt the asserter of the Pope's supremacy and its triumphant destroyer split many a good quill.

Edward the Sixth wrote a fair legible hand.—We have this promising young prince's diary, written by his own hand; in all respects he was an assiduous pupil, and he had scarcely learned to write and to reign when we lost him.

Queen Elizabeth wrote an upright hand, like the bastard Italian. She was indeed a most elegant calligrapher, whom Roger Ascham had taught all the elegancies of the pen. The French Editor of the little autobiographical work I have noticed has given the autograph of her name, which she usually wrote in a very tall character, and painfully elaborate. He accompanies it with one of the Scottish Mary, who at times wrote elegantly, though usually in uneven lines; when in haste and distress of mind, in several letters during her imprisonment which I have read, much the contrary. The French Editor makes this observation:—'Who could believe that these writings are of the same epoch?—The first denotes asperity and ostentation; the second indicates simplicity, softness and nobleness. The one is that of Elizabeth, Queen of England; the other that of her cousin, Mary Stuart. The difference of these two hand-writings answers most evidently to that of their characters.'

James the First wrote a poor ungainly character, all awry, and not in a straight line. James certainly wrote a slovenly scrawl, strongly indicative of that personal negligence which he carried into all the little things of life; and Buchanan, who had made him an excellent scholar, may receive the disgrace of his pupil's ugly scribble, which sprawls about his careless and inelegant letters.

Charles the First wrote a fair open Italian hand, and more correctly, perhaps, than any prince we ever had. Charles was the first of our monarchs who intended to have domiciliated taste in the kingdom, and it might have been conjectured from this unfortunate prince, who so finely discriminated the manners of the different painters, which are in fact their hand-writings, that he would not have been insensible to the elegancies of the pen.

Charles the Second wrote a little fair running hand, as if he wrote in haste, or uneasy till he had done. Such was the writing to have been expected from this illustrious vagabond, who had much to write, often in odd situations, and could never get rid of his natural restlessness and vivacity.

'James the Second writ a large fair hand.' It is characterised by his phlegmatic temper, as an exact detailer of occurrences, and the matter-of-business genius of the writer.

'Queen Anne wrote a fair round hand;' that is, the writing she had been taught by her master, probably without any alteration of manner naturally suggested by herself; the copying hand of a common character.—D'Israeli.

EPITAPHS.

On a stone tablet in the Bowling Green belonging to the New Inn at Gravesend, Kent.

To the memory of Alderman Nyan, an honest man and an excellent Bowler.

Full forty long years was the Alderman seen,
The delight of each bowler and King of this green;
As long be remember'd his art and his name,
Whose hand was unerring, unrival'd whose fame.
His bias was good, and he always was found
To go the right way and take enough ground.
The Jack to the uttermost verge he would send,
For the Alderman loved a full length at each end.

Now mourn every one that has seen him display
The art of the game and the wiles of his play;
For the great bowler death at one critical cast
Has ended his strength and close rubb'd him at last.

In Stoney Stratford Church yard on a man who was many years the Parish Clerk there, and disapproved of speaking of the qualities of the dead.

Reader go on, ne'er idly waste your time
On bad biography or coarser rhyme;
For what I am this mould'ring clay assures,
And what I was is no concern of yours.

In a church yard near Bath and Bristol: on a woman who got her livelihood by selling Earthen Ware.

Beneath this stone lies Catherine Grey,
Chang'd from busy life to lifeless clay;
Of earth and clay she got her pelf,
And now she's changed to earth herself.

One of the ancestors of the Trollopeps built the church in their Parish in Lincolnshire.—In the churchyard he erected at the same time a statue of himself, with one hand pointing to the church, and the other to the vault where all the family are interred. Upon the pedestal is still to be seen the following inscription:—

This is the statue of Sir Thomas Trollope,
Who caused yonder stones to roll up;
And when that God shall take his soul up,
His body is to fill that hole up.

ON A DRUNKARD.

Under this stone Jack Jug doth lie,
Whom brandy could not save;
Water was his antipathy,
Then weep not o'er his grave.

ON A COCKNEY.

Here tippy bob, the Cockney, lies,
Who thought himself immensely wise;
His giggling soul, with fix'd intent,
Was on the froth of pleasure bent;
He past through life on fashion's plan,
More like a monkey than a man.
But as an epitaph should praise,
Hear traveller what the marble says,—
To justice true, this brainless elf,
Reliev'd the world, and hang'd himself!

ON A SAILOR.

Beneath this brier invested grave,
Repose the limbs of Jack the brave,
Who many a can of liquor quaff'd,
Before he launch'd his brittle raft;
And many an adverse tempest bore,
Ere yet he reach'd the farther shore;
But now no more he shifts the sail,
To strive with fortune's fickle gale,
Nor gold nor flip invites his soul,
To pass the line or reach the pole;
For moor'd in death's calm tranquil bay,
He peaceful sleeps 'till judgment day.

VARIETIES.

A GREAT INDULGENCE.—Lamotte of Orleans, Bishop of Amiens, was remarkable for the austerity of his practice, and the indulgence of his doctrine. Severe in his principles, he was courteous in his manners, and even jocular in his conversation. It is related of him that a lady of his diocese having entreated his permission to wear a little rouge, only a very little, he told her that he would certainly, at her request, temporise a little between vanity and devotion, and therefore granted her his free permission to wear rouge on one cheek!

HOUSEHOLD OF HENRY VIII.—The following extract from a curious old MS. contains some very singular directions for regulating the household of Henry VIII.

'His highness's baker shall not put alums in the bread, or mix rye, oat, or bean flour with the same, and if detected he shall be put in the stocks. His highness's attendants are not to steal any lock or keys, tables, forms, cupboards, or other furniture, out of nobleman's or gentleman's houses where they go to visit. Master cooks shall not employ such scullions as go about naked, or lie all night on the ground, before the kitchen fire. No dogs to be kept in the court, but only a few spaniels for the ladies. Dinners to be at ten, suppers at four. The officers of his privy chamber shall be loving together, no grudging nor grumbling, nor talking of the king's pastime. The king's barber is enjoined to be cleanly, not to frequent the company of misguided women, for fear of danger to the king's royal person. There shall be no romping with maids on the staircase, by which dishes and other things are often broken!! Care shall be taken of the pewter spoons, and that the wooden ones used in the kitchen be not broken or stolen. The pages shall not interrupt the kitchen maids! The grooms shall not steal his highness's straw for beds, sufficient being allowed for them. Coal only to be allowed for the King's, queen's, and lady Mary's chambers. The brewers are not to put any brimstone in the ale.' Among the fishes for the table, is mentioned the porpoise; if too big for a horse-load, an extra allowance to purveyor. 24 loaves a-day allowed for his royal highness's greyhounds. Ordered, That all noblemen and gentlemen at the end of the sessions of the parliament, depart to their several counties, on pain of the royal displeasure!!

KING'S EVIL.—From the time of Edward the Confessor to the abdication of James the Second, the power of kings to touch for the king's evil seems never to have been doubted, and to have been very frequently exercised; but of all these, the second Charles was the most liberal in dispensing this healing power of royalty.

In the tract, intitled 'Charisma Basilicon; or, the Royal Gift of Healing Strumaes, or King's Evil, by John Browne, Chirurgeon in Ordinary to his Majesty, London, 1684,' there is 'An account of persons touched by his Sacred Majesty, King Charles the Second, for the cure of the King's Evil, from May, 1660; from a register kept by Thomas Haynes, Esq. serjeant of his majesty's Chapel-royal:

A DRUNKARD.—A Drunkard is the annoyance of modesty; the trouble of civility; the spoil of wealth; the destruction of reason. He is the brewer's agent; the alehouse benefactor; the beggar's companion; the constable's trouble. He is his wife's woe; his children's sorrow; his neighbour's scoff; his own shame. In summe, a tubbe of swill; a spirit of sleep; a picture of a beast; a monster of the ale.—Relics of Literature.

EXTRACT OF AN EPISTLE FROM WASHINGTON TO A MILITARY FRIEND ON HIS MARRIAGE.—While you have been making love under the banner of Hymen, the great personages of the north have been making war under the inspiration, or rather the infatuation of Mars. Now, for my part, I humbly conceive you had much the best and wisest of the bargain; for certainly it is more consonant to all the principles of reason and religion (natural and revealed) to replenish the earth with inhabitants, rather than depopulate it by killing those already in existence; besides, it is time for the age of knight-errantry and mad heroism to be at an end.

Your young military men, who want to reap the harvest of laurels, don't care, I suppose, how many seeds of war are sown; but, for the sake of humanity, it is devoutly to be wished, that the manly employment of agriculture, and the humanizing benefits of commerce, should supersede the waste of war and the rage of conquest; that the swords might be turned into ploughshares, the spears into pruning-hooks, and, as the Scriptures express it, 'the nations learn war no more.'—Relics of Literature.

PREMATURE INTERMENT.—Dr. Crichton, physician to the Grand Duke Nicholas, brother of the Emperor of Russia, relates that "a young girl, in the service of the Princess of ———, who had for some time kept her bed with a nervous affection, at length to all appearance was deprived of life. Her face had all the character of death—her body was perfectly cold, and every other symptom of death was manifested. She was removed into another room and placed in a coffin. On the day fixed for her funeral, hymns, according to the custom of the country, were sung before the door; but at the very moment when they were going to nail down the coffin, a perspiration was seen upon her skin, and in a few minutes it was succeeded by a convulsive motion in the hands and feet. In a few moments she opened her eyes, and uttered a piercing scream. The faculty were instantly called in, and in the space of a few days her health was completely re-established. The account which she gave of her situation is extremely curious. She said that she appeared to dream that she was dead, but that she was sensible to every thing that was passing round her, and distinctly heard her friends bewailing her death: she felt them envelope her in the shroud, and place her in the coffin. This sensation gave her extreme agony, and she attempted to speak, but her soul was unable to act upon her body. She describes her sensations as very contradictory, as if she was and was not in her body at one and the same instant. She attempted in vain to move her arms, to open her eyes, or to speak. The agony of her mind was at its height when she heard the funeral hymn, and found that they were about to nail down the lid of the coffin. The horror of being buried alive gave a new impulse to her mind, which resumed its power over its corporeal organization, and produced the effects which excited the notice of those who were about to convey her to a premature grave."

DR. FRANKLIN.—In his travels through New-England, he had observed, that when he went into an inn, every individual of the family had a question to propose to him, relative to his history: and that, till each was satisfied, and they had conferred and compared, together their information, there was no possibility of receiving any refreshment. Therefore, the moment he went into any of these places, he enquired for the master, the mistress, the sons, the daughters, the men servants, and the maid servants; and having assembled them all together, he began in this manner. "Good people, I am Benjamin Frank'in of Philadelphia; by trade a printer; and a bachelor; I have some relations at Boston, to whom I am going to make a visit: my stay will be short, and I shall then return and follow my business, as a prudent man ought to do. This is all I know of myself, and all I can possibly inform you of; I beg, therefore, that you will have pity upon me and my horse, and give us both some refreshment."

THE MANTAO.—Another part of this building (the House of Industry at Clonmel) is appropriated to lunatics: there are 54 at present. The manner in which these creatures flocked around Mr. Grubb, and his soothing treatment of them, reminded me strongly of the Rev. Mr. Graham, of Lifford. Many of these aliens to social happiness implored my intercession for permission to visit a parent—a sister—a wife—or a child! Some fibres of nature's tender cords still remained unbroken. One poor fellow caught me by the skirt, and with fervid agitation, asked me, 'Why am I kept so long from my Mary? Let me go and see her now.' I endeavoured to get away, but his grasp was firm; he looked stercorally in my face and exclaimed, 'Mary thinks I'm dead—Mary doesn't think I love her—every body knows I love her—when may I go to her?' He burst into tears, and seemed torn with agony. I made another effort to release myself from a scene that would have melted a heart of stone; but he seized my hand, pressed it to his lips, and sobbed out, 'Aren't you the bishop? do—do—I know you will—go and tell my Mary I'll come to her to-morrow—and tell her to put little Cain's green jacket on.' Tears streamed down his cheeks; he anxiously watched for my reply; I bowed assent; he again pressed my hand to his lips, fell on his knees, and permitted me to get away. I left the spot with feelings which no language can express.—Reid's Travels in Ireland, 1822.

ANECDOTE.—When Mr. Thomas Sheridan, son of the late celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan, was candidate for the representation of a Cornish Borough, he told his father, that if he succeeded, he should place a label on his forehead, with the words "to let," and side with the party that made the best offer. "Right, Tom," said the father, "but don't forget to add the word 'unfurnished.'"

THE TEAR OF GRATITUDE.

There is a tear from Beauty's eye
That makes us feel supremely blest;
Offspring of love and sympathy,
It melts the cold and flinty breast.
There is a tear soft Pity gives,
Like dew-drop on the withering leaf;
Our heart the pearly gift receives,
It sheds a balm upon our grief.
But there's a tear that's far more bright,
Though flowing from a bosom rude,
Yielding ineffable delight,—
The sparkling tear of Gratitude!

THE SLEEPING BEAUTY.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

Beside a fountain's border,
Where wanton zephyrs rove,
A nymph, in sweet disorder,
Now sleeps in yonder grove.
If thus her beauties charm me,
All sleeping as she lies,
What ill, alas! shall harm me,
When once she opens her eyes!
On her white arm reposing,
Reclines her lovely cheek,
Far sweeter tints disclosing,
Than May's sweet mornings deck.
What tender fears alarm me,
What tender hopes arise!—
Alas! what ill shall harm me,
When once she opens her eyes.
And vain would I discover
What pains my breast invade;
But, ah! too timid lover!
My lips refuse their aid.
May love with boldness arm me,
And cheek desponding sighs;
Or, oh! what ill shall harm me,
When once she opens her eyes!

THE DRAMA, ETC.

The Tragedy of Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland, was performed on Friday evening the 21st instant, before a very respectable audience. As to the merits of the piece, it is sufficient to say, that the character of Elizabeth is the only one which can do any credit to the author, or admit of a natural, interesting representation, by even the best actors.

We cannot conceive of a more excellent stage representative of our illustrious Elizabeth than Mrs. Bunn.—This lady certainly evinces the arbitrariness, the connivance, the dignity, and the weakness, which marked and characterized the famous Queen Bess; and we will venture to affirm, that all who are acquainted with the character of this distinguished Princess, will appreciate the accuracy of Mrs. Bunn's representation.—The strife between nature and policy was finely exemplified in the scene where the warrant for Mary Stuart's execution is presented to Elizabeth for her signature.—Disimulation is at an end; the mutability of things is estimated; and she shudders at the contemplation, and recoils from the performance of an act, which cannot but sap the foundation of thrones, and make more violent the impetus which already, too often, overwhelms and dissipates all earthly power and grandeur.—Those who witnessed Mrs. Bunn in this scene;—who marked the successful effort of jealousy and indignation in signing the portentous document,—and the instantaneous resumption of imperial dignity on finding that the secretary was present; those persons, if correct observers, will never consent to her being classed with third or fourth rate actors.

The fact is, the person and countenance of Mrs. Bunn are not only elegant and noble, but she has an admirable command of both; and, in attitude and expression we cannot point out her superior. In the higher tones her voice may prove a little grating; but all must confess, that even in voice she displays a discriminative energy, which many popular performers of the other sex can hardly attain.

When we consider that this lady is really possessed of a fine face, an elegant figure, just conception, appropriate attitude of person and expression of countenance, and of an unflinching fluency of speech, we are at a loss to divine what could possibly induce the critic of one of our Journals to attempt to derogate from her justly-merited reputation.—Surely he does not suppose that it has been acquired by mere intuition of mind, and predisposition of body!—No, this can never be; then why offer to lessen a celebrity which could only be obtained by the incessant exertion of both? Caprice alone dictated the illiberal animadversion, and we will venture to assure him, that, until he condescends to favour the public with a particular notice of Mrs. BUNN's defects and deficiencies, his praise on a point, which is, in her, no merit, and his censure in particulars which alone involve distinction for superiority or incompetency, will alike dissipate without exciting even a solitary feeling to coincide with his unsupported disparagement.

So far we may speak for Mrs. BUNN, without suffering any, the least diminution of our respect for Mrs. M'GIBBON—a lady whom we ever behold with admiration. As Mary Stuart, Mrs. M'G. appeared very interesting; the effect of Mary's forgiveness of the Earl of Leicester, (MR. SALTER), owed infinitely more to the actress than to the author.

The character of Leicester is extremely unnatural.—He is a cold-hearted, self-interested fellow,—alternately ruled by feelings which never yet reigned in the breast of the same individual! For such a man, with any plausibility, to exhibit effects which can only arise from integrity of heart, and intense devotion, requires no little ingenuity and address; and, we are confident, that had Leicester been personated by a less able performer than Mr. SALTER, he would not have concluded without experiencing reproach, if not strong symptoms of indignation and disgust.

We are of opinion that Mr. DIDDEAR possesses some of the requisites of a good actor; and beg that he will endeavour to develop them. Some modulation and energy of voice, an improved carriage, and more magnanimity of person, are essentially necessary before he can hope to step beyond mediocrity.

In the farce of HIGH LIFE BELOW STAIRS, we noticed an unauthorised introduction of Nursery prattle. This reminds us of Mr. Lancaster's exhibition of a boy sucking his thumb; in education such examples may have a good effect; but, on an audience of adults, it was not intended to operate. As play-going folks are generally out of leading-strings, such liberties are highly improper, and a repetition shall meet with more particular reprehension.

PHIL-HARMONIC CONCERT.—The Phil-Harmonic Society held its first public choral concert for this year, on Thursday evening, in the great room of the Exchange Building. The entire performance gave particular satisfaction; and Miss Thorley's "Angels, ever bright and fair," Mr. Cartledge's "Jehovah! to my words give ear," and a Concerto on the Clarinet, by Mr. Norton—all in the Second Part, were received with reiterated applause.

Our Friend Jeremy Antique will accept our best thanks for his favour; but, we are of opinion that, as the puzzle was discovered by several of our readers—a revival would not excite further interest.

Printed for Archibald Constable and Co. Edinburgh; and Hurst, Robinson, and Co. 90, Cheapside; and 8, Pall-Mall, London. And sold by Robinson and Ellis, Bancks and Co. and T. Sowter, Manchester.

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA forms a Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, and Literature, on the most approved and comprehensive plan. It was the first work of the kind, which aspired to embrace all the departments of human knowledge, and the superiority of its plan, as well as the general merit of its articles, have procured for it a larger share of success and approbation than ever attended any similar undertaking. It has been the leading object of its Conductors to combine abstract with practical, and solid with pleasing information, in such proportions as would be most useful and most acceptable to the Public; to deliver the truths of science in the most accurate and improved form, and, at the same time, to pay due attention to those branches of knowledge, which, though not admitting of a scientific shape, are yet deservedly popular, and have a powerful influence on the taste, habits, and character of the individual; in a word, to render the Work at once a Dictionary of Science, a Book of Universal Reference, and a copious Abstract of the Literature and Philosophy of the age. Of their success in carrying this plan into execution, it is scarcely necessary to say. The publication of SIX EDITIONS, with successive improvements, and the sale of nearly Thirty Thousand Copies, are most unequivocal proofs of the high estimation in which the Work has been held.

The Sixth Edition, now offered to the Public, has received a variety of corrections and improvements. In the Historical Articles, the narrative has been continued, so as to embrace all the most memorable events which have occurred down to the present time. The Geographical and Statistical Articles have been adapted to the late political arrangements, and amended by incorporating the new information furnished by recent travellers, and references have been made to the new Articles in the Supplement, now in course of publication; so that the whole will form the most complete Repertory of General Knowledge that has yet been given to the Public.

THE CLUB.

No. XXXI.—FRIDAY, MARCH 28, 1823.

THE Tradesman, who has for some time promised us a paper, brought the following essay to the Green Dragon this evening. Some of the readers of the Iris will not, perhaps, be aware that the subject is one which has lately engaged the attention of the first literary institution in the town, and with respect to which there exists a considerable difference of opinion.

The wealth of a nation is of two kinds, and consists either of the possessions, or of the skill and acquirements, of its inhabitants.

Under the first head is comprised the estates, real or personal, and the goods and implements of every kind, belonging either to the state generally, or to the individuals who compose its population.

Under the second head is comprehended the genius, learning, skill, strength, and ability of every kind, which is possessed by the individuals who make up the nation.

Both these kinds of wealth have value in exchange.

I use the term value in the sense in which it is employed in the ordinary intercourse of trade and commerce; and the meaning which I attach to the phrase "value in exchange" is, that the thing to which I apply it, will, if brought into the market, obtain for its possessor, some portion of the circulating medium of the country.

That the first kind of wealth, that which consists of estates, goods, and implements, has this value in exchange is universally admitted. With respect to the second kind, there exists a difference of opinion, which makes it necessary to show that the particulars of which it is composed, really have value in exchange; and are, consequently, portions, more or less important, of the entire wealth of the nation.

An individual who possesses ability of any kind can obtain money, that is value, in exchange for the exercise of that ability. This is equally true of the labourer, the mechanic, the schoolmaster, the lawyer, the author, the actor, the painter, or the buffoon.

In the case of all these persons, the value which they receive depends both on the labour, and on the skill, which they exert, or are supposed to be able to exert when the bargain is made; and in general the skill is held to be of far greater value than the labour. The most robust labourer is well paid by receiving, for the toil of a whole year, a sum which is given to an artist for the exercise of his skill during a few days.

In all cases too, the value which is received is greater or less in proportion to the degree of skill which the person is supposed to possess, who brings his talents or ingenuity to market. The author of Waverley gets ten thousand pounds for a new novel, while an unknown writer can scarcely obtain the same number of half-pence for a work of the same kind, which fills an equal number of pages, and which a person who had no prejudices in favour of the "Northern Warlock," would in all probability pronounce to be quite as valuable.

This holds equally with respect to skill of every description. The lawyer who can puzzle a jury most successfully, the actor who can draw most tears, the physician whose prescriptions are followed by the smallest number of deaths, and the buffoon whose antics are most queer and uncommon; these, and all other artists, are paid in proportion to their reputed skill, the value of which, in exchange, is just so much of the circulating medium as they can obtain by engaging to exercise it for the profit, health, or pleasure of the purchaser.

Most writers on political economy, even though they admit that skill or talent may be a source of wealth to the possessor, deny that it can be so to the nation. The fee, say they, which is given to the lawyer or the physician, does unquestionably increase the wealth of these individuals, but only in the same proportion as it lessens that of those who pay them; there is, consequently, a transfer of property, but no increase, and the amount of national wealth is therefore not augmented.

But this reasoning, even when the facts on which it rests are exactly as they are here stated, is yet inconclusive. The wealth of a nation depends as much on the health and number of the people, and on the security of property and personal freedom, as on the extent of its lands, and the quantity of money and goods which is possessed by the people. Health, security of property, or of civil rights, are those ingredients in the sum of national wealth, which are received in exchange for the fees paid to the physician and the lawyer.

Of two nations which are in all other respects equal, that is the most wealthy in which the people are better able to labour, and more at liberty to apply their capital and skill to the improvement of their individual fortunes. This is as evident as the fact that property is more valuable in proportion as it is more secure, and labourers more productive in proportion to their strength. I infer, therefore, that the money which is paid for the renovation of a man's health, or the preservation of his property and civil rights, contributes as certainly to the increase of individual and national wealth, as if it had been expended in the purchase of a piece of machinery, or paid for the tillage of a field. It is in both cases, capital employed in such a manner as must evidently tend to increase the possessions of the community.

But if this is apparent while the exchange is confined to individuals of the same nation, it will be still more clearly so, if we extend our views beyond the limits of a particular community, and consider the wealth which is continually flowing into a country, the inhabitants of which are, in any way, more skilful than their neighbours.

I speak of skill generally. Every body will admit that the wealth of Great Britain has been considerably increased by the sums received from foreigners in consequence of the superior skill of our mechanics and artisans. This fact is so clear that writers on political economy do not hesitate to include these useful members of society in the honourable class of productive labourers; while they have stigmatised the painter, the author, the physician, the actor, and a multitude of others, each of whom contributes in his way to the stock of the community, by applying to them the epithet unproductive. It will not however be difficult to evince that all these persons increase the wealth of the nation to which they belong, and that they do so in proportion to the degree of skill which they possess in their respective professions. A picture by Sir Thomas Lawrence, or a poem by Lord Byron or Mr. Southey, is a saleable article in every country in Europe; and is as much, and indeed as tangibly, a portion of national wealth, as a spinning jenny or a steam engine. The opinion of a physician, or the performance of an actor, cannot indeed be made an article of traffic in precisely the same manner, but we all know that Mr. Kean has been able to extract money from the pockets even of the calculating population of America; and we have heard of eminent physicians to whom cases have been submitted, and who have received fees, from the inhabitants of the opposite hemisphere.

He must also, in estimating the wealth which is possessed by a nation in the skill of its inhabitants, consider the influx of travellers which is always occasioned by the possession of any kind of excellence. Great artists, eminent philosophers, celebrated dancers, authors, fiddlers, statesmen, or merry-andrews, these, or any of these, if uncommonly clever, are sufficient to attract a crowd of persons from other countries, by whose expenditure the nation which possesses these rarities is enriched.

It appears, therefore, that every kind of skill is a portion of the national wealth, as having value in exchange, and being capable of increasing the capital stock, not only of the individual who possesses it, but also that of the community to which he belongs. R.

STANZAS.

Farewell to the days of my childhood and youth,
Which gaily I spent in yon neat little vale,
Where each rustic peasant, in virtue and truth
Lives happy, though nought but the hill and the dale
Is the object of joy to attract his fair eye.

How oft have I rambled in summer's gay morn,
When the dew-drops were sprinkled all o'er the green lawn,
To the lark's thrilling notes, nor wish'd to return,
Though often I stray'd,—from the morning's grey dawn,
Till the sun sunk to rest, 'hind yon hill to the west.

O 'twas joy most divine to walk with my sire
By the murm'ring streamlet that winds through the mead,
And while th' eventide bells so enchanted my ear,
To list to th' instruction he oft us'd to read
From the book of that God whom he taught me to love.

Alas! 'tis no more.—I must weep, though in vain,
For the times that are past and ne'er can return;
Adieu, then dear spot where nor sorrow, nor pain,
Nor dread of misfortune my bosom hath torn,
But where happy delight was shower'd from above.

HANORIGY.

THE PARK.

Having devoted so much of my attention to the Drive and equestrians, I now turned some portion of it to the pedestrians, and here I was no less amused.—Amidst the crowd, I distinguished some of the legislators of our land lounging along, carelessly nodding to each other, and casting enquiring glances at every youthful female face, and every well-turned ankle.

Being freed from their attendance on their respective Houses of Parliament, they are enjoying their holiday most rationally, by leaving their clubs for an hour or so, to criticize on and admire the female attractions of the Park.—While others have looked in on their return from their favourite Sunday rendezvous, “Tattersall’s,” to see who is in the Park, or to talk over their bets for “the Derby” and “the Oaks”—“White’s beau window is at four o’clock on a fine Sunday, as vacant as are the countenances of most of its frequenters, who are here seen sauntering up and down, evidently ennuied by the unusual exertion.

“Brooks’s” Menagerie is as empty as Exeter-Change on the Sabbath, and her bustling members may here be seen in deep chat, anticipating the debates of the coming week.—“Boodle’s” also sends forth her sober, sedate-looking elders, to this scene of vernal gaiety, while the less recherchés “Watier’s,” “Arthur’s,” and “Cocoa-tree,” with the universal UNITED service club, the Munchausen or “Traveller’s Club,” and the “New Union,” pour forth their shoals, the members of all of which are as different and distinct in their air and appearance as in their habits and modes of life. They have but one or two feelings in common, which are those of finding time hang very heavily on their hands, thinking very highly of themselves individually, and fancying their own club decidedly superior to all the rest.

Milliners, dress-makers, and their pretty piguate looking apprentices, the two former in the newest and most expensive fashion, and the latter in an economical but fanciful abridgment of it, are here enjoying their day of rest, by promenading up and down this crowded walk from three till half-past six, displaying their pretty faces and smart dresses, to the envy of their rival female friends, and to the admiration of men of fashion, and ogling Dandies of every class.

A few women of fashion may be occasionally seen in this walk; but, as if ashamed of its vulgarity, they generally adopt the incognito of a large bonnet and veil, and carefully avoid recognizing their male acquaintance.

Ladies’ maids, in the outré cast-off finery of their mistresses, and aping all their mincing paces and airs of fashion, with pretty nurse-maids, more attentive to the passing beaux than to their infantine charge, formed a considerable portion of the pedestrians.

Disgusted with this melange, and wishing to enjoy a little quiet, and fresh air, I crossed the Park, and walked along the retired part, known by the appellation of the Lovers’ Walk.—Here, thought I, I am at last escaped from that motley crowd; once more I breathe a pure atmosphere, untainted by the breath of vanity and folly, and free from the overpowering mingled gales of Otto and Rose, Odour of Jessamine, Eau de Portugal, and Huile Antique.

Here I shall see only sober mortals like myself, who come for the purposes of air and exercise, and who, like me, wish to avoid the contamination of Vanity Fair, at the other side of the Park.—“Well,” I exclaimed, “I am glad to find there are some sensible people left in the world;” and my self-complacency was increased, when I saw a handsome carriage drive up, escorted by a gentleman on horseback, who handed from it a very lovely woman, fondled the babe that was left in the carriage with its nurse, with all the seeming affection of a parent, and then drawing the arm of his fair companion through his own, and still holding her pliant hand in his, walked gently along. The youth and visible affection of this handsome pair, gave me pleasurable emotions, and I was still more gratified by meeting three or four similar couples, all equally occupied with each other.—The equipages, but more than all, the air of elegance visible in these turtles, impressed me with a belief, that they were persons of rank and fashion, and I was delighted at finding so many instances of domestic felicity in the higher classes of society; but, alas! this sweet scene of conjugal bliss was quickly dissipated, for my friend C happening to ride past, observed me, and, giving his horse to his servant, soon joined me. I was on the point of expressing the pleasure I had experienced, in witnessing so many proofs of conjugal happiness, when my friend suddenly exclaimed, “It is too bad; it really is too bad.”—That couple who are this moment turning so abruptly from us, are the sixth pair of lovers that I have seen within the last ten minutes.—The ladies are all married, and mothers; their husbands, good, honourable, unsuspecting men, who believe their worthless partners to be, at this moment, at evening service, or occupied in paying friendly visits: some of the lovers, who are husbands and fathers themselves, are anxious to avoid publicity, and the others belong to that worthless race, known by the appellation of Dandies, who are more desirous to draw observation to their gallantries than to screen their guilty mistresses from scandal. I saw the tili-bury of one of them standing by the carriage of the lady whom he was escorting; his groom, and her coachman and footman, were passing their coarse jokes on the apparent tendresse of his master and their mistress, and laughing at the credulity of the abused husband, while the gallant takes care to conduct his silly and worthless companion to the most exposed part of the walk, and to press her hand, and use all the freedoms that can lead the world to believe their guilt. My friend then mentioned the names of some of the parties, and I was shocked at finding the delinquents to belong to some of the most respectable families in the kingdom.

All my satisfaction and pleasure at the fancied domestic happiness which I had witnessed, was, in a few minutes, dashed to the ground; and, in its place, vice, depravity, and duplicity, “reared their horrid heads before me.”

I turned from this scene with still greater disgust than that with which I had left the crowded promenade, and gave way to the reflections that intruded themselves on my mind.—“Am I indeed,” (I mentally exclaimed), “in the capital of a Christian country, celebrated over all the world for its morals, its religion, and the virtues of its inhabitants, and is it thus the Sabbath is passed! I am no enemy to innocent recreation, and have no objection to permitting a part of this day to be devoted to healthful exercise and cheerful society; but let those who would call me a morose old Cynic for finding fault with what are generally termed innocent amusements, pause awhile, and, with me, reflect on the scene which we have this day witnessed, ere he accuse me of want of charity, or downright methodism.

Let me ask, what are the inducements that have this day filled the Park with such multitudes? Not the desire of air or exercise, because both could be enjoyed in much greater perfection in any other outlet than in this crowded, heated, and dusty scene. No: vanity, idleness, or some still greater vice, has led them hither. Many of the splendid equipages this day exhibited, the expenses of which, may have involved their extravagant owners, might never, perhaps, have been built, except for the wish of showing them in the Park; but the evil does not rest here.—The lady, who comes to display her elegant carriage in the Park, is but too apt to display her elegant self; her vanity, gratified with the admiration that both may excite, begets a self-complacency most dangerous to her unsettled and wavering principles; and the beau who handed her from the Opera the night before, is so sure (purely by chance) to meet her in the Park next day, and both having nothing else to do or to think of, are so glad to meet, that the check-string is pulled, and they cannot part until they have at least talked over the exquisite ballet and the divine Noblet. If the mischief ends here, it is well; but from such beginnings, many a fair and titled belle may date her ruin, and many a noble family its disgrace.

The competition in equipages, so injurious to the higher classes, is even still more so, to the middling. It engenders in them a passion for dress and idleness, and extravagance succeeds extravagance. Their attendance at divine worship is often given up, because it may interfere with the Park hours; and the expense of the dress to be worn there, leaves its wearer too poor to assist her fellow-creatures. The milliner must charge an extra price for her finery, and practice additional imposition, to enable her to sport the elegant pelisse and bonnet with which she adorns herself for the Park, and her pretty but thoughtless apprentice is so charmed with the admiration which she excites, and so anxious to appear in a still smarter dress, in which she thinks she will achieve additional conquests, that she falls an easy prey to the first designing libertine who marks her for his victim.

The young and unthinking Dandy is attracted by a sort of eclat attached to ladies of a certain class, and seeing them noticed by men, whom, from their station and age, he thinks worthy of imitation, he follows the bad example, loses the sense of shame that before restrained him, and forms connexions that often entail on him the most pernicious consequences.

The evils inevitably resulting from the scenes which I had witnessed in the Lovers’ Walk, now recurred to me.—I fancied these women returning home to their unsuspecting and duped husbands, probably putting on the semblance of affection, the better to conceal their deception; every word of kindness uttered by husband or wife, commented on by the servants, who are in the secret of the evening walk, and who are exchanging glances of admiration at their mistress’s talent at dissimulation; or, perhaps, viewing with pity the confiding victim of her arts.

In what situation do those wretched women place themselves and their husbands! If they are not lost to every feeling of honor, bitter must be the pang which they experience at every fresh proof of affection or confidence shewn them by their unsuspecting partners. They must live in a state of perpetual dread of discovery; and should they be so hardened as to be fearless of this, yet their pride, and what woman ever was known to be without pride, must be exposed to continual mortification from observing the perfect understanding which their servants have of their misconduct.

I will not dwell on this painful picture; I will not add to the infamy and disgrace of the guilty wife, or the probable death of the lover or husband, caused by the detection of her guilt:—no, the reader's mind will supply all that I have omitted; and if the perusal of these thoughts should lead any of my fellow beings to reflect on the waste of time in spending the Sabbath as I have described, I shall not have written them in vain.

BIOGRAPHY.

MEMOIR OF LORD BYRON,

(By Robert Scott, Editor of the Cabinet of Portraits.)

George Gordon Byron, Lord Byron, the grandson of the Hon. Admiral Byron, was born January the 22nd, 1788, and succeeded to the title in the tenth year of his age, on the death of William, Lord Byron, who in 1765 was convicted of manslaughter, at the bar of the House of Peers, for killing Mr. Chaworth, a relative to his lordship, in a duel. The mother of the present nobleman was descended from a family nearly allied to the ducal house of Gordon.

His Lordship received the principal part of his education at Harrow School, and at the age of sixteen was removed to the University of Cambridge, where he completed his studies. On leaving college, in his nineteenth year, he retired to Newstead Abbey, the seat of his ancestors; and shortly after, in 1807, at the importunity of his friends, published a volume of poems under the title of Hours of Idleness, which the Edinburgh Reviewers lashed very severely, counselling their noble author forthwith to abandon poetry and turn his talents to better account. To this merciless attack his lordship retorted with great severity, in a satirical effusion entitled English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, of which two editions were sold in a very short time; but after another edition was ready for publication, its author thought proper to suppress it, though for what reason is unknown.

While at college, the eccentricity of Lord Byron evinced itself by his keeping a young bear, and making it the associate of his studies; and on quitting the University he left the animal in possession of his chambers, to stand, as he expressed it, candidate for the next vacant fellowship. Shortly after his residence at Newstead Abbey, he formed a strong attachment to a large Newfoundland dog, which he took great delight in training. In his aquatic excursions he had seldom any other companion; and being an excellent swimmer, he would often try the sagacity and fidelity of the animal, by falling out of the boat, as if by accident; upon which the dog never failed to jump overboard, and drag his master to the shore. In 1808 this faithful creature died, when his lordship caused a monument to be erected to its memory; in the epitaph on which are these lines:—

'To mark a friend's remains these stones arise:—
I never knew but one, and here he lies.'

About this period the noble lord, having found a skull in the cemetery of his ancestors, formed the strange idea of having it converted into a drinking cup; and being mounted on a silver stand, he wrote an inscription, which was engraven round it, and in which he says:—

'Quaff while thou can'st—another race,
When thou and thine like me are sped,
May rescue thee from earth's embrace,
And rhyme and revel with the dead.'

In 1809 his lordship came of age, and took his seat in the House of Peers; shortly after which he went to Portugal, accompanied by Mr. John Cam Hobhouse. Having visited various parts of that country, they proceeded to Cadiz, and embarked for the Mediterranean. The travellers first explored Albania, and visited several other parts of the Ottoman dominions; and, on their arrival at Jannina, were introduced to Ali Pacha, by Major, now Colonel, Leake, the English resident. Ali received them with the greatest respect, and invited them to Tepaleni, his favourite seat. On their way thither they were overtaken by a tremendous thunder storm, during which the guides lost their way, and it was with much difficulty, and no little peril, that they regained the right road in this mountainous country.

At Athens his lordship was much mortified on beholding the devastations committed by travellers, who had dismantled many of its chief beauties. But the greatest spoliation was committed by the orders of an English ambassador to the Porte, who caused several of the finest temples that were remaining to be nearly demolished; and on a pillar in the temple of Minerva had his own name, and that of his wife, engraved in the marble at a considerable height. On beholding this, Lord Byron determined to punish the presumption, by raising himself, with great difficulty, to the requisite height, and obliterating the Earl's name. That of the lady he gallantly left untouched; and farther to humble the pride of his brother peer, he caused two very severe lines to be deeply cut on the west side of the same temple. His indignation at these barbarities is farther expressed in the introduction to the Second Canto of Childe Harold; in which Minerva is represented as addressing herself to the noble bard, and after speaking of the spoliation in her temple, she says:—

'First on the head of him who did the deed
My curse shall light, on him and all his seed.
Without one spark of intellectual fire,
Be all his sons as senseless as their sire;
If one with wit the parent breed disgrace,
Believe him bastard of a better race;
Still with his hireling artists let him prate,
And folly's praise repay for wisdom's hate.
Long of their patron's gusto let them tell,
Whose noblest native gusto is to sell:
To sell, and make (may shame record the day!)
The state receiver of his pilfered prey.'

During Lord Byron's residence at Athens, he, in conjunction with Mr. John Flott, of St. John's College, caused a large block of marble, with a Greek epitaph by Mr. Walpole, to be placed over the grave of the learned John Tweddell, who died in that city, while on his travels, in 1799, and who was interred in the Theseum without any stone or inscription.

Lord Byron visited every part of the Morea, and travelled over Euboea, as well as the plains of Athens and Achaia; during which he cultivated his literary pursuits, and wrote several pieces, which he has since published. So great was his love of literature, that he gave a very valuable antique gem for a Triglot Manuscript Lexicon. From Athens his lordship embarked for Constantinople, on board the Salsotte. While laying in the Dardanelles, he agreed with Lieutenant Ekenhead to try the practicability of swimming across the Hellespont, and thus verify the story of Leander. On the 10th of May, 1810, they accomplished the task the one, in one hour and five; the other, in one hour and ten minutes; during which they swam upwards of four miles, although it is not above a mile across: this was owing to the rapidity of the current, which is such that no boat can row directly over. His lordship, in a poem written on this occasion, speaking of Leander, says,—

'Twere hard to say who fared the best,
Sad mortals thus the Gods shall plague you;
He lost his labour, I my jest.
For he was drown'd, and I've the agree.'

Having visited Constantinople, and made some excursions in Romania, his lordship returned to Athens, when Mr. Hobhouse bent his course to England, and left his noble friend to sojourn a short time longer in Greece. During this second visit to Attica he wrote several of his most popular pieces. He returned to this country in 1811, after three years' absence, during which he lost his mother, who died in Scotland.

A few months after Lord Byron's return, he published the two first cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. This was in the spring of 1812. The great poetical merits of this production at once established his fame, in defiance of the unsavable character of its hero; and those reviewers who had so harshly treated his juvenile effusions concurred in the general opinion of its merits. The Childe was considered by many as an intended portraiture of the author; but surely no one could speak thus of himself:—

'In Albion's Isle there dwelt a youth,
Who ne'er in virtue's ways did take delight;
But spent his days in riot most unthought,
And vex'd with mirth the drowsy ear of night.
Ah, me! in sooth he was a shameless wight,

Sore given to revel and ungodly glee;
Few earthly things found favour in his sight,
Save concubines and carnat companions,
And flanneting wassallers of high and low degree.'

His lordship likewise says in his preface: 'a fictitious character is introduced for the sake of giving some connexion to the piece, which, however, makes no pretension to regularity. It has been suggested to me by friends on whose opinion I set a high value, that in this fictitious character I may incur the suspicion of having intended some real personage: this I beg leave once for all to disclaim. Harold is the child of imagination, for the purpose I have stated. In some very trivial particulars, and those merely local, there might be grounds for such a notion; but in the main-points, I should hope, none whatever.'

In an after edition he further observed, 'I now leave Childe Harold to live his day, such as he is; it had been more agreeable, and certainly more easy, to have drawn an amiable character. It had been more easy to varnish over his faults, to make him do more and express less; but he never was intended as an example, farther than to show that early perversion of mind and morals leads to satiety of past pleasures, and disappointment in new ones; and that even the beauties of nature and the stimulus of travel (except ambition, the most powerful of all excitements) are lost on a soul so constituted, or rather misdirected.'

After saying thus much, we cannot conceive how any one can suppose that the author meant the Childe as a personification of himself. Whether the character is calculated to have any effect on public morals is another question; and though he is 'a shameless wight,' we think him a very harmless one, who, though he may amuse, can neither do good nor evil to society.

On the opening of Drury-lane Theatre, his lordship wrote the introductory address which was spoken on the occasion. It was, however, very deficient in those beauties which the public had a right to expect from his highly gifted muse. In the same year he endeavoured to sell Newstead Abbey, and the manorial lands appertaining thereto. One hundred and fifty thousand pounds were to have been given for it; but the purchaser not being able to make good his payments, induced his lordship to re-enter his ancient mansion. Shortly afterwards a coal-mine was discovered on his estate at Rochdale, worth fifty thousand pounds.

In 1813 appeared the Giaour, a fragment of a Turkish tale. This poem, like Childe Harold, abounds in sad and solitary musings, but is fraught with strong poetic feeling. Giaour signifies infidel, and a note at the close of the poem gives the fact on which it is founded.

The same year also produced The Bride of Abydos, a Turkish tale, in which our author imposed upon himself the ungracious task of obtaining, by fine writing, mastery over a very objectionable story.

Early in the following year appeared the Corssair, a story, as the name imports, of a pirate chief, who had for his hold, from whence he and his gang issued out on their depredations, one of the Egean islands.

This latter poem was dedicated to his friend, Thomas Moore, in which he declared that this was the last time he should appear before the world as an author for some years. This resolution, however, he soon forgot; for within a few months he published anonymously a small poem called Lara, which is evidently, although not avowedly, an addition to the Corssair. This tale first appeared in conjunction with Jaqueline, by Mr. Rogers. About the same time his lordship also produced his Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte.

On the 2d of January, 1815, Lord Byron married Miss Milbanke, the only daughter and heiress of Sir Ralph Milbanke Noel, shortly after which he published his Hebrew Melodies; and early in 1816 The Siege of Corinth, and Parisina.

In about a year after their marriage Lady Byron gave birth to a daughter; and in April, 1816, appeared the far famed Fare thee well, addressed to her ladyship, which gave authenticity to a rumour that the noble pair were separated. On this painful subject so little is known, and so much has been said, that we shall say but little ourselves. His lordship has honourably acquitted his wife of all blame, and therefore the fault must have been his own. We sincerely lament that a pair so liberally endowed by nature should be thus separated; but it is not the duty of a public writer to multiply scandal and exaggerate reports, which can only serve to widen that breach which every feeling and humane mind must deplore. On the subject of his separation, his lordship also wrote A Sketch from Private Life, which certainly did not redound much to his lordship's credit.

In a very short time Lord Byron left the kingdom, with a determination, it is believed, never to return, and instantly proceeded to Brussels, taking in his way a survey of the field of Waterloo. Continuing his tour, he arrived at Clarens, on the Lake of Geneva, where he fixed his residence for some time. Here his manner of living was very reserved, and in some measure forbidding. Having invited M. Pictet and M. Bonstetten one day to dinner, he went on the lake to Chillon, leaving a gentleman to do the honours of the table and apologise for his absence. At another time, when engaged to an evening party at the house of a lady, he abruptly returned home on finding the drawing-room full.

Shortly after Lord Byron's arrival in Switzerland he wrote a Monody on the late Mr. Sheridan, which was spoken at Drury-lane Theatre, on the 7th of September, 1816. It is a warm tribute to one of the brightest luminaries of his day. Shortly after his lordship published The Prisoner of Chillon, and other Poems; at the same time appeared the Third Canto of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, in which the fiction of the character of the pilgrim is considerably dropped: it is clear that his lordship merely introduced him for the purpose of connecting the several descriptions. He appears at Waterloo, and keeps by the side of his lordship wherever he roamed. It is not so gloomy as most of his previous productions, and contains some of his best poetry.

In 1817 appeared Manfred, a dramatic poem, and one of his lordship's most extravagant productions. This was followed by The Lament of Tasso, a poem of infinite beauty and pathos. This idea was suggested by the noble author's visiting the Lunatic Asylum of St. Anne, at Ferrara, where the immortal but unfortunate Tasso was confined some years, for his presumption in aspiring to the love of the Princess Leonora of Este.

His lordship, having visited various parts of Italy, took up his residence for some time at Venice, where he was joined by his friend Mr. Hobhouse, with whom he went to Roma, and there finished the Fourth and last Canto of Childe Harold, which appeared early in 1818, with copious notes by his fellow traveller, who also published a volume entitled Illustrations of Childe Harold.

His lordship's next production was of a different cast of character, and gained him increased popularity by the pleasantness of the subject and versification. This was the tale of Beppo, which, for dry humour and fluency of language, is unequalled. His lordship's next poem, Mazeppa, was also in a very original style, and displayed great imagery and richness.

In 1819 appeared the two first cantos of Don Juan, a poem possessing infinite talent, but which sunk the moral character of its author low—miserably low—in the estimation of all good and well-disposed persons. For some unexplained reason, the poem appeared without either author's or publisher's name; and as the law will not protect a copyright in an immoral work it became a common property, and was eagerly seized upon by the dregs of the bookselling trade, who, studying profit rather than character, deluge the country with impiety and obscenity. Don Juan, which was first published at two guineas, was therefore soon to be bought for one shilling, and every one was enabled to read the immoralities of his lordship's prostituted muse. Three more cantos were afterwards published, which were in every respect equal to the two first. The character of this poem has been thus drawn:—'Of this Odyssey of immorality there cannot be two opinions; for let the religious sentiments of the reader be as lax as possible, he must be shocked at the barefaced licentiousness of the poem, and the direct attempt made in it to recommend a promiscuous sexual intercourse as the sum of human happiness. Marriage is of course reprobated, and all the laws of social life are set at open defiance as violations of natural liberty. Lord Byron is the very Comus of poetry, who, by the bewitching airiness of his numbers, aims to turn the moral world into a herd of monsters. It must, however, be allowed, that in his tale of Don Juan he has not acted the wily part of concealing the poison under the appearance of virtue: on the contrary, he makes a frank confession of his principles, and glories in vice with the unblushing temerity of a rampant satyr, who acknowledges no rule but appetite. The mischief of the work is rendered doubly so by the attractive gaiety of the language, the luxuriance of the imagery, and the humorous digressions with which the story is embellished and obsequered.'

His lordship's next appearance was in a controversy with Mr. Bowles, the editor of the Works of Pope, whom the noble lord charged with having only glanced at some of the immoralities of the bard of Twickenham; but the main object of the epistle is to controvert the opinion that, for the power of poetical adaptation, art is inferior to nature. This Mr. Bowles fully answered in two letters.

Lord Byron next appeared as a dramatist in the production of Marino Faliero, a tragedy in five acts, which, however, is extremely dull; to this play was appended four cantos of a poem entitled The Prophecy of Dante. A few months afterwards he produced a volume containing Sardanapalus, a drama; The Two Foscari, a drama; and Caio, a mystery. This last piece was published against the advice of Mr. Murray, of Mr. Gifford, and even of Mr. Hobhouse. The blasphemous tendency of it is such that the lord chancellor refused to grant an injunction against a pirated edition, which one of the freebooters of the trade had brought out in a cheap form; and this, like Don Juan, has been printed in all shapes and at all prices.

Mr. Southey, the poet laureate, having been attacked by Lord Byron in several instances, at length retaliated, in his Vision of Judgment, by designating his lordship, and those of his stamp, as the 'Satanic School'; comparing them to the infidels from whose labours arose the French revolution. His lordship accordingly, in an appendix to The Two Foscari, repelled the accusation with vehemence; to which Mr. Southey replied through a letter in the public papers. Here the contest ended; but his lordship sought revenge by writing a Parody on the Vision of Judgment, which appeared in the first number of The Liberal, a work the most contemptible ever foisted upon the public with such high vauntings. The Pisan journal was expected to contain at least good writing, if not good morals; but it was miserably deficient in both, the whole weight lying on the shoulders of the noble bard, without whom a second number never could have made its appearance. In this publication the intended object seems to ridicule religion, and all the best institutions by which society is cemented; and it cannot fail to be a matter of general regret that the high degree of talent which his lordship evinces, even in the worst of his productions, and which might be employed with so much advantage to the general interests of society, should be directed with no better aim—to no better end.

His lordship's character is a strange compound of good and evil; for of the former many traits are in existence. It is said that he makes no profit of his writings, but that the copyrights of his most popular works have been given to particular friends, whose circumstances rendered the favour of great importance to them; or else have been a gift to his publisher, who in this case must have profited considerably by his lordship's muse. It is a well known fact that he has written a Memoir of his own Life and Times, which he presented as a tribute of friendship to Thomas Moore Esq. whose circumstances at the time were embarrassed through the failure of his agent at Bermuda. This production, which its noble author has prohibited from publication till after his death, was sold for two thousand pounds.

VERSES, BY J. MONTGOMERY.

Composed for the Anniversary of Robert Burns's Birth-day, celebrated at Sheffield, 1820.

What bird in beauty, flight, or song,
Can with the Bard compare,
Who sang as sweet, and soar'd as strong,
As ever child of air?
His plume, his note, his form, could Burns
For whim or pleasure change;
He was not one, but all by turns,
With transmigration strange.

The Blackbird, oracle of spring,
When drow'd his moral lay;
The Swallow, wheeling on the wing,
Capriciously at play.

The Humming-bird, from bloom to bloom,
Inhaling heavenly balm;
The Raven, in the tempest gloom;
The Halcyon in the calm:

In "Auld Kirk Alloway" the Owl
At 'witching time of night;
By "Bonnie Doon" the earliest fowl
That carol'd to the light:

He was the Wren amidst the grove,
When in his homely vein;
At "Bannockburn" the Bird of Jove,
With thunder in his train:

The Woodlark in his mournful hours;
The Goldfinch in his mirth;
The Thrush, a spendthrift of his power,
Enrapt'ring heaven and earth:

The Swan in majesty and grace,
Contemplative and still;
But rous'd,—no Falcon in the chase
Could, like his satire, kill:

The Linnet in simplicity;
In tenderness the Dove;
But, more than all beside, was he
The Nightingale in love!

Oh! had he never stoop'd to shame,
Nor lent a charm to vice;
How had Devotion lov'd to name
That Bird of Paradise.

Peace to the dead! in Scotia's choir
Of Minstrels great and small,
He springs from his spontaneous fire,
The Phoenix of them all!

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ESSAY

ON CALORIC AND COLD, AS CONNECTED WITH
ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM.

(Concluded from our last.)

Ice may be considered a reflecting mirror, and acts, in fact, as such. The light of day obscures that of the stars, and for the same reason the Aurora Borealis can only be seen after sunset. It is needless to remark, that magnetism is then more abundant than electricity; and as I consider also thunder and lightning the result of a combination of electricity and magnetism, the reverse takes place; that is to say, that under these circumstances electricity is in a greater proportion, and that this agent being generally accompanied by light, this phenomenon is visible in the day time, as well as during night;—in a word, one exhibits itself under the equator particularly, and in warm climates, and the other towards the poles, and cold regions. Although these two fluids are every where in constant and perpetual action, it is no less evident that the first exercises its power in the summer especially, and the latter in the winter.—In the last mentioned season, are the astonishing effects of electricity ever observable? Is it not remarkable, that if a few flashes of lightning are sometimes seen in this season, it is only on days unusually warm for the time of the year? The effect of heat in producing electricity, is very evident in eruptions of volcanos, the immense cloud of vapour proceeding from which, exhibiting the most vivid flashes of lightning, followed by thunder extraordinarily loud, was particularly in the eruption of Vesuvius, in 1779. By analogy I would explain why in summer, our fields are often laid waste by severe hail storms; it is because at those times there exists a sufficient quantity of the magnetic fluid to congeal the vapours floating in the atmosphere. In the same way I explain why, in the beginning of autumn, and very late in the spring snow falls on the mountains; and why, in fine, in the months

2

A leal, light heart was in my breast,
 My hand unstain'd with plunder ;
 And for fair Scotland, home again,
 I cheery on did wander.
 I thought upon the banks of Coil,
 I thought upon my Nancy,
 I thought upon the witching smile
 That caught my youthful fancy.

3

At length I reach'd the bonny glen,
 Where early life I sported ;
 I pass'd the mill, and trysting thorn,
 Where Nancy oft I courted :
 Who spied I but my own dear maid,
 Down by her mother's dwelling !
 And turn'd me round to hide the flood
 That in my eyes was swelling.

4

With alter'd voice, said I, sweet lass,
 Sweet as yon hawthorn's blossom,
 O! happy, happy may he be,
 That's dearest to thy bosom :
 My purse is light, I've far to gang,
 And fain would be thy lodger ;
 I've serv'd my king and country long,
 Take pity on a soldier.

8

For gold the merchant ploughs the main,
 The farmer ploughs the manor ;
 But glory is the soldier's prize,
 The soldier's wealth is honour ;
 The brave poor soldier ne'er despise,
 Nor count him as a stranger,
 Remember he's his country's stay
 In day and hour of danger.

5

So wistfully she gaz'd on me,
 And lovelier was than ever ;
 Said she, a soldier once I loved,
 Forget him shall I never :
 Our humble cot, and homely fare,
 You freely shall partake it,
 That gallant badge, the dear cockade,
 You're welcome for the sake o't.

6

She gaz'd—she reddened like a rose—
 Then pale like any lily ;
 She sank within my arms and cried,
 Art thou my own dear Willie ?
 By him who made yon sun and sky—
 By whom true love's regarded,
 I am the man ; and thus may still
 True lovers be rewarded.

7

The wars are o'er, and I'm come home,
 And find thee still true hearted ;
 Tho' poor in gear, we're rich in love,
 And more we'll ne'er be parted.
 Said she, my grandsire left me gold,
 A mailin plenish'd fairly ;
 And come, my faithful soldier lad
 Thou'rt welcome to it dearly !

of October and November, it falls so abundantly in cold regions, as Canada, Switzerland, and the north of Germany, Poland, Sweden, Norway, Russia, &c.; in a word, in all countries near the poles. If any incredulous person should ask why the phenomena of hail and snow never occur under the equator or within the tropics, except on the Andes, I would answer that that very circumstance proves the justness of my argument. However, it is remarkable, that when the cold is very intense, the magnetic fluid has too much power to allow the atmospheric vapours to rise from the earth, by their condensation below, so that the sky is then clear; the same takes place in the summer by an opposite cause, that is to say, by the rarefaction; fogs and abundant rains are the result of a kind of a negative action of those two agents; from this it is easy to explain why the cord of an hydrometer is tense or relaxed, and why the spirit of wine or mercury rises or falls in the barometer. Having explained by what means the atmospheric vapours are congealed, it will not be difficult to show why the electric fluid, and, I may add here, the galvanic fluid, which is a modification of the same, instantly consume and reduce metals; it is by a force opposed to that which congeals them. The magnetic fluid is the most rectified part of cold, as the electric is the most rectified part of caloric. I have already observed that these two fluids are present in every place, and in constant and perpetual action; that the cause of the magnetic fluid existed principally about the poles, and that the needle consequently obeys their attraction. To these facts, I think we may add one more, which may in time resolve many great problems and difficulties. What I have to remark is, that, each of these fluids flows in a current or stream, which divides the globe into four equal parts, the magnetic from north to south, the electric from east to west. This will perhaps sufficiently explain why their shock causes peals of thunder, as well as the quivering of the clouds by flashes of lightning. This continual current of the magnetic fluid from north to south, in my opinion, obliges the needle to remain in that position; so that having here a good explanation of the phenomenon, there will be no necessity for supposing the whole earth a magnet. When I perceive and pause upon these laws, which govern the universe, I acknowledge with deep felt admiration the power and wisdom of the beneficent Creator. I behold the celestial bodies linked to our planetary system, majestically rolling from east to west, round a common centre, which itself obeys the universal law of gravitation. This law is to the sun, the glorious orb of day, what that of death is to the mighty potentates of earth.—The immortal Galileo, who ought during his life to have been much more honoured than even Newton and Franklin have been, received perpetual imprisonment as the reward of his genius. As for me, an obscure man, who dare to follow in the steps of these philosophers, I fear not, (thanks to the age in which we live,) the fate of the former, nor does my ambition aspire to the renown of the latter, I declare, that to them I owe every thing; I do but draw my inferences from the great principles which they have established.

ANALYSIS OF THE ABOVE SYSTEM.

The division of our planet into three kingdoms only, is evidently defective, and this is the proof. Is it not true that in arithmetic as well as in mathematics, the divisor must be contained in the dividend, and the quotient must reproduce the dividend when multiplied by the divisor? Now, the division of the earth into three kingdoms only, does not distinguish one part three times larger than all the others together, inasmuch as to this day, the sea water in general, the air and ether have not been included in the kingdoms of nature. It is not the less true that they form an integrant part of the same; and doubtless to this defective division, is to be attributed the obscurity in which the system of the world has been so long involved. Let a fourth kingdom then be admitted, under the denomination of meteonical, because from it meteors generally proceed, and in it exhibit their most extraordinary phenomena. Let these four agents also be admitted, caloric and cold, electricity and magnetism; of which the cause is now known. Let it be admitted that each of these, by an opposing force, contributes to the preservation and animation of nature, and this grand universe, and wonderful machine will be more open to our comprehension, to our judgment, and to our understanding, than this little and mortal frame in which I feel the throbbings of the heart.

I am too well aware of the power of habit, of education, and the prejudices to which these give birth, not to perceive that reason itself must slowly come to light. Though I have proved the cause of frigorice, many will perhaps admit a causeless effect rather than accept the proof which I have demonstrated.

However, to hasten conviction, may I be permitted to transfer to earth, those laws which govern the heavens—those sublime laws which were ascertained by the immortal Newton! Let any one answer me whether they act not, operate not, by opposing forces, in which God has shown to mankind the mightiness of his power, and the infinity of his wisdom.

Born in an age of revolutions, may I have, at least, the happiness of contributing to one which shall be useful to mankind.

ACCOUNT OF A SINGULAR ELECTRICAL PHENOMENON, WITH SOME PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS ON CONDUCTING RODS.

The cotton mills of  and Co. in Pendleton, are remarkable for their insulated situation, standing in the midst of an extensive flat, formed by the rich alluvial lands of the Irwell. One of the mills, which is lofty, is furnished with a conductor at each end. Some years ago, the electric fluid passed down the chimney of a cottage not more than 20 or 30 yards from one of these conductors, which was then imperfect, not reaching the ground. A woman standing near the fire of the cottage, was struck down by the fluid, but not seriously injured. Alarmed at this accident, the mechanics of the mills repaired the rod, but did not make it descend into the ground above a foot. Since then, cellar windows having been put out at the same end of the building, the end of the rod became exposed, in which state it still remains. Passing by this road, at a late hour of the night, during last autumn, a faint light attracted my attention, which seemed to proceed from a window, but on approaching nearer, I was surprised to find it issuing from the end of the rod, exactly resembling the pencil of light which proceeds from a pointed wire, in electrical experiments. I immediately withdrew. Some time previous to this, this same mill was discovered to be on fire, early on a Sunday morning, and was saved with difficulty. How the fire originated, I believe, could never be ascertained. I have often thought since witnessing the above phenomenon, that this mill might have been set on fire by a discharge of the electric fluid. The following circumstances strengthen this supposition. In this mill there is an immense upright iron shaft, and the imperfect conductor is nailed to the wall, which has not only chinks in it, but is penetrated by several iron cramps.

It is a matter of deep regret, to observe how tardy the world is in availing itself of important discoveries and inventions.* Ages roll away before the most useful become general; and many are never known, beyond the premises of the men whose genius gave them birth. A deep rooted prejudice against all that is new, and deeper veneration for all that is old, seem to be the chief causes of this anomaly. A train of reflections similar to this has many times passed through my mind, on seeing high buildings without conducting rods, or with very imperfect ones.

As an excuse for neglect, some persons pretend that there is but little danger; but when we consider the great number of melancholy cases of death by lightning, annually inserted in the newspapers, we cannot admit their conclusions to be just. To scientific men it is well known, that the air is always positively or negatively charged, and that lofty and insulated situations are in continual danger. A few weeks ago, the newspapers recorded a case of some sheep being destroyed by lightning, on a certain hill, in a gentleman's farm; like misfortunes having several times happened to cattle on the same spot. I shall not enter into the question any further; but proceed to offer a few hints respecting the formation of conducting rods. Iron, on account of its cheapness, is the metal most usually employed, but it is not so good a conductor as some others. In respect to their conducting power, metals are now, I believe, classed in the following order.

|-------------|------------------|
| 1. Copper | 6. Iron |
| 2. Gold | 7. Tin |
| 3. Silver | 8. Quicksilver |
| 4. Platinum | 9. Lead |
| 5. Brass | 10. Semi-metals. |

Copper is therefore the metal that ought to be employed, not only on account of its superiority as a conductor, but also from its being less disposed to rust than iron.

Conducting rods seldom rise sufficiently high, and seldom descend low enough into the earth. They should rise 10 or 12 feet above the highest part of the building, and the points at the top should not be less than 4 or 5 feet long. The rods should not be formed in links, nor should they be nailed to the wall: they should penetrate deep into the earth, several feet below the foundation of the building; bricks, lime, sand and dry earth, being very bad conductors. It is well known that the electric fluid is conducted over the surface of bodies, and yet when they are coated with a non-conducting substance, as sealing wax, they conduct equally well. The rods ought therefore to be painted, or covered with a resinous composition.

Trees are frequently destroyed by lightning, and cattle that seek shelter under them. A gentleman had several favorite oaks, in a meadow before his house, one of which, a few years ago, was rent to pieces by a stroke of the electric fluid, and two colts killed that were under it. After this accident, he felt considerable alarm every time it thundered or lightened. I recommended him to apply conducting rods to the remaining trees, and his house. He did so, and says, that ever since he has felt perfectly easy. He made the rods rise considerably higher than the top branches of the trees, and the rod on the tree nearest his house, he made subservient to another purpose. It had five radii on the top, one vertical, on which turned a small gilt weathercock; the other four projected towards the cardinal points.

Solution of Question No. 62, by I. G.

A.

B. C. d. D.

Join AB, BC, AC; and produce BC to D. In CD take any point d as a centre; and with radius da, taking da : Cd :: 9 : 8, intersect the line AC. Through the point A draw AD parallel to ad; then will D be the point where the ship A overtakes B; for, as the two triangles ADC and adC are similar, AD : CD :: 9 : 8.

Hence we have given, AB = 1; and BC = $\frac{2}{3}$; suppose CD = x; then $(8x + 2)^2 + 1 = (9x)^2$ or $64x^2 + 32x + 4 + 1 = 81x^2$; hence $x = 2.04$; and CD = $8x = 16.3$ miles; also AD = $9x = 18.34$ —consequently the angle ADB will be found, by trigonometry, to be $3^\circ 8'$ west of south.

Messrs. Hill, Wilson, and Jones, have favoured us with neat solutions to the same question.

Question No. 65, by Mr. Jones, Chorlton Row.

I am required to cut off from the corner of a field, where the fences form an angle of 95° , a triangular area. The fence to be made for this purpose, is to go directly across the corner of the field, and to pass by a tree which stands within the field, and which is 300 yards distant from the corner of the field. This tree is to bisect the new fence, and a line drawn from it to the angular point of the field will divide the angle 95° into two angles of 60° and 35° . What, then, will be the area of the triangle cut off?

THE FLOOD OF THERALY, the GIRD OF PROVERBE, and other Poems, from the pen of BARRY CORNWALL, enable us to enrich our columns, with some inimitable sketches of Fancy.—

Still the rain fell:

No pitying, no relapse, no hope:—The world Was vanishing like a dream. Lightning and Storm, Thunder and deluging rain, now vexed the air To madness, and the riotous winds laughed out Like Bacchanals, whose cups some god has charmed, Beneath the headlong torrents towns and towers Fell down, temples all stone, and brazen shrines; And piles of marble, palace and pyramid (Kings' homes or towering graves) in a breath were swept Crumbling away. Masses of ground and trees Uporn and floating, hollow rocks brute-crammed, Vast herds and bleating flocks, reptiles, and beasts Bellowing, and vainly with the shoking waves Struggling, were hurried out,—but none returned: All on the altar of the giant Sea Offered, like twice ten thousand hecatombs, Whose blood allays the burning wrath of gods.

The last who lived was one

Who clung to life because a frail child lay Upon her heart: weary, and gaunt, and worn, From point to point she sped, with mangled feet, Bearing for aye her little load of love:— Both died,—last martyrs of another's sins, Last children they of Earth's sad family. Still fell the flooding rains. Still the Earth shrank: And Rain held his straight terrific way. Fierce lightnings burnt the sky, and the loud thunder (Beast of the fiery air) howled from his cloud, Exulting, towards the storm eclipsed moon. Below, the Ocean rose boiling and black, And flung its monstrous billows far and wide, Crumbling the mountain joints and summit hills; Then its dark throat it bared and rocky tusks, Where, with enormous waves on their broad backs, The demons of the deep were raging loud; And raked to hideous mirth or bitter scorn

Howled the Sea-angels; and earth-buried broods Of Giants in their chains tossed to and fro, And the sea lion and the whale were swung Like atoms round and round.—

Masked was dead:

And birds whose active wings once cut the air, And beasts that spurred the waters,—all were dead: And every reptile of the woods had died Which crawled or stung, and every curling worm:— The untamed tiger in his den, the mole In his dark home—were choked: the darting ounce, And the blind adder and the stoik fell down Dead, and the stifled mammoth, a vast bulk, Was washed far out amongst the populous foam: And there the serpent, which few hours ago Could crack the paucity in his scaly arms, Lay lifeless, like a weed, beside his prey. And now, all o'er the deep corpses were strewn, White-floating millions, like the rubbish flung Farth when a plague prevails; the rot down-sucked, Sank, buried in the world-destroying seas.

The Flood of Thersaly.

We took her, gently, in his radiant arms, And breathed on her, and bore her through the air, Hushing from time to time her sweet alarms, And whispering still that one so good and fair Should dread no evil thought and know no care: And still they flew, and around a lustre played, Near them, as near a figure plays its shade.

Their course seemed pointed to some southern shore. Over the waters where the trade-winds blew They passed, and where men find the golden ore, And where long since the Hesperian apples grew; While, far beneath, the Old world and the New Stretched out their tiny shapes, and their thick chain Of islands, spangling like bright gems the main.

And then they moved beneath a lovelier sky, O'er green savannahs where cool waters run; O'er hills and valleys: o'er vast plains that lie Flat,—deserts blistered by the Afric sun; Over spice-groves and woods of cinnamon; By Siam and Malay; and many a fair Bright country beaming in the Indian air.

Whether they journey'd then, ah, who may tell!— Beyond all limits that the sailor knows; Beyond the ocean; and beyond the swell Of mountains; and beyond the Antarctic snows: To some sweet haven, 'tis told, where softly glows Perpetual day,—some island of the air: We know its beauty; but we know not where.—

Eternal forests, on whose boughs the Spring Hung undecaying, fenced the place around, And amorous vines (like serpents without sting) Clung to the trees, or trailed on the green ground, And fountains threw on high a silver sound, And glades interminably long, between Whose branches sported the grey deer, were seen.

And from the clustering boughs the nightingale Sang her lament; while on a reedy stream, Which murmured and far off was heard to fall, The swan went sailing by, like a white dream; And somewhere near did the lone cuckoo call, But none made answer; and his amorous theme The thrush loud uttered till it spoke of pain; And many a creature sang, but seemed to sing in vain.

There, rich with fruits, the tree of Paradise (The plantain) spread its large and slender leaves, And there the pictur'd palm was seen to rise, And trembling aspen, and the tree that grieves, (The willow) and sun-flowers like golden sheaves; The lady lily paler than the moon, And roses, laden with the breath of June,

MR. EDITOR.—As your last Iris, No. 61, contains some interesting remarks on the Hand-writing of various English Monarchs, extracted from D'Israeli's Second Series of Literary Curiosities, the following article, on the Hand-writing of some of the most eminent Living Poets, from the same Work, with additional strictures on the subject of Autographs, by the Editor of Blackwood's Magazine, will, I doubt not, prove equally acceptable to the generality of your readers.

POETICAL HAND-WRITINGS.

"I am intimately acquainted with the hand-writings of five of our great poets. The first, Sir W. Scott, in early life acquired among Scottish advocates a hand-writing which cannot be distinguished from that of his ordinary brothers; the second, Lord Byron, educated in public schools, where writing is shamefully neglected, composes his sublime or sportive verses in a school-boy's ragged scrawl, as if he had never finished his tasks with the writing-master; the third, Rogers, writes his highly-wrought poetry in the common hand of a merchant's clerk, from early commercial avocations; the fourth, Campbell, has all that finished neatness, which polishes his verses; while the fifth, Southey, is a specimen of a full mind, not in the habit of correction or alteration; so that he appears to be printing down his thoughts, without a solitary erasure. The hand-writing of the first and third poets, not indicative of their character, we have accounted for; the others are admirable specimens of characteristic autographs." D'Israeli.

Were it necessary, we could easily verify the accuracy of the above statements; in addition to which we present our readers with some brief characteristic strictures on the autograph of our contemporary Authors.

"Wordsworth's hand-writing is clumsy, strong, and unequal—more unequal than any great man's autograph we have ever happened to see.... Coleridge's is a beautiful but very quaint and eccentric one: it is more like 'The Ancient Mariner' than 'Genevieve'—and not in the least like 'The Friend'.... Mr. Crabbe writes like an elegant woman, every dot marked, but the lines flowing and sweetly formed. One, to look at it, would rather suspect him of a soft sentimental novel than of 'Sir Eustace Gray,' or 'Peter Grimes'.... Mr. Jeffrey writes as if he wrote against time with a stick dipped in ink—never was such a hideous unintelligible scrawl: yet there is a power and vivacity about it not unlike the man. It is quick, careless, and inaccurate to the last degree,—the hand-writing of a Reviewer—not of an Author.... Mr. Gifford, again, has the slow distinct formal fingers of a commentator—yet his hand-writing is a striking one, too, in some particulars.... Hogg's autograph seems as he had never been designed but for painful chronicling of small beer. It is stiff, rigid, scraggy—he could no more execute a flourish than a hexameter—but then the author of the Queen's Wake taught himself to write from imitation of printed books at twenty years of age.... Allan Cunningham writes a good running well-fashioned hand—his tasteful eye, conversant with the finest forms of art, has enabled him to sink the stone-mason.... Mr. Wragham's hand-writing has the accurate and beautiful precision of his classical style.... Thackeray Hook writes as if he had penned billets-doux rather than comedies—Odoberty, strange contradiction, boasts one of the most easy, and, at the same time, finished autographs in the world—one would swear he was as incapable of dictating a blackguard ballad as Southey himself.... Tickler has a formal antique fast, that would equally set conjecture at defiance.... Mr. Canning's penmanship has all the chasteness, and at the same time all the nervous weight of his mind. But there is not the least of his ornamental rhetoric in its turns.... Mr. Peel writes a sober, scholarlike hand—a true Christ-church fast.... Cobbett's hand-writing is very like Brougham's, only thicker in the hairstroke, and the pen not quite so well made.... Old Henry McKintie still writes as if he were under five and thirty, we mean as to the ease and firmness of the hand—the shapes are not like the author of Julia de Ronbigne, but the Exchequer attorney.... Mr. Milman possesses a hand-writing of the most elaborate elegance—there is something stately in his very commas, and his capitals have a gorgeousness that looks almost sublime.... Professor Egan's hand-writing was a very fine one when he wrote the first Boxiana; but he has now acquired a slovenly use of the bunch of fives.... Croley writes with a furious, rambling, exursive, but most vigorous paw."—Blackwood's Mag.

REVIEWS.

The Life of Alexander Reid, a Scottish Covenantant.—Written by himself, and Edited by Archibald Prentice, his Great-Grandson, with Notes and an Appendix, forming a brief History of the attempts of Charles II. and James II., to establish Episcopacy in Scotland.

We have recently had the character of the Scotch Puritans presented in so very different points of view, and in such opposite lights, that it is not easy to discover the truth concerning them. By some they are considered as martyrs to the good cause, and their memory is cherished with reverence and veneration. By others their enthusiasm is laughed at, their manners and language are ridiculed, and they are branded as rebels to that lawful authority which sought only to repress their extravagances and bring them back to the Episcopal Church which they had ignorantly left. He who pores over the folio pages of the voluminous Wedrow sees in every sufferer a patriot and a hero, while the reader of the fascinating Sir Walter shrinks with disgust at the very name of the fanatical bigots. Amidst these conflicting opinions, here is one of the very party in question standing forward, and presenting a picture of himself and his compatriots, so plain yet characteristic, that he who runs may read the distinguishing features of the sect. Here is an honest yeoman who fought at Bothwell Bridge (and for aught we know with his own pruning hook converted into a spear) who tells us what he thought and what he did. His descendant, who seems to have some of the old whiggish leaven in himself, manifestly considers the rustic warrior as an eminent example of piety and patriotism. But our business with him is as the representative of the covenanters, and viewing them through this medium it is impossible to deny that they had good cause for resistance. Nor can we with justice join in the ridicule which modern authors have thrown on them.

There is much in this little volume which may seem in this age of tolerated opinion to have been uncalculated for enthusiasm, yet considered in reference to those dreadful times, it appears no more than the feeling natural to men whose religious liberty is in imminent danger. The passage in which Reid gives an account of certain conflicts with the Evil One reminded us of some scenes in "Old Mortality;" without however that excitement of risibility which the ingenious "unknown" creates by his somewhat caricatured representations. We subjoin a short extract as a specimen of the language and feelings of Reid's time.

"Now I have only a word unto you my own children: I am brought low with sickness, my body is very weak and seemingly I will not be long with you; and this is my last advice or whether it be the last or not, yet I give it as my last in writ, exhorting you to seek the Lord in your young days. Be diligent in reading the scriptures when ye are young, and ye will remember them when ye are old; I know the experience of this. Be tender one of another; and beware of outcastings and janglings amongst yourselves for the Psalmist says, 'How sweet a thing it is and how becoming well for such as are brethren to dwell together in unity.'" "I advise you through grace to own our purest reformation and covenants which our fathers owned, and the Lord countenanced eminently, as our fathers have told us. And truly I regret and lament that these covenants seem to be buried, and as I said before little or no word of them, as though our fathers the worthy reformers, had been fools, and our worthy martyrs who suffered at Pentland and Bothwell, yea all who suffered during the bloody persecution had been blockheads and madmen." "I desire all of you that may be alive after my death, if your mother be alive, that ye be kind to her: for she hath been afflicted in all my afflictions since she and I met, and carried courageously in our sharpest trials."

The Pyrenees, and the South of France, during the months of November and December 1822.
By A. THIERS. London, 1823.

This little volume (which has but just reached us) appears to contain information that will prove peculiarly interesting at the present moment.—The parts which we have had time to examine seem to us to be sketched with fidelity, and by an acute observer.—We subjoin a couple of extracts:—

The Spanish nation is one of the best endowed by nature which exists. Its temperament is ardent, and for that reason it requires more than any other that nature should be improved by education. No people rush upon their enemies with greater violence, nor does any fly with more precipitation; none are more proud and haughty, I may even say, more insolent; none so more humble in their submission; all the Spanish fugitives who were in our territory, terrified by their late defeat, saluted the French whom they met on the road with extraordinary humility. Who does not see in all these points, the impulse of an imagination, which, left to itself, is by turns courageous or cowardly, proud or submissive? It is the same with all ardent and violent people, the Italians, Egyptians, Turks, &c.

We need but examine those fine countenances, those lively gestures, those ardent eyes, to see that nature has a predilection for these sensible beings, and that there is in them a powerful spring, disposed to strong re-action. They will unquestionably be most intelligent and most eager in the pursuit of any object; but their intelligence wants to be enlightened, and an equable impulse to be given to their energies. In their present state, however, the Spaniards are of all people, that which, with the greatest need of education, has the least, and which has remained most backward in the career of European civilization.

They have the credit of possessing great perseverance, but I believe that people have been deceived, in imputing to their character the duration of a resistance, which is owing to their situation. The Spaniards expelled the Moors, they repulsed Bonaparte, and it has been inferred from this, that they are the most obstinate of mankind. What they have done once, I certainly think they would do again, and that foreigners would be as ill received now as on former occasions; but I must explain why. The Spaniards were the first in Europe who favoured manufactures; but the discovery of the new world stopped them at once. Possessing gold and silver, they were contented to purchase every thing from other countries, and made nothing themselves. They have become lazy and indolent, and have sunk into profound ignorance. I will here make a remark which has struck me. Industry was communicated from the South to the North, and now the North begins to return it to the South. The same has been the case with liberty, the interchanges of which have been still more frequent. She advanced from the South to the barbarian North; she returned to us from the North in the last century; and now perhaps she will be sent back from the South to the subjugated North.

The Spaniards have, therefore, remained behind hand, have not cultivated their lands, and have established no manufactures; they have despised those whom they paid, for by a strange mistake, it is common enough for him who buys and pays, to fancy himself above him, who sells and receives. Ignorance has combined with these causes to make them despise other people whom they did not visit, and with whose progress they were unacquainted. Their priests have told them, that to think differently from them, was absurd and contemptible; and they have believed them. Even without being fanatical, they have detested all who differed from them in ideas and religious belief; they have become almost as exclusive as the Jews formerly were, and they bear towards foreigners a hatred, mingled with pride and contempt.—p. 121.

This ignorant, violent, lazy, and poor people, must be employed and fed, until they become sensible of the advantages which industry procures; but until they acquire a home and the means of regular subsistence, they will fly with joy to the first signal which is given them from the mountains. We need not therefore be at all surprised at the facility with which the Regency of Urgel has drawn some villages into insurrection. But if insurrection is easy, the case is otherwise as to its success and duration. In fact, when the Regency thought proper to appoint ministers and generals, and to attempt a regular campaign, it was beaten. It will be said that it might have done against Mina what the Cortes of Cadiz did against Bonaparte. To this there is but one reply. These guerillas, who have risen for a moment in the Pyrenees, are good for nothing against their own countrymen, in whom there is nothing to excite their passions; on the contrary, the sight of a stranger, differing from themselves in language, dress, and countenance, animates them even to fury. These differences are unpardonable in their eyes, and they pursue them with extreme inveteracy. Add to this the fine uniforms, handsome arms, gorgets, and brilliant buttons, to pillage from foreigners; and there are more than sufficient reasons to make them fight in every desfilé in Spain. Besides they have an advantage over the enemy, which they have not over countrymen, sobriety, and a perfect acquaintance with the country and its localities.

These guerillas, who are so weak against Mina, will therefore be very formidable to foreigners. Providence seems to have ordained, that when it gave men a country, they should be able to preserve it, and with that view to have given them an irresistible force on their own soil. There is a great deal of meaning in the fable which says, that a giant on touching his mother earth, acquired new and terrible strength.—p. 89.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

SPRING PROMENADE COSTUME.

A round dress of fine cambric or India muslin, trimmed round the border with three Vandyke flounces, set or plain, of muslin richly embroidered, and each point edged with narrow lace of Urling's manufacture. A mantle of pale Ceylon ruby, or of bright rose colour, is worn over this dress, with Capuchin hood and standing-up collar above; the mantle is lined throughout with figured sarcenet or gossamer satin of a lighter shade, or else with white; but that also is figured, and generally the figures on the white ground correspond in colour with that of the mantle, which is edged all round with a fold of satin, of a moderate breadth, cut in bias. The bonnet is of a shape entirely novel; with a mandarin double crown pointed at the top. The bonnet is of the same colour as the mantle; and the divisions of the mandarin crown are edged with a delicate silk fringe, or with white blond. On the left side is placed a very large full-blown rose. A small cornette of fine lace is worn underneath the bonnet, which, according to the fashion of the present day, is placed very backward. Half-boots of corded gris de Naples and lemon-coloured kid gloves complete this elegantly simple and highly distinguished costume.

EVENING FULL DRESS.

A dress of pink or celestial blue satin, trimmed round with a coquillage border of the same material, edged with fine blond; and each shell beaded with a rich ornament of white silk, wrought in a trefoil form; the border enclosed in rouleaux of pink satin. Corsage of satin, with stripes formed of white rouleaux. The sleeves formed of falling ornaments, crosswise, and edged with blond; very short. Falling tucker of lace, of a Vandyke pattern. A superb necklace, forming a rouleau of fine pearls, closely twisted, with pearl earrings. The necklace is certainly more costly than beautiful, for the intrinsic value of the pearls is lost by their being so closely wound over each other. A gold chain, of exquisite workmanship, however, gives a relief to the heavy appearance of the necklace: from the chain depends an eye-glass. The hair is arranged a la Milanaise, with a Grecian bandou tiara of satin, enriched with pearls; though some Ladies ornament this tiara with sapphire or turquoise stones, and twine a few pearls lightly through the hair. The slippers are of white satin, and are made more long-quartered than formerly, so as to discover the beauty of the instep; they are ornamented with tassels of pearls instead of rosettes.

VARIETIES.

TO PRESERVE FRUITS OR FLOWERS THE WHOLE YEAR WITHOUT SPOILING.—Mix 1 lb. of nitre with 2 lbs. of bole ammoniac and 8 lbs. of clean common sand; then, in dry weather, take fruit of any sort, which is not fully ripe, allowing the stalks to remain, and put them one by one into an open glass till it is quite full—cover the glass with oiled cloth closely tied down. Put the glass 3 or 4 inches down in the earth, in a dry cellar, and surround it on all sides to the depth of 3 or 4 inches with the above mixture. The fruit will thus be preserved quite fresh all the year round.

ANECDOTE.—Among the dehancements of the learned, which have amused mankind, the following instance merits a conspicuous rank:—Some years ago there were several large elm-trees in the College garden, behind the Ecclesiastical Court, Doctors' Commons, in which a number of rooks had taken up their abode, forming in appearance a sort of convocation of aërial ecclesiastics. A young gentleman, who lodged in an attic, and was their close neighbour, frequently entertained himself with thinning this covey of black game by means of a cross-bow. On the opposite side lived a curious old civilian, who, observing from his study that the rooks often dropt senseless from their perch, no sign being made to his vision to account for the phenomenon, set his wits to work to consider the cause. It was probably during a profless time of peace; and the Doctor, having plenty of leisure, weighed the matter over and over, till he was at length fully satisfied that he had made a great ornithological discovery. He actually wrote a Treatise, stating circumstantially what he himself had seen, and in conclusion, giving it as the settled conviction of his mind, that rooks were subject to epilepsy!

GAS AND MACHINERY.—It is pleasing to observe the triumphs of English enterprise and art, in the most distant parts of Europe. An English house has just obtained the privilege of lighting with Gas, throughout the whole Russian Empire, for the next ten years; and M. Pflog, a merchant of Petersburg, has ordered from England a machine, by means of which thirty ships-cables may be manufactured in a day.

EXTRAORDINARY PROGRESSION.—There is an instance, hitherto unnoticed in the annals of English industry, where, by the manufacture, an article is raised in price from one half-penny to the amount of thirty-five thousand guineas. This takes place in the art of a watch-spring-maker. A pound of crude iron costs a half-penny, it is converted into steel, that steel is made into watch-springs; every one of which is sold for half a guinea, and weighs only one tenth of a grain; after deducting for waste, there are in a pound weight 7000 grains, it therefore affords steel for 70,000 watch-springs, the value of which, at half a guinea each, is thirty-five thousand guineas.

PREVENTION OF FIRE.—M. Cadet Vaux, considering that fires in dwelling-houses begin, in very numerous instances, in the chimney, and that means cannot always be applied in time to extinguish the fire at its commencement, turned his thoughts to the discovery of some method for effecting this purpose. He reflected that combustion cannot be carried on without the presence of vital air, and consequently if the air in a chimney on fire could be rendered mephitic, the fire must go out. This object he obtained by the simple means of throwing flour of sulphur on the fire in the grate, the mephitic exhalation of which extinguished the fire, as it would suffocate any living creature. A Roman nobleman has not only repeated this experiment with entire success, but, being desirous of ascertaining whether an ignited body suspended in the chimney would be extinguished in the same manner, he caused a faggot to be suspended in a chimney, nearly at the summit, and set on fire; though by its situation it was nearly in contact with the external air, the flames were instantaneously extinguished by throwing a handful of flour of sulphur on the coals below.—Italian Journal.

LONDON MEDICAL SOCIETY.—The Fifteenth Anniversary of the Medical Society of London, was held last month at the London Coffee-house, Dr. Uwins in the chair. Mr. Grainger delivered the annual oration, which was on "Injuries of the head, particularly concussions of the brain." In adverting to the question of materialism, the orator expressed his belief that the organic hypothesis of vital causation is unstable in its foundation, and highly unreasonable in its assumptions. He contended strenuously for the presence of an immaterial principle; and maintained that this is a doctrine which even Physiology teaches and Pathology approves; several circumstances of mental manifestation in conjunction with disordered conditions of the cerebral mass being totally at variance with those views of life which consider the organized body to be the primum mobile and actual essence of intellectual and moral being.

GENTLEMEN'S CONCERT.—The Gentlemen's Second Concert for this year was held on Thursday evening.—

Principal Performers, Mr. SAPIO, Mrs. SALMON, and Mr. KALKBRENNER. The brilliancy and rapidity of the latter gentleman's execution on the Piano Forte, particularly in his second performance, excited the greatest admiration. Mr. SAPIO gave with powerful effect Haydn's "In native worth and honour clad." We should not do justice to our feelings, were we to pass over unnoticed, the very fine style in which the Overture by Romberg, at the commencement of the Second Act, was given by Mr. Cadmore and the other Gentleman of the Orchestra.

THE MANCHESTER IRIS.

TO "WHO WOULD BE A PLAGIARY!"

DEAR SIR,

You are right in your conjecture; we took the liberty of expunging the name "Kaleidoscope" from your gentlemanly note, for the very sufficient reasons which you now mention. Ours "is," indeed, "an undistinguished opponent;" he possesses none of the qualities which we admire; nor can we for a moment condescend to enter the lists with one who manifests such total incompetency. Our estimate of his general knowledge is necessarily low, and his LITERARY talent is evidently very limited; in fact, in this department, we fearlessly pronounce him a shallow pretender. Against the attacks of such, we are proof; scurrility is their only weapon; and, whilst their blunders and declamation invariably rebound to their own certain annoyance and confusion, their contortions and vociferation under the galling lash of truth and justice, are a matter of amusement and instruction to their opponents and to the public.

As to "comparative merits," intelligent readers have long since decided; comparisons are no longer instituted; the Manchester Iris and the Liverpool Kaleidoscope are fairly estimated; and, no doubt, justly patronized according to their intrinsic value. We do not complain; we have no cause; we thank our friends and the public generally; and most cheerfully render to all our prompt attention and best services. Nor can we but mention (and certainly with no small share of pleasure and gratification) that amongst our Liverpool Correspondents, we enumerate writers who never yet considered the Kaleidoscope as possessing sufficient literary merit to entitle it to their patronage, nor even to their sanction: and, we must add, that we have frequently rejected articles which, without the slightest emendation, have subsequently obtained conspicuous places in its pages.

We have been, in one instance, imposed upon by a Plagiary, and our worthy correspondent MURTA detected and exposed the offender, and had our thanks for so doing. The Editor of the Kaleidoscope adopts a different procedure. You, Sir, in the mildest, in the most gentlemanly manner, exposed an incontestible, a gross, a most reprehensible plagiarism in that paper; the Kaleidoscope and its Correspondent should have had our early acknowledgments for a similar kindness conveyed with equal delicacy—but, instead of thanks, we observe a most scandalous and fallacious defence of the theft, and that too by the EDITOR! Alas! Sir, he feels, he smarts; and rather than acknowledge that his research was too circumscribed to detect the imposture; or that his effrontery was so great as to palm off a STOLEN page of contents as an ORIGINAL compilation—as the result of a LATE perusal of the History of the Roman Empire, he fabricates the following delectable morceau of falsehood and impertinence:—

"The 'head and front' of the offence of our correspondent, according to the showing of the snarler in the Iris, amounts then precisely to this; that he has communicated to the Kaleidoscope a list of those singular fatalities in the order he found them recorded in the Roman history: and this, forsooth, is a plagiarism, because some Count Comazzi had made out a similar list a century ago!"

Mark, Sir, how we shall unravel this flimsy sophistry:—"Count Comazzi had made out a SIMILAR list a century ago!" This notable acknowledgment precludes the necessity of our "identifying the theft line by line," as done in your spirited reply; it also sufficiently proves that the little inaccuracy and difference of phraseology in a few points, (just as much of the former as could be tolerated, and of the latter as could be conveniently managed) are most indubitable proofs of design—of the petty artfulness of a designing plagiary! But, the true and incontestible summing up, is,—A century ago Count Comazzi made out the ORIGINAL list, as the contents of his little volume; and "Who would be an Emperor!" otherwise, THE EDITOR OF THE KALEIDOSCOPE, made a TRANSCRIPT in 1823, and palmed it upon his readers as an abstract of his studies, and as the result of his "melancholy train of reflection on the instability of human greatness."—How profound in research!—How magnificent in—"REFLECTION"!!

To such a dabbler we scorn to reply; and having thus fully unbosomed our real feeling, and stated his imposture, we believe you will concur in our opinion,—that a direct address would be a condescension on our part which would again call forth his impudent loquacity;—that he is so much below mediocrity in taste and LITERARY talent as to be unworthy your attention;—and that, having shown that his affected indignation must be the mere writhing and malevolent effort of hopeless envy,—any further notice would be a disparagement to our paper, a portion of the columns of which is now with extreme reluctance given up to this vindictory epistle. As to his Miscellany, by having once quoted it on a subject of the particulars of which we were ourselves ignorant, we incurred much censure; and were obliged to have recourse to an able correspondent of our own, who had attended the Preston Guild, and by whose genuine account we were rescued from pointed and merited animadversion. Dear Sir, yours most truly—Ed.

REVIEWS.

Journal of a Voyage to the Northern Whale-Fishery; including Researches and Discoveries on the Eastern Coast of West Greenland, made in the summer of 1822, in the ship Baffin, of Liverpool. BY WILLIAM SCORESBY, Junior, F. R. S. E., M. W. S. &c. &c. Commander. London, Hurst, Robinson, & Co. 1823.

CAPTAIN SCORESBY is a man not only of much professional experience; but, also, of genius, of considerable philosophical research, and of unsophisticated honesty. His talents, his scientific acquirements, and his perseverance, obtained for him honourable notice; and he rewards his friends with an immortality, in the annals of science and discovery, that at once testifies of their distinction as philosophers, of their liberality as British merchants, and of their beneficence of character as men and Christians.*

The volume before us is equally valuable and interesting. It proves that "the situation of the East Coast of Greenland was so erroneously laid down, that the Charts of this country were a snare rather than a safeguard to the navigators."—And it has a most important and interesting feature in "reference to the ancient Colonies of Norwegians, planted on a coast continuous with that investigated on this voyage."

As far as the colonies planted on the coast of Greenland have a reference to Iceland, it may be proper to premise, that this island was the accidental discovery of a Scandinavian depredator of the name of Naddodd, who was driven upon its coast by a storm, about the year 861,—that it was visited soon afterwards by different adventurers of Sweden and Norway, and first colonized by Ingolf and Lief, two Norwegians, with a company of their adherents, about the year 878. These persons, who were induced to emigrate to Iceland from political oppression, were joined, in the course of a few years, by a number of Norwegian families, who resorted thither from a similar cause; so that they soon constituted a considerable colony.

About the middle, or towards the end of the tenth century, an extensive country to the westward of Iceland, was discovered by one of the colonists, of the name of Gunbiorn. This new coast was visited, in the year 982, by one Eric Rauda, a Norwegian, who had been banished his country for various crimes of which he had been guilty. Eric wintered on the southern part of the coast, near an inlet, which he named Eric's Sound; and, after spending part of three years in exploring it, he returned to Iceland. For the purpose of encouraging persons to become settlers in this country, he denominated it Greenland, and gave a most exaggerated account of its products and appearance. In consequence of his representations, a fleet of twenty-five sail was shortly afterwards equipped, which, laden with people of both sexes, and the requisite stores and cattle for forming a settlement, put off for Greenland; but only fourteen of the fleet arrived safe at their destination. The people in this part of the fleet, however, planted themselves on the new coast, and being soon joined by others, both from Iceland and Norway, they, in a few years, became a respectable colony.

Christianity was introduced into Norway towards the end of the tenth century, by Bernard and Guthwald, it is said, two British Missionaries, and was embraced, and zealously promoted by the King, Olaus Tryggesson. Lief, the son of Eric Rauda, having made a voyage to Norway in the year 999, gave Olaus an account of the new colony in Greenland. On which the king, in his zeal for the extension of the true faith, prevailed upon Lief to be baptized, and to take out with him a Christian missionary, on his return to Greenland. By their means Paganism began to be relinquished, and the milder dispensation of the Gospel was soon introduced, and generally received both in Greenland and Iceland.

At this time the Greenland colonies seem to have been in a very flourishing state. They became a bishoprick in the year 1121, when, according to Torfaeus, Arnold, the first regularly installed Bishop, was delegated to the office by Sigard, king of Norway.

The scanty annals of the Greenland Colonies come to a close about 1406 or 1408, after which period the trade with Iceland and Norway, that had previously been considerable, was discontinued, and, it would appear, no intercourse between Iceland and Greenland was ever after accomplished.

Various are the speculations on this strange suspension of intercourse. Some attribute it to the extermination of the colonists, either by the Skrællings (or wild Greenlanders), or by a remarkable pestilence called the black death, which raged about the middle of the fourteenth century, and spread all over Europe. Others account for it by the sudden setting down of the polar ice, which, inclosing the eastern coast and Cape Farewell, as it generally does at the present day, cut off all communication with the parent countries, deprived the colonists of their usual supplies, and became the means of their extinction.

Which of these causes may have occasioned the loss of the colonies to Iceland and Norway, or the suspension of the intercourse, is a question of comparatively little moment; but the determination of the fact of their total extinction, or their present existence, is an inquiry of a high degree of interest and importance.

If they still exist, What are their present state and situation,—their mental and moral condition? They were a civilized and perhaps intelligent people: To what extent has intercourse and admixture with the native Esquimaux, barbarized their manners, and reduced their mental faculties? They were a Christian people: To what extent has the force of example and incorporation with a heathen nation, been productive of demoralization, and the loss of the benign influences of Christianity?

These are questions, which, to humanity in general, and to Christian philanthropy in particular, are of deep and intense interest. But, while I regret that the researches detailed in the succeeding pages do not afford decisive answers to these inquiries, I have the satisfaction of believing that they have some bearing upon the question of the present existence of the ancient colonies. As such, I am anxious that they may be the means of calling the public attention more strongly to the fate of this interesting people, with the hope that those in office, who have the power of ordering the needful investigations, may be induced to pursue the requisite steps for obtaining information concerning them. And this I would urge, not simply as an object of curiosity, but with a view of restoring them to the privileges and advantages of that Christian intercourse and fellowship, of which they have been so long deprived."

That the suggestion of this enlightened and benevolent navigator will obtain the consideration it so highly deserves, we cannot doubt; and as our resources in enterprising spirit and pure philanthropy are ample—are superior to those of any other nation or people—we sincerely hope to find them in early requisition.

The ship Baffin, of Liverpool, was equipped for her third voyage to the Greenland Whale-Fishery, and completed with a crew of fifty men, in the spring of 1822. On the 27th of March, she sailed; and on the 29th she was exposed to all the violence of a tempest, and threatened with the horrors of destruction.

At five o'clock in the morning of the first of May, our author calculated that he was only 566 miles from the Pole, and believed that "the Baffin was, without question, in the highest latitude of any ship at that moment on the sea;" and that, when he stood on the taffrail as the vessel was turned before the wind, he was then nearer the Pole "than any individual on the face of the earth."

Our endeavours to find whales at a distance from the land, having for nearly three weeks, almost altogether failed; and "being anxious to land upon a coast on which no navigator (a whale-fisher or two perhaps excepted) had ever set foot, I thought this a favourable opportunity for gratifying my curiosity. This curiosity was heightened almost to the utmost pitch, by the historical recollections of the Icelandic colonies that had at a remote period been planted a few degrees to the southward, upon the same line of coast,—and particularly by the hope which I could not avoid indulging, that I might be able to discover some traces of those hardy people, the fate of whom, for near four centuries, has been a problem of such intense and almost universal interest. An additional interest attached to the investigation of this country (if the interest excited by the above considerations were capable of augmentation), was the circumstance of the singular and total failure of the many attempts of the Danes to reach this coast, for the recovery of the ancient colonies,—together with the peculiar enjoyment that necessarily arose out of the conviction, that the shore on which I designed to land was entirely unknown to Europeans, and totally unexplored.

As we stood in, I obtained several series of bearings of headlands, &c. with altitudes of the sun for the longitude, designed for the extension of my survey. Finding the coast bold, we reached within three quarters of a mile of the beach, where we had soundings in 25 fathoms: the weather being then extremely fine, and highly favourable for my purpose, I took a boat at 5½ P.M. and proceeded to the shore. I landed in fifteen minutes on a rocky point, named CAPE LISTER, after a reverend friend, lying in latitude 70° 30', and longitude 21° 30' W. The coast here having changed

* Of the East Coast of Greenland, Captain Scoresby says "it became a matter of convenience to give names to the most remarkable promontories, inlets, and islands; and in this, I considered myself justified, by the example of former navigators; particularly as my survey was the first that had ever been attempted of this coast, and many of my researches appeared to be original discoveries. The names now applied I derived partly from peculiar characters observed in the land; but more generally from the remembrance of respected friends, to whom I was wishing to pay a compliment that might possibly survive the lapse of ages."—It is gratifying to find a regard so warmly cherished and ingeniously evinced by this scientific explorer of the Arctic seas. Amongst others, we recognize the names of several of our respected townsmen; as well as those of many other illustrious individuals who are distinguished for Genius, Literature, Science, Enterprise or Hospitality. The following are a few of them:—MR. SAMUEL GRAY, Dr. HARRIS, MR. JOHN DALTON, and MR. PETER EWART, of our town. Sir W. Scott, Sir E. Home, Sir T. Brisbane, Dr. Brinkley, Captain Franklin, Baron Humboldt, Mr. Roscoe, Mr. Rathbone, the Rev. Dr. Raffles, Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Swanson, Dr. Jameson, Dr. Brewster, Mr. Tobin, Mr. Henry, Dr. Stewart, Sir H. Davy, Scoresby (the father of our author), Captain Parry, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Canning, Werner, &c. &c.

its mountainous character, and become more level towards the south and west, we were enabled to reach the top of the cliff, which was only 300 or 400 feet high, and to travel along its brow to the westward. The rocks we ascended consisted chiefly of hornblende, in sharp, angular, irregular masses, much broken, with some of the same rock, of the slaty kind, containing much mica, and veins of feldspar. The brow of the cliff, instead of soil and verdure, presented either a naked or lichen-clad pavement of loose angular stones. Most of these, consisting principally of white quartz, with intermixed masses of sienite and hornblende-rock, had suffered so little from exposure to the atmosphere for numerous ages, excepting as to fracture, that their angles were as sharp as if they had been newly broken. Bordering the sea, these stones were almost enveloped in a covering of black lichens; but on ascending over a sheet of snow to a superior eminence, the lichens became much less abundant. The almost total want of soil was an effectual preventive to verdure; the vegetation was therefore confined to a few hardy lichens, with an occasional tuft of the Andromeda tetragona, Saxifraga oppositifolia, Papaver nudicaule, and Ranunculus nivalis.

Sending the boat along shore, I reached the hill towards the west for three or four miles, passing over a continued surface of loose stones, or over beds of ice and snow, and then descended near Cape Swainson, towards the beach, consisting here of a strip of flat strand, about a furlong in breadth. Here, the first interesting object was discovered, consisting of a circle of stones, so artificially placed, that there could be no doubt but it was the work of man; and soon afterwards other appearances of manual arrangement were met with. These were the remains of habitations, consisting of two circular walls, or in some places merely of rows of stones, inclosing a clear area of about five yards in diameter, laid out exactly in the manner in which the Esquimaux prepare the ground for their summer huts. Besides these, there were several hollow tumuli, neatly arched in the form of a bee-hive, with an opening either at the top or on one side. These resembled the stores wherein the Esquimaux are known to deposit the produce of their fishing or hunting, when too considerable for present use. They varied in size from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet, interior diameter. The principal part of these remains occurred on the west side of Cape Swainson, where also some other still more striking evidences of recent inhabitation were found. These consisted of two cavities, inclosed by stones, on the edge of a bank, that had been employed as fire-places, and in which were the remains of the fuel that had been used in them, consisting of charred drift wood, with half burnt moss, and a quantity of ashes. The latter, being of so light a nature as to be liable to be carried away by the melting of snow about them, impressed me with the opinion, that they had not been here during the preceding winter, but that the persons who used these simple contrivances for fire-places, must have been on the spot even in the present summer. As there were no permanent residences to be found, this place appeared to have been either resorted to as a summer fishing-station by some of the natives, or touched at, in their excursions along the coast. In addition to these evidences of the present existence of inhabitants, we met with several pieces of bone and wood, which had undergone artificial fabrication; and also the head of an arrow or small dart, rather neatly made of bone, armed with a small piece of iron. It is difficult to say whether this iron was native, or whether it was carried on shore in the timbers of some wreck. The manufacture was a good deal similar to that of the iron implements of the Arctic Highlanders, discovered by Captain Ross; and it is not improbable but it had a similar origin. The state and situation in which it was found, indicated that it had not been long out of use. It was found lying in a little cavity of the rock, where we first landed, in a pool of sea-water; yet it was not greatly corroded by rust. On the contrary, it was so little acted upon, that it did not seem to have lain many months.

No other object of interest was observed, excepting some horns of rein-deer, and the bones of these or other animals; most of the bones were found about the site of the tents and huts, or in the tumuli adjoining. No sea-weed was seen on the beach, nor any shells; but in deep water, near the shore, both these productions were observed.

There was a considerable tide: it seemed to have ebbed while we were on shore, but the period of high-water was not determined.

Country.—The general character of the country, from one extremity to the other, of the extent of my researches, is barren, rugged, and mountainous. The average elevation of the coast is about 3000 feet. Several of the mountains were measured trigonometrically, some of which reached 4000 feet; and Werner mountains were estimated to be at least 6000 feet.

Inhabitants.—We were not so fortunate as to meet with any human beings in a living state,—though the traces of their recent existence were innumerable. These traces consisted of numerous huts, hunting utensils, portions of sledges, bones that had been divided artificially, domestic implements, and depositories of the dead, containing human skeletons, or even bodies, as I was informed, only partially decayed. In some instances these relics were of such a nature, as to indicate a very recent desertion of the inhabitants. Such, in particular, was the intimation afforded by the fire-places containing ashes, which we found at Cape Swainson and on Traill Island. These appeared to be the remains of recent fires, perhaps of the preceding spring or summer; for it is scarcely probable that the light ashes of wood and moss could have long resisted either being washed away by the melting of the snow, or scattered about by the violence of the tempests.

From the evidently recent character of some of the remains found, it was not improbable that there might be existing inhabitants even on some of the parts at which we touched. Doubtless, the sight of such an extraordinary object to them as a ship, would excite their alarm. It is most likely, that, to people who had never seen a vessel of any description, not even of the size of a boat, impelled by sails, an object of this description so perfectly under command, and capable of such velocity, would be mistaken for a living creature. If so, it would not be surprising, if any inhabitants that we might have been near, should have fled on our approach, and concealed themselves until we retired.

Perhaps, however, they had retired from these haunts that we visited, to some neighbouring districts, to which the seals, birds, and other animals, affording them subsistence had retreated. All along this coast, where we touched, the fiveness of the animals was remarkable; and this circumstance alone was sufficient to account for the desertion of the different hamlets that we discovered. The place of resort of the seals and other marine animals, is probably determined by the supply of food which the contiguous seas afford. Now, this supply, on account of the constant action of currents, is continually varying. But as the natives of such a country must be chiefly dependent on these animals for their subsistence, they must pursue them to whatever part they may retreat to, whether it be immediately on the sea coast, or whether it be in the depths of the great inlets, by which the coast is so extensively pierced. Thus, wherever the seals are found along shore, there, we must suppose, the inhabitants would be met with. There is little to be gathered from the state of the hamlets discovered, as respects the time of their desertion. The huts being without roofs was no argument for their antiquity; because the framing being of wood, a material of extraordinary value in a country in which none is produced, would doubtless be removed, and carried away on the desertion of the hamlets by the inhabitants.

On the whole, however, I conceive, that the remains we met with were not entirely Esquimaux. They indicated practices among the inhabitants that were in favour of the supposition of an admixture with some other nation,—doubtless the ancient colonies planted by the Icelanders. Hence, there is some reason to believe, that these colonies were not entirely depopulated,—that they are not yet extinct; though it is more than probable, that such of the colonists as outlived the "black-death," and the privation they must have suffered, when their supplies were cut off, as it is said they were, by the descent of the polar ice, would cease to be a distinct people;—for being then reduced to the necessity of following the occupation of the Esquimaux, and of copying their manners, they would probably become gradually incorporated with the aborigines, until few traces of their original civilization remained.

Products.—There are forty-five plants enumerated in the Botanical Appendix; and in the Zoological we find of MAMMALIA—The Walrus, Morse, Common Seal, Rough Seal, Greenland Mouse, Polar Bear, White Hare, Dog, Greenland Whale, and Razor-back. Of AVES—The Brent Goose, Eider-Duck, Greenland Parrot, Little Auk, Petrel, Dovecote, Loom, Sea Swallow, Kittiwake, Gull, Burgomaster, Bunting, Plover, Ptarmigan, and Red-pole. Of PISCES—The Greenland Shark, Coal Fish, and Skate. A few shell-fish; two kinds of Butterflies, as well as Mosquitoes, Wild Bees, and other insects, were also seen.

Beautiful and Extraordinary Phenomena.—On the 15th of April, "an hour or two before midnight, we had a most splendid aurora borealis. It commenced in the north, and extended itself in an arch across the zenith, towards the south. A sort of crown was then formed in the zenith, which was most brilliantly illuminated, and gave out innumerable coruscations of great beauty, and with astonishing velocity. The light appeared to be equal to that of the full moon; and various colours, particularly blue, green, and pink, were stated by my officers to have been clearly observed. Its extreme distinctness, and the boldness of the coruscations, seemed to bring it to a low elevation; and, when the rays were darted towards the ship, it appeared almost to descend to the very mast head.

Between the parallels of 62° or 63° and 70° , the aurora borealis is of very common occurrence, in the spring and autumn of the year. On the 3d of April, 1820, I observed the most interesting display of this meteor, that nearly forty passages to and from the fishery had afforded. The evening was fine and clear, the wind westerly. The aurora first appeared in the north, and gradually extended in a luminous arch across the zenith, almost to the southern horizon: A dim sheet of light then suddenly appeared, and spread over the whole of the heavens to the eastward of the magnetic meridian, while only a few insulated specks were visible to the westward. The eastern aurora were grey and obscure, and exhibited little motion; but the arch extending across the zenith, showed an uncommon playfulness of figure and variety of form. Sometimes it exhibited a luminous edge towards the west, in some places concentrated into a fervid brilliancy. The rays were a little oblique to the position of the arch; but generally parallel to each other, and commonly ran in the direction of the magnetic north and south. At one time they extended sideways against the wind; at another in the contrary direction. Now they shot forward numerous luminous pencils, then shrunk into obscurity, or dispersed into the appearance of mere vapour. The colours were yellowish-white and greyish-white. All the stars of the fourth magnitude were visible through the meteor, even in its most vivid coruscations. Ursa Major at one time encircled with such a characteristic blazonry of light, that the Bear seemed to spring into figure, and to be shaking his shaggy limbs, as if in contempt of the less distinguished constellations around him. The Pleiades were almost obscured by the light produced by the aurora; though Venus, and all the superior stars, shone with becoming splendour. I have never been sensible that the shooting of the aurora was accompanied by any noise: the turbulence, indeed, of the water at sea, or the noise of the sails during calms, prevents slight sounds from being heard.

A change of wind on the 29th occasioned the most remarkable fall of temperature that Captain Scoresby ever witnessed:—"At 8 A. M., just before the change of wind occurred, the thermometer was at 23° , and the decks were covered with wet snow. The instant the north wind began, freezing commenced (the first we had had during the voyage) and, in less than two hours the thermometer was at 14° , being a fall of 18° . At 8 P. M., the temperature was down to 6° , being a reduction of 26° in 12 hours; and at midnight, it was -2° , being a fall of 34° in 16 hours!"

The morning of the 9th was brilliant, with light winds, and a highly refractive state of the atmosphere. The land, and a number of ships that came within sight, as well as the ice, and indeed all distant objects, were strangely distorted. Inverted images of two ships, occasionally double, were seen in the air, which, I imagine, were at least ten miles beyond the limit of direct vision; for we approached them about this distance without being able to see them. I also noticed several vessels that had their hulls elevated to the apparent magnitude of a castle; the height of the hull, in some instances, being equal to that of the masts: in two or three positions, the courses seemed to be separated twenty or thirty yards from the hull, instead of being nearly in contact. So unequal was the refraction, and so various in its effects, that while in one ship the masts were uniformly expanded, or the hull magnified,—in another ship the courses and topgallant-sails were heightened, and the intermediate sails, the top-sails, contracted to one-fourth their proper size,—and in a third, a very little distance from this, the courses and topgallant-sails were contracted, and the top-sails expanded. In all these examples, the peculiarities were continually varying. No sooner had one appearance been examined and sketched, than it changed, and often exhibited the most uncouth proportions. The distant ice partook also of the same influence, and presented very extraordinary and often beautiful resemblances to magnificent architectural structures.

July 24th, about 11 o'clock at night, the atmosphere, in consequence of the warmth, being in a highly refractive state, a great many curious appearances were presented by the land and icebergs. The most extraordinary effect of this state of the atmosphere, however, was the distinct inverted image of a ship in the clear sky, over the middle of the large bay or inlet before mentioned,—the ship itself being entirely beyond the horizon. Appearances of this kind I have before noticed, but the peculiarities of this were,—the perfection of the image, and the great distance of the vessel that it represented. It was so extremely well defined, that when examined with a telescope by Dollo, I could distinguish every sail, the general "rig of the ship," and its particular character; inasmuch that I confidently pronounced it to be my father's ship, the Fame, which it afterwards proved to be;—though, on comparing notes with my father, I found that our relative position at the time gave our distance from one another very nearly thirty miles, being about seventeen miles beyond the horizon, and some leagues beyond the limit of direct vision.

Religious Duties.—Captain S—, who has the spirit to avow his dependence upon the Creator, and the integrity to observe the divine injunctions, strictly observed the sabbaths, and on Sunday, May 19th very justly remarked,—"Perhaps there is no situation in life in which an habitual reliance upon Providence, and a well-founded dependence on the divine protection and support, is of such sensible value, as it is found to be by those employed in seafaring occupations."—At this the indifferent may smile, and the sceptical may sneer,* but, from such reliance, the true Christian will ever derive a support, confidence, and felicity which are the surest evidence of the divine authority of the obligation, and of the benign results of its observance.

* Upon this point, we have to remind some contemporary reviewers, that the publication before us, is less a scientific than a professional narrative; in fact, it is strictly what its title imports, a "JOURNAL of a Voyage;" and, as such, we must contend, that, an account of the sacred observance of the sabbaths, and of the pains taken to initiate the youth, and to establish the matured in pious habits, is very properly introduced; and that the whole redounds equally to the credit of Captain Scoresby's judgment, intelligence, and humanity.

The Age of Bronze; or, Carmen Seculare et Annus haud mirabilis. London, 1823.

To a civilized people the perversion of genius is a certain calamity. Pestilence or famine may be circumscribed; but the moral ravages of active genius are vast and perpetual. The Iliad still forms the mind to delight in carnage, and to pant after dominion; the strains of Ovid still continue to awaken the quiescent desires, and to stimulate in paths of licentiousness; and the sophistry of Hume continues to involve many in a labyrinth that is equally pernicious to moral distinction and individual felicity.

Of the distinguished poetic geniuses of our day, BYRON is the chief. A subject is all he requires;—and, be it great or diminutive, destructive or beneficial to society;—be it simple or complex, real or imaginary, grotesque or graceful, a sacred melody or a wandering vagabond—from him it obtains parts, proportions, and connexion, which, each and all, proclaim the author to be a man of deep thought, of acute observation, and of extraordinary genius.

Of the fatality which first biassed his lordship we know but little; yet, that it is of an external cast, and not originating purely in the thinking faculty, may be readily inferred from his many metaphysical inconsistencies. His day of "nothingness" is not a sufficient basis for his creed; the active thinking, immaterial "SPRIT," cannot brook to annihilation; and, if neither admitted into the mansions of the blessed, nor consigned to despair and punishment, it needs must exist, even though it should but hover amidst the scenes in which it was once localized.

In the "Age of Bronze," which is justly attributed to his lordship, speaking of Bonaparte, he says:—

"How, if that soaring SPRIT still retain
A conscious twilight of his blazing reign,
How must he smile, on looking down, to see
The little that he was and sought to be!
What though his name a wider empire found
Than his ambition, though with scarce abound;
Though first in glory, deepest in reverse,
He tasted empire's blessings and its curse,
Though kings, rejoicing in their late escape
From chains, would gladly be their tyrant's ape;
How must he smile, and turn to you lone grave,
The proudest sea-mark that o'ertops the wave!"

And again—

"But what are these to him? Can glory's lust Touch the FREED SPRIT, or the fetter'd dust?"

These are certainly redeeming symptoms; and they incline us to think that our author, whose SPRIT is so incessantly occupied in clothing and giving birth to its own sublime or ludicrous conceptions, cannot possibly remain unconscious of intellectual essential energy, indivisibility, and future life.

The following lines are beautiful and just:—

"But where are they—the rivals?—a few feet
Of sullen earth divide each winding sheet!
How peaceful and how powerful is the grave
Which hushes all! a calm unstormy wave
Which oversweeps the world. The theme is old
Of 'dust to dust;'—but half its tale untold.
Time tempers not its terrors—still the worm
Winds its cold folds, the tomb preserves its form—
Varied above, but still alike below;
The urn may shine, the ashes will not glow."

Upon the ambitious many plain and forcible lessons are inculcated by our author; we quote one:—

"Though Cleopatra's mummy cross the sea,
O'er which from empire she lur'd Anthony;
Though Alexander's urn a show be grown
On shores he wept to conquer—though unknown—
How vain, how worse than vain, at length appear,
The madman's wish, the macedonian's tear!
He wept for worlds to conquer, half the earth
Knows not his name—or but his death and birth
And desolation; while his native Greece
Hath all of desolation—save its peace!"

The "Age of Bronze" is throughout a political poem; but many of its passages are sublime and elegant, and should have been embodied in a subject of more intrinsic merit.

Compared with the Liberal, the present poem is creditable to his lordship; and it is a pity that one who so justly animadverts upon tyranny and impropriety in others, cannot effect a reformation in his own breast; at least, so far, as not to indulge in speculations which only deteriorate society, and render, their author reprehensible and odious.

ON TASTE AND GENIUS.

AS a great portion of mankind either have not the time or the inclination to peruse long treatises, but yet have the opportunity and patience to read small essays, which serve to give them an insight into the various kinds of knowledge without fatiguing their attention; I have thought that a few remarks upon "Taste and Genius," though a subject upon which so much has been written by so many able writers, would not perhaps be deemed altogether unacceptable. Having observed thus much in excuse for what would otherwise appear in me most unpardonably presumptuous, I will proceed without further preface to delineate my conceptions of these two interesting powers of the mind.

The operations of mind and body have no actual similitude, but only one which the busy imagination of man has formed, for the sake of giving terms, drawn from the operations of the body, to those powers and faculties of the mind which it thus supposes to be similar, in order to aid us in the comprehending of them. We have, therefore, been accustomed when we have once fancied a similitude, to make the same term signify both the faculty of the mind, and the sensation of the body: which terms, when applied to mental perceptions, are called metaphors. This serves very well for the common intercourse of society, but it renders it very difficult for us when called upon, to give precise ideas to those operations of mind, which we have been always accustomed to view through the medium of figures, which frequently act like masks to the countenance, tending to change its appearance altogether: and as with masks, so it is with figures of speech, that the more correctly they are formed, the more difficult it is to remove the effect of their influence.

It is in a great measure on this account that there are few words made use of in conversation, to which more loose and vague ideas are attached than "Taste." Every one fancying that he clearly understands it till called upon for an explanation, when he is surprised to find the confused idea he has of it. Blair calls "taste" "an internal sense," "or natural and instinctive sensibility to beauty," and accordingly he says, from an internal sense it has derived its name. The origin of this opinion I attribute partly to the term itself; and partly to the quickness with which it is observed the mind distinguishes the beauties and defects of any work which comes under its contemplation. As for the metaphor itself, it ought to be strictly confined to the actual intellectual relish or pleasure which the mind receives from the perception of beauty; and not to have any reference to the causes which produce in the mind that power of perception: and as for the quickness with which the mind distinguishes between beauties and defects, we have no occasion for a distinct faculty to account for that, for the known rapidity with which the mind comes to decisions upon all occasions when it has materials with which to act, is amply sufficient. The remarks which Mr. Locke makes upon a somewhat analogous subject, might be well applied here. In his chapter upon innate principles, we find that great man saying, "It would be sufficient to convince the unprejudiced readers of the falseness of this supposition, if I should only shew how men barely, by the use of their natural faculties, may attain to all the knowledge they have, without the help of any innate impressions, and may arrive at certainty without any such original notions or principles. For I imagine any one will easily grant that it would be impertinent to suppose, the ideas of colours innate in a creature to whom God had given sight and a power to receive them by the eyes from external objects: and no less unreasonable would it be to attribute several truths to the impressions of nature and innate characters, when we may observe in ourselves faculties fit to attain as easy and certain knowledge of them, as if they were originally imprinted on the mind." Instead, then, of calling "taste" an internal sense, I will define it to be "the capability of distinguishing the beauties and defects of specimens of genius in the fine arts." From which definition it will be perceived that one of the great ends of this essay will be to discover the source whence this capability arises.

It ought not to excite our wonder, that men who have attained to that degree of refinement, by which they are enabled to discern with facility and certainty the beauties and defects of any work which comes under their contemplation, should wish to persuade themselves, and if possible the rest of mankind, that this power arises from the possession of an internal sense, in addition to those generally distributed among mortals; for could they successfully propagate this belief, they would at once be raised to a superiority unattainable but by the happy few. But however this opinion may flatter their pride, by making them suppose that they have finer organs and are more wonderfully made than the rest of mankind; and with which they may be so satisfied that they will not be very particular in scrutinizing the ground of their pretensions, yet the rest of mankind will not be equally satisfied, but require more forcible arguments than merely their dicta to convince them, before they will yield to them this superiority; which when scrutinized strictly, will, I think, be found like a flattering vision of the night, to vanish with the light of day.

The most philosophical mode we can take then in this inquiry will be, I think, to cite a few instances wherein we might suppose this faculty of "taste" would be exercised, and to trace the method which the mind takes in coming to that conclusion which would be termed the decision of taste upon those occasions. We will suppose then that a painting of a horse was exhibited before a number of persons, for the purpose of receiving their opinions upon its merits, whence would it arise that these opinions would be so various upon the same subject? The beauty of the picture consisting in the exactness of its resemblance to the animal from which it would be taken, we should find that the correctness of their judgments would be in an exact ratio with the different degrees of knowledge of the structure of the animal body, and of the disposition of light and shade which they possessed. For instance, a person forming his opinion merely from knowledge gained from superficial observation, would perhaps see in the picture nothing but beauties to excite his admiration. But were there among them a scholar possessing some knowledge of anatomy, he would probably observe some defects, which had escaped the eye of the former: while a painter, who, to a knowledge of anatomy should add that of the disposition of light and shade, would perhaps perceive imperfections in the colouring passed unnoticed by the scholar. As, however, those who gain the knowledge of any science simply from reading and study seldom have that readiness of application possessed by those who have gained their knowledge almost altogether from practice, a dealer in horses whose taste might in general be as gross as could be well conceived) would perhaps discover some defect latent to all the rest. And again, would the opinion of the finest connoisseur of the fine arts, who had never travelled beyond the midland counties of England, be so valuable upon a painting of a storm at sea, as that of a man who had felt and seen the effects of a thousand storms? Every one will, I think, see the folly of supposing it; for though the one, from reasoning upon the natural effects of the violence of the winds upon a watery element, might form some vague idea of the appearance which the waters would bear when thus agitated, and consequently his opinion be more valuable than that of one never accustomed to reason at all; yet, he who should have actually seen the tempestuous scene, would have such a clear and determined idea of it, as would enable him immediately to perceive the correctness or incorrectness of the representation.

The instance of the cobbler who (ignorant as men in that station generally are,) was able to criticize correctly, and discover a defect in the painting of Apelles is a well known example in support of my theory.—For it is clear that his capability of criticizing could only arise from his mind being conversant about that part of dress which Apelles had misrepresented.

Blair, from his opinion that "taste" is founded upon an internal sense, has divided its characters into those of delicacy and correctness. Making delicacy of taste to consist "in the perfection of that natural and instinctive sensibility, implying those finer organs or powers which enable its possessors to discover beauties that lie hid from the vulgar eye," and correctness of taste to consist chiefly in the improvement which that faculty receives through its connection with the understanding. From what, however, has gone before, I think it will appear evident, that instead of "taste" being divided into the delicate and correct, it ought only to be distinguished by its different degrees of perfection. For the "taste" which is not delicate; (that is, according to Mr. Blair's definition "capable of discovering beauties which lay hid from the vulgar eye,") is not correct; and on the other hand, that cannot be correct which is not delicate, so that it is a distinction without a difference. For instance, would not the same degree of judgment which enabled the cobbler to detect the fault in the picture of Apelles, (which Mr. Blair would call an evidencing of the possession of a correct taste,) have enabled him to have admired the beauty of the shoe, had it been executed well? Certainly! And thus, according to Mr. Blair's own definition of a delicate taste, we have here an instance, by merely reversing the manner of the cobbler's viewing the picture, of a delicate taste arising from the same source as a correct one: viz. from the cultivation of the reasoning faculties.

We would run through the same line of argument upon taste, as evinced in its judgments upon poetry, sculpture, &c. but the instances here cited from the pictorial art, in which we have traced the source from whence we derive our capacity of judging, to a knowledge of the originals from which the copies are taken, I hope will suffice; and that I am now at liberty to proceed to the latter branch of my definition, viz: to an inquiry into the objects about which the reasoning powers are employed, when that which is termed the faculty of taste is called into action.

"Taste" then I have defined to be "the capability of distinguishing the beauties and defects of specimens of genius in the fine arts." What are generally termed the fine arts, it would be needless here to enumerate, I shall therefore content myself with giving the reasons which induced me to think that the decisions of "taste" are limited by so narrow a circle.

In the first place, then, I have confined it to works of art, as contra-distinguished to the works of nature. Allowing the first part of my definition to be correct, "that 'taste' is the capability of distinguishing beauties and defects," it would necessarily follow that its decisions must be confined to works of art. For nature viewed simply in herself, without regard to the conveniences of life has no defects; in fact, she is the only standard of beauty. But, however, as a taking of this first part of my definition for granted might be termed a petitio principii, and as I believe this to be rather a novel doctrine, I will make a few more observations upon this branch of my subject.

If the judgments of "taste" be not the mere dicta of whim and caprice, there must be some universal standard to which we can appeal in order to prove their correctness. This standard, whereby we form our judgments upon works of art, (at least to the fine arts to which my definition is limited, the reasons of which follow hereafter) is nature. Whether the painter is portraying rural scenery, or the human face divine; or whether the poet is describing the workings of those passions which convulse and agitate mankind, or the more tender emotions of the soul; still nature is the standard whereby we must judge of the beauty and success of their attempts. But, when the works of nature herself come under review, how are we to defend the correctness of our admirings? How are we to prove that our "taste" is more pure than another's? Where is the standard of appeal? There is none—should one man prefer a plain to a mountain, a smooth champaign country, to one romantic and abrupt, how are we to determine which is the preference of taste? We cannot—for when we loose sight of an universal standard, every one is at liberty to create one for himself—and who is the vain man who will say that the standard which he has created is preferable to another's? I have therefore confined the operations of taste, to the fine arts, for here we have nature, as an universal standard whereby we may with certainty decide upon their merits.

Secondly, I have confined the operations of taste to the fine arts as contra-distinguished to those generally termed mechanical. As we form judgments or propositions simply by comparing two ideas, and observing their agreement or disagreement; and the conclusions of reason by comparing the two ideas which compose them with intermediate ideas, by their disagreeing or agreeing with which we know that they agree or disagree between themselves; so we are enabled to admire a wonderful piece of mechanism, by a knowledge of mechanical principles deduced in a regular series of reasonings, by means of intermediate ideas; but we gain a knowledge of the beauties evinced in specimens of the fine arts, by a simple comparison of two images, (viz.) the copy portrayed by the artist, and the transcript of the original in our own minds: there is as much difference, therefore, between the sources of our admiration of a wonderful piece of mechanism and a beautiful painting, or poem; as there is between the mode of forming propositions, and syllogistical conclusions.

Universal consent, I believe, has confined the exercise of taste within the circle of the fine arts, as contra-distinguished to those which are termed mechanical, so that in thus limiting it in my definition, I have only followed the generally received opinion. I, however, have attempted to assign the reason which may have induced to this limitation; which, I think, must have been the difference which, as I have stated above, there exists in the mode that the mind takes in coming to a judgment in the two instances. In doing so, however, perhaps I have been endeavouring to assign a reason for that which reason was not engaged in the establishing. I here conclude my remarks upon that power of the mind which is termed taste, and which I hope I have proved to be the capability of distinguishing the beauties and defects of specimens of genius in the fine arts, arising from mental cultivation.

APRIL.

Of all the months that fill the year
Give April's month to me,
For earth and sky are then so filled
With sweet variety!

The apple-blossoms' shower of pearl,
The pear-tree's rosier hue,
As beautiful as Woman's blush,
As evanescent too.

The purple light, that like a sigh
Comes from the violet bed,
As there the perfumes of the East
Had all their odours shed.

The wild-briar rose, a fragrant cup
To hold the morning's tear;
The bird's-eye, like a sapphire star,
The primrose, pale like fear.

The balls that hang like drifted snow
Upon the guilderose,
The woodbine's fairy trumpets, where
The elf his war-note blows.

On every bough there is a bud,
In every bud a flower;
But scarcely bud or flower will last
Beyond the present hour.

Now comes a shower-cloud o'er the sky,
Then all again sunshine;
Then clouds again, but brightened with
The rainbow's coloured line.

Aye, this, this is the month for me!
I could not love a scene
Where the blue sky was always blue,
The green earth always green.

It is like love; oh love should be
An ever-changing thing,—
The love that I could worship must
Be ever on the wing.

The chain my mistress flings round me
Must be both brief and bright;
Or formed of opals, which will change
With every changing light.

To-morrow she must turn to sighs
The smiles she wore to-day;
This moment's look of tenderness
The next one must be gay.

Sweet April! thou the emblem art
Of what my love must be;
One varying like the varying bloom
Is just the love for me.

DISASTROUS FRIDAY; OR, THE UNLUCKY CITIZEN.

(TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.)

'Take heed,' said I, yesterday evening at the Regency Coffee House, to a little pale man, who was nodding his head over the flame of a wax candle, 'you are burning your wig.'—'I am much obliged to you,' answered he, as he extinguished the fire with his hands, 'this accident does not in the least surprise me; it is predestined that I am not to escape any of the miseries attendant upon an unlucky Friday.' 'What, sir,' said I, 'are you sure that Friday is really an unlucky day?' At this moment, he made up a piteous grimace, an awkward waiter, at the instant, having given him, while turning, a blow in the mouth with his elbow; he jumped up, let fall his hat and his cane, picked them up, and beckoned me to follow him. As soon as we had reached an obscure corner of the parlour, 'Sir,' said he, sighing deeply, 'I am neither superstitious, poor, nor wicked; indeed, I am gifted with more than ordinary experience, having always lived in the school of misfortune; yet there does not pass a Friday, not a single Friday, in which I do not experience a thousand outrages, and lose a great deal of money, without ever accomplishing any intended project; for instance, to-day, I have not had one moment's repose!'—As I perceived that this believer in weekly fatality, was seeking to console himself by a relation of his misfortunes, I easily persuaded him to give me an outline of this Friday's mishaps. He blew his nose, gave me some snuff, part of which flew into his eyes, then rubbed them with his hands, and began in these terms:—'In the first place, you must know that serious occupations and imperious duties confine me to the house all the days in the week, except Friday, when I am quite at liberty. This morning, disturbed by horrid dreams, I awoke at sunrise, and as I wished to take a long walk, immediately commenced the operations of the toilette: I'll say nothing of the troubles I experienced in shaving; the weather seemed unsettled, but, intending to breakfast with a particular friend, I made myself rather smart, and then looked for my umbrella, which was no where to be found; I was, therefore, obliged to be content with my cane, and thus equipped, set out for the little village of Passy, where my friend resided.—I had scarcely walked a quarter of an hour, when I heard loud cries of 'Out of the way, out of the way;' I quickly drew back, near a fruiterer's shop, where I was constrained to squeeze against a basket of eggs to avoid the wheels of an elegant tilbury, which nearly grazed my legs; I, however, escaped with a few egg stains, which the fruit woman endeavoured to wipe off with one hand while she received indemnity for her loss with the other. Extricated from this first disaster, I walked briskly on; a beggar approached with a supplicating air, I threw him a piece of money, and was quietly pursuing my way, when I felt myself collared by this same fellow, who tore my coat, loaded me with abuse, and collected around me a crowd of idlers, whom he endeavoured to persuade that I had been trying to pass off counterfeit money; they became outrageous, and some of them threatening to take me before the authorities, I had no other resource than to submit my purse to them as a test of my innocence. Once freed from this tormenting affair, I sent for a hackney coach, into which I threw myself, happy to escape from public gaze. I made but little progress in my journey, for the coachman was drunk, and the horses half starved; feeling myself quite faint, for want of my breakfast, I looked at my watch, and found it was noon-day, upon which I lost all patience, and putting my head out of the coach window, I called lustily to the man to set me down, but neither by screaming, nor clapping of hands could I make him attend to me, till I was quite exhausted. You will acknowledge that hitherto my lot had not been very enviable, but reserve your pity for my after troubles. On alighting from the coach, I contrived to crawl to my friend's house, where I at length arrived, wet to the skin, and found the house shut up, and my friend in Paris.—A miserable public-house was now my only resource, and though the food they set before me was scarcely fit to eat, yet, after resting a-while, I felt sufficiently refreshed to resolve upon returning to Paris. I just then perceived near me two men, who had made themselves useful to me in my morning misadventure, and stepped forward to renew my thanks. They immediately proposed accompanying me to Paris, to which I agreed, hoping we might have a pleasant journey; but you shall hear how it turned out.—As soon as we reached the steep narrow street that leads to the barrier, the elder of my fellow travellers seized me by the arm with such violence as to make me grind my teeth, and then exclaimed with great enthusiasm: "Yes, sir, from the top of this ravine, I would wager to exterminate an army, or at least, to oppose its progress, if I had but the disposal of ten pieces of cannon, well mounted, and two hundred resolute men."—I have no doubt of it," said I, in a mournful tone, and he immediately entered upon a dissertation, to which I endeavoured to put an end, by complaining of cold, and expressing a wish to quicken our pace; he thereupon walked so quickly as to put me out of breath. The young man who was with us contented himself with admiring the banks of the Seine, and muttering some words, which he accompanied with various gestures. "What is your opinion?" said I, endeavouring to rouse him from his reverie; "this gentleman pretends that a man of ordinary strength, who has surprised an enemy's camp by favour of the darkness of the night, may easily kill from thirty to forty men." "I can give no positive opinion on the subject," answered he; "I make verses, and kill nobody," upon which he offered me the perusal of a comedy in five acts, and of ten or twelve moral epistles.—I declined this light amusement, but found it impossible to escape from the plan of an historical romance, which he detailed to me in a low voice, whilst his companion, on the other side, pestered me with a recital of the battle of Wagram, the massacre of the hospitals, and the burning of the convents in Spain. With my mind thus put to the rack, to attend to this double conversation, I arrived at the Place Louis XV. where we all halted. The tactician complained of my having insulted him, by replying to all his military narrations, "Very charming, extremely delicate, nothing can be more sprightly;" and he demanded my address, promising that I should hear from him to-morrow.—The young author, in his turn, overwhelmed me with abuse and threatened speedily to publish a pamphlet, in which I should not be spared. On getting rid of these two madmen, I proceeded to the Tuileries, the sentinel on duty called out to me, to tie up my dog, as I made no answer, he gave me a push with his bayonet, and I had the greatest trouble in the world to make him understand that the dog which was following me was not mine.—At length I reached Very's, comforting myself with the hope of soon getting a good meal; but I know not how the attendants contrived it, for, at six o'clock, I was still at my place, bawling out, "Waiter, bring me some soup." I got a light dinner, for which I paid a heavy price, as in my anxiety to make room for a fat gentleman, who wanted to pass me, I threw down some china jars, which were immediately added to my bill. My next care was to procure a ticket for the Théâtre Français, but on reaching the house I found it so crowded that I could only get a seat in one of the slips, where I endeavoured to be content, but it was impossible; in front of me sat a spectator, with a head so bespattered as to smother me with dust at every move, and behind me was a man who sneezed and coughed so incessantly, that I was compelled to flee hither, where you found me the victim of ill-luck, even in my sleep.'

Here finished his recital, and I tried to offer this new Orestes some consolation.—We left the coffee house together, I wished him good-evening, he stumbled and we parted.—Lit. Chron.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE REPUBLIC OF ANDORRE,
*Situated amidst the Pyrenees, between France and Spain.

Almost all the public journals have recently stated that the constitutional army and that of the insurgents in Spain have, by turns, and both in their successes and after their defeats, respected a neutral valley, situated in the midst of the Pyrenees. The existence, almost unobserved until the present moment, of an independent republic between France and Spain, is a singular, although a well authenticated fact. Important events having attracted attention to this country, we extract, for the amusement of our readers, a passage from the statistical account of the department of the Ariège, by M. Mercadier, formerly the commanding engineer of that department, which contains the most complete account extant of the republic of Andorre. We have added several particulars collected by one of our colleagues, who has been making an excursion in that part of the French Pyrenees which surrounds the territory of Andorre.

Andorre, the common language of which is Catalan, is a neutral territory, situated on the southern side of that chain of the Pyrenees which forms the boundary of France. Most geographers have nevertheless comprehended it in the territory of Foix, with which, indeed, it was formerly not entirely unconnected.

This country, the extent of which is not a ninth part of the department of the Ariège, forms a little republic, comprehending the six communities of Carillo, Encamp, Ordino, Massane, Andorre-la-Vieille, and Saint Julien; and a great number of villages or hamlets, all under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Bishop of Urgel. The village of Andorre-la-Vieille, from which the valley derives its name, is the chief place, and probably the most ancient. It is there that the general council, composed of twenty-four members for life, six from each community, assembles. When a vacancy occurs, either from death, or from any other cause, the council nominates a successor from among those inhabitants of the community who have been public functionaries. The general council has two syndics, appointed by itself, to convoke the meetings of the council, and manage the public business.

Before the French revolution, the criminal tribunal was composed of two judges, called Viguiera, one appointed by the King of France, the other by the Bishop of Urgel; to whom were joined six inhabitants of the valley, nominated by the general council. This tribunal was called the Cortes. Each viguier appointed a baillif, from a list of six inhabitants presented to him by the general council. Before these baillifs all civil suits were in the first instance tried. An appeal lay from them to a judge, who held his situation for life, and who was appointed alternately by the King of France and the Bishop of Urgel. The same suits might ultimately be carried before a third tribunal. That tribunal was either the grand council of the King of France, or the council of the Bishop of Urgel, according as either the king or the bishop had appointed the judge by whom they had been determined in the second instance.

This country had some singular laws, especially as regarded the succession to property. The eldest son took almost every thing, leaving very little indeed for the younger branches of a family.

The police was under the direction of two consuls in each community, who were appointed by the general council, and changed every other year.

The country of Andorre is extremely mountainous, and most of the mountains are covered with forests of pines; it is, besides, not very fertile, and is bristled with rocks. It is watered by several rivers, which rise in it: the principal among them is the Embalire, which receives all the others and then enters Spain, where it falls into the Sègre. At Ransol, in the community of Canillo, is an iron-mine, and there are four forges, at Encamp, at Caldes, at Ordino, and at the hamlet of Serrat, in the last-named community. The hamlet of Caldes is remarkable for its numerous warm springs.

The inhabitants of Andorre have not much arable land, but possess a great many cattle and extensive pasturage. They are in general shepherds. They used to pay four hundred and eighty francs a-year to the Bishop of Urgel, and twice that sum to the territory of Foix. They had a right to import every year from the latter country eighteen hundred loads of rye, and a certain quantity of cattle of every description; as also to import and export, without duty, all goods not prohibited, as well as the produce of the mines.

Every year, on the Sunday before Midsummer-day, they sent a deputation of three members of the general council to the village of Siguer in France, where they took, in the presence of the municipality, the oath of allegiance to the King of France. They also promised not to undertake any thing injurious to the interests of the community of Siguer, to give it intelligence in the event of war, and to furnish with lodging (upon being paid for it) such inhabitants of the village of Siguer as might find it necessary to make a journey into the valley of Andorre. Three of those inhabitants, selected by the mayor, took an oath, to the deputies, of similar import. They then played a game at nine-pins together, and the losers forfeited a tub of wine, which was drunk in the public square. It was remarked that the Andorrans never won the game. On the evening of their arrival a sapper was given them, and they had two meals the next day. The same ceremonies were performed in the village of Miglos. But, what will appear very singular, the inhabitants of the Spanish villages of Alins Arren and Tor, sent, about the same periods, deputies to the village of Fielesos, where they took a similar oath, and were received much in the same manner; with this difference, that the Spaniards did not play at nine-pins, that they had but one supper, at an inn, for thirteen persons, for which they themselves paid; that the deputies and the municipal officers afterwards danced round the village, that they returned to the inn and had a collation, although after supper; that they then renewed dancing for a short time, and that ultimately every one retired. These and similar customs, on which we will not dwell, strongly recall the simplicity of old times.

The Andorrans paid no taxes. They rented the mountains on which they fed their cattle; and the produce of their farms was sufficient to pay all their expenses. Their justice, their police, and their finances, were, for the preservation of good order, placed under the inspection of the intendant of Perpignan.

At the present day they govern themselves as formerly; but in consequence of the revolution, they have become independent of France; and, since the year 1790, the administration of the department have refused to receive their contribution of nine hundred and sixty francs, which they regard as a feudal custom, and will not allow them to come in quest of grain. France gives them neither viguier nor civil judge; their public business is no longer superintended by any of her magistrates; their private differences are no longer carried by appeal to any of her tribunals; and they no longer send deputies to Miglos or to Siguer.—Lit. Gas.

Life and Retirement of Henry Welby Piquet, who lived 44 years in Grub Street, London, without being seen by any person.

Benevolence and humanity are the characteristics of a great and generous mind; and while they incite us to promote the felicity of others, they convey no small portion of happiness to ourselves. The truth of this remark was verified by the subject of this sketch: and though his peculiarities were great, he nevertheless displayed a sensibility of heart, which, even in this enlightened age, is scarcely to be met with. To record the incidents of his life, it will be necessary to commence with his birth, which took place in the year 1539, at a small village in Lincolnshire, where he enjoyed an estate of £1000 per annum. Having received a liberal education, all the accomplishments of the gentleman and scholar were combined in him: and further to augment the store of knowledge, which he had acquired at the university and inns of court, he took a tour through several of the most polite parts of Europe.

Hitherto he was a stranger to difficulties or disappointments. His suavity of manners, conversational powers and well known benevolence obtained him universal esteem: yet, a circumstance occurred, in the fortieth year of his age, that gave a complete turn to his mind, and induced him to retire from the world. This arose from an attack which was made upon him, on his road home, by a highwayman (said or supposed to be his brother,) who attempted his life with a pistol, which, not going off, he had strength and address sufficient to wrest from the man's hands, and found a double charge in it. This villanous attack operated so powerfully on his mind, that he formed the resolution of taking a house in Grub-Street, London, and of shutting himself up from his associates and relations, even his children. He reserved three rooms for his own use; the first for his diet, the second for his lodging, and the third for his study. Within these apartments he kept himself so closely retired, that for forty-four years he was never seen by any person, except Deborah, his old maid servant, who had only been permitted by accident, to see him in some cases of great necessity. The prying eye of curiosity never violated his singular way of life. Secluded from all intercourse with the world, he lived in the most abstemious manner, in quiet meditation. Milk, vegetables, and water-gruel, with an egg, or two at most, were his constant fare; yet his table was supplied with every thing in season, though he seldom partook of it himself. He was very curious about the state of the world: and as there were neither newspapers nor magazines then, he bought as many new books as he could get intelligence of, most of which, after perusal, he ordered the servant to sell, and give the produce to the poor. For many years together not a single enquiry was made after him, but by a certain person, supposed to have been a relative, a few years before his death, and these inquiries were seldom more frequent than twice a year.

His time was regularly spent in reading, meditation, and prayer. No Carthusian Monk was ever more constant and rigid to his rule.

His plain garb, long white beard, and venerable aspect after death, bespoke him an ancient inhabitant of the desert, rather than a gentleman of independent fortune, in a populous city. His income, which was at that period, considered large, he expended in acts of benevolence and charity, much of it being bestowed with such singularity as deserves to be recorded. Though the servant never saw him, but upon very urgent occasions, yet, through her means he distributed his gifts to the poor of his neighbourhood, in a very exact way. Any case of extraordinary necessity was immediately relieved, if a petition were laid before him at his meal-times.

When he wanted any thing he used to ring a bell in the middle room, and then retire to the inner apartment, from whence he issued his mandates in a tone of voice sufficiently loud to be heard by his domestic, who, on no account durst enter his room until he had retired from it. When his orders were long, he disposed them on slips of paper, with directions which to execute first.

He strictly observed the festivals of the church.

Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and Michaelmas, were times of extraordinary benevolence with him. On these occasions he constantly caused a large quantity of provisions to be dressed, and sent up into messes, which he ordered his old woman to send or deliver to the applicants, who were not suffered to enter his house. On some occasions, when he did not like his charity to be so conspicuous, he wrapped money in paper, and ordered it to be secretly delivered. After having thus spent an irreproachable, though singular life of benevolence and good-will to all men, he closed his account with this world, on the 29th day of October, 1686, in the 84th year of his age, and was buried in St. Giles's, Cripple gate. His old servant died a few days before him. Mr. Welby left an amiable daughter, who married Sir Christopher Hillyard, a gentleman of fortune in Yorkshire; but, as was said before, neither she nor any of his relatives, ever saw the old gentleman after his retirement.

EPITAPH

BY TAYLOR, THE WATER POET.

Old Henry Welby, well be thou for ever,
Thy purgatory past, thy heavens end never,
Of eighty-four years life, full forty-four Men saw thee not, nor e'er shall see thee more!
'Twas piety and patience caus'd thee
So long a prisoner, to thyself, to be:
Thy bounteous house, within, express'd thy mind,
Thy charity, without the poor did find. R. T.

ODE TO EVENING.

Hail! gentle Evening, welcome guest,
And with thy loveliest healing balm,
Sooth my disturbed soul to rest,
And wrap it in the pleasing vest
Of contemplation calm:
Sad cares, that all the day have prest
Like heavy burthen on my soul:
And rag'd like fires in my breast,
No longer now perturbing roll,
But peaceful lie 'neath thy control.

No din of labour more I hear,
Nor dissonant, harsh-grating sound,
Of engines, clanging on the ear;
Such sounds have no abiding here,
For all is calm and still around.
Nought dares disturb Eve's quiet reign,
Pretending o'er the silent vale,—
Welcome kind Goddess! thee I hail
And thy soft soothing sweets inhale!

Now twinkling stars creep into view,
Or burst upon the gazing eye;
And Cynthia's orb in glory too,
Shining aloft in Heaven's blue,
Adorns the glittering sky.
Now the soul spreads her wings for flight,
And roams as free, as light as air,
Soaring to blissful realms of light,
Exhilarated by no earthly snare,
But far from grief, from toil, and care.

On her strong phoebus high she soars,
Where worlds innumerable roll,
And there her Maker she adores,
And fervent adoration pours,
To him who formed the whole.
Hail then bright enchanting Eve!
Hail with all thy starry train!
Come! oh come! my soul relieve,
Free from grief, from toll, from pain:
Come, and assert thy healing reign!

NATURAL HISTORY.

INSTINCT OF THE WHALE.

Most other animals, when attacked, instinctively pursue a conduct which is generally the best calculated to secure their escape; but not so the whale. Were it to remain on the surface after being harpooned,—to press steadily forward in one direction,—and to exert the wonderful strength that it possesses; or were it to await the attacks of its enemies, and repel them by well-timed flourishes of its tremendous tail, it would often victoriously dispute the field with man, whose strength and bulk scarcely exceeds a nine-hundredth part of its own. But, like the rest of the lower animals, it was designed by Him who "created great whales, and every living creature that moveth," to be subject to man; and, therefore, when attacked by him, it perishes by its simplicity. Instead of repelling his attacks, it generally dives at once to an immense depth, where, under a pressure often exceeding 200,000 tons† upon its body, it becomes so exhausted, that, on its return to the surface of the sea, it becomes an easy prey.

The conduct of the whale, in this respect, intimates, that the instinctive faculty generally possessed by the lower animals, and employed for the purpose of self-preservation, directs it to descend to the depths of the ocean for escaping its natural enemies in the same element; and it farther intimates, that, whatever these enemies may consist of, whether sword-fish, thrasher, or sharks, since it avoids them by this means, it must be able to descend lower, and to sustain a greater degree of pressure from the superincumbent water, than any of the animals that are in the habit of attacking it.—Scoreeby.

Unhappy Catastrophe.—The two boats that had been so long absent, had, on the outset, separated from their companions; and allured by the chase of a whale, and the fineness of the weather, they proceeded until they were far out of sight of the ship. The whale they pursued led them into a vast shoal of the species; they were, indeed, so numerous, that their "blowing" was incessant; and they believed they could not have seen less than a hundred. Fearful of alarming them without striking any, they remained for some time motionless, watching for a favourable opportunity to commence an attack. One of them at length arose so near the boat of which William Carr was harpooner, that he ventured to pull towards it, though it was meeting him, and afforded but an indifferent chance of success. He, however, fatally for himself, succeeded in harpooning it. The boat and fish passed each other with great rapidity after the stroke, the line was jerked out of its place, and, instead of "running" over the stem, was thrown over the gunwale; its pressure in this unfavourable position so careened the boat, that the side sank below the water, and it began to fill. In this emergency the harpooner, who was a fine active fellow, seized the bight of the line, and attempted to relieve the boat, by restoring it to its place; but by some singular circumstance, which could not be accounted for, a turn of the line flew over his arm, in an instant dragged him overboard, and plunged him under water, to rise no more! So sudden was the accident, that only one man, who had his eye upon him at the time, was aware of what had happened; so that when the boat righted, which it immediately did, though half full of water, they all at once, on looking round at an exclamation from the man who had seen him launched overboard, enquired what had got Carr! It is scarcely possible to imagine a death more awfully sudden and unexpected. The velocity of the whale on its first descent, is usually (as I have proved by experiment) about 8 or 9 miles per hour, or 13 to 15 feet per second. Now, as this unfortunate man was occupied in adjusting the line at the very water's edge, when it must have been perfectly tight, in consequence of the obstruction to its running out of the boat, the interval between the fastening of the line about him and his disappearance, could not have exceeded the third-part of a second of time; for in one second only, he must have been dragged to the depth of 10 or 12 feet! The accident was, indeed, so instantaneous, that he had not time for the least exclamation; and the person who witnessed his extraordinary removal, observed, that it was so exceedingly quick, that although his eye was upon him at the instant, he could scarcely distinguish the object as it disappeared.—Scoreeby.

THE CABINET.

THE DEATH OF GUIOMAR.

Guiomar. Ha! Ghastly Phantasm!—Turn thy pallid leer Away: it sickens me. Methinks I stand
Full in the leopard's eye!—What arrowy light
He shoots out—Ha! Begone, thou blasting dream!
Touch me not—come not—Ah! my limbs are loosed.

(The arrow strikes him as the figure fades.)
Oh!—'Tis a whistling bolt,—colder than frost:
But rankling,—rankling. Oh!—Who laughs above?—
I hear thee, spiteful Spirit: and I come.
Down to the lower graves, o'er-scared by crime,
I go, to make thee mirth,—leaving for aye
This strange and melancholy wilderness.
From the rich Spain I came, (a bright blue air)
To look upon these heaths and dusky shores,
With no companion:—but a wizard's step
Must stop not, till it treads the lowest depths.
Oh! how I dreamed that I might spread my name
(Once—once!) amongst a wide posterity;
And build up a renown, like lasting brass;
And be hereafter told of, as a man
Who sold his birth-right (pleasure) for great fame
And now I die,—with'er'd: yet will I die
Bravely,—for so I lived.

Infernal Halls!
Ye everlasting halls of Grief and Shame!
Where are your crowds, your shapes, your wild array
Of demons, and Tartarian chivalry?
Where are your gods,—crown'd Sin, and the gaunt Death,
To herald me!—I claim all sovereign pomp.
For to your cloud-black kingdoms never came
A mightier than to-day.—Ha! look!—I see
A flame of horsemen rush against the wind;
And bony crowds pass by with clattering feet;
Hydras and giants, and wide-gaping snakes;
And hissing dogs, and vultures that droop blood;
And the wild women with their crawling hair,—
Avant!—and look! the enormous Briars
Come, and foul Typhons drag his scaly train
Here,—here!—Away!—Dash down your burning rain,
Stille me,—slay me,—quick!—(He falls.)

*Prince of the morning, to thy radiant arms Take me, for now I die. To thee—(who wast Banished from all the Heavens to tread dark Hell)
Star of a stormy world! alone I yield.
If there be pity left 'midst thy despair,
Pity me. I have erred—and dared—like thee.
Ambition was my god:—and it was thine.
Pity me—fall—fallen. *(Dies.)

B. CORNWALL.

UNSUCCESSFUL ADVENTURE.—A large bear was observed prowling about for prey. One of the ship's company, emboldened by an artificial courage, derived from the free use of his rum, which, in his economy, he had stored for special occasions, undertook to pursue and attack the bear that was within view. Armed only with a whale-lance, he resolutely, and against all persuasion, set out on his adventurous exploit. A fatiguing journey of about half a league, over a surface of yielding snow, and ragged hummocks, brought him within a few yards of the enemy, which, to his surprise, undauntedly faced him, and seemed to invite him to the combat. His courage being by this time greatly subdued, partly by the evaporation of the stimulus he had employed, and partly by the undimmed, and even threatening aspect of the bear, he levelled his lance in an attitude suited either for offensive or defensive action, and stopped. The bear also stood still. In vain the adventurer tried to rally courage to make the attack; his enemy was too formidable, and his appearance too imposing. In vain also he shouted,—advanced his lance,—and made feints of attack; the enemy either not understanding them, or despising such unmanliness, obstinately stood his ground. Already the limbs of the sailor began to shake,—the lance trembled in the rest,—and his gaze, which had hitherto been steadfast, began to quiver; but the fear of ridicule from his messmates still had its influence, and he yet scarcely dared to retreat. Bruin, however, possessing less reflection, or being more regardless to consequences, began, with the most audacious boldness, to advance. His nigh approach, and unshaken step, subdued the spark of bravery, and that dread of ridicule, that had hitherto upheld our adventurer; he turned and fled. But now was the time of danger. The sailor's flight encouraged the bear in his turn to pursue; and being better practised in snow-travelling, and better provided for it, he rapidly gained on the fugitive. The whale-lance, his only defence, encompassing him in his retreat, he threw it down, and kept on. This fortunately excited the bear's attention;—he stopped,—pawed it,—hit it, and then resumed the chase. Again he was at the heels of the panting seaman, who, conscious of the favorable effect of the lance, dropped a mitten: the stratagem succeeded, and, while bruin again stopped to examine it, the fugitive, improving the interval, made considerable progress a-head. Still the bear resumed the pursuit, with the most provoking perseverance, excepting when arrested by another mitten, and finally by a hat, which he tore to shreds between his teeth and his paws, and would no doubt have soon made the incautious adventurer his victim, who was rapidly losing strength and heart, but for the prompt and well-timed assistance of his shipmates, who, observing that the affair had assumed a dangerous aspect, sallied out to his rescue. The little phalanx opened him a passage, and then closed to receive the bold assailant. Though now beyond the reach of his adversary, the dismayed fugitive continued onward, impelled by his fears, and never relaxed his exertions until he fairly reached the shelter of the ship! Bruin once more prudently came to a stand, and for a moment seemed to survey his enemies with all the consideration of an experienced general; when, finding them too numerous for a reasonable hope of success, he very wisely wheeled about, and succeeded in making a safe and honorable retreat.—Scoreeby.

CROSSES.

Stone crosses owed their origin to marking the Druid stones with crosses, in order to change the worship without breaking the prejudice. Many of the crosses presumed to be Runic rather belong to the civilized Britons. Crosses were also erected by many of the Christian kings before a battle or great enterprise, with prayers and supplications for the assistance of Almighty God. Whistaker thinks, that crosses with scroll-work are always antecedent to the conquest.

Preaching Crosses.—That of the Black-friars, or Friars Preachers, in Hereford, is of an hexagonal shape, open on each side, and raised on steps. In the centre is a kind of table of the same shape, supporting the shaft, which, branching out into ramifications, forms the roof, and passing through it appears above in a mutilated state. The top of the pulpit is embattled, and round the cross were, no doubt, pectices for the congregation, as there were at St. Paul's cross, in London.

Market Crosses.—As crosses were in every place designed to check a worldly spirit, these were intended to inculcate upright intentions and fairness of dealing. In almost every town, which had a religious foundation, there was one of these crosses, to which the peasants resorted to vend provisions.

Weeping Crosses.—Because penances were finished before them.

Street Crosses.—Here sermons were preached, royal proclamations made, laws published, and malefactors sometimes hanged. The corpse, in conveyance to Church, was set down there, that all the people attending might pray for the soul of the deceased. Mendicants stationed themselves there to beg alms for Christ's sake. "Wherever," says an ancient MS. "a cross standeth, there is a forgiveness payable."

Crosses of Memorial.—Where the bier of an eminent person stopped, in attestation of a miracle performed there. In commemoration of battles, murder, and fatal events, sepulchral mementoes.

Crosses for Landmarks.—Mentioned anno 528, and common afterwards. Kings and lords used them as tokens of dominion; and they were especial landmarks of the Templars and Hospitalers. The form of a cross was used, that no man for conscience sake should remove them.

Crosses of Small Stones.—where a person had been killed.

Crosses on the High-Way.—frequently placed to call the thoughts of the passenger to a sense of religion, and restrain the predatory incursions of robbers. Usually erected also in the way leading to parochial

MATHEMATICS.

Solution of No. 60, by Miss Agnes.

The daily journeys of A will be an increasing geometrical series;—the daily journeys of B a decreasing geometrical series.

As A will have travelled $3 + 4 + 5\frac{1}{2} = 12\frac{1}{2}$ miles before B sets out, let us suppose the fourth hour's journey of A, viz. $7\frac{1}{2} = a$, to be the first term and $\frac{1}{2} = m$ the ratio of the series of A's daily journeys. Also $10 = b$, the first term, and $\frac{1}{3} = m$, the ratio, of B's daily journeys. Let $x =$ the hours A travelled after B set out: then also will $x =$ the hours B travelled.

Now, $\frac{ax - a}{n - 1} =$ the distance A travelled after B set out, and $\frac{bx - b}{m - 1} =$ the distance B travelled.

Hence per question $\frac{ax - a}{n - 1} + \frac{bx - b}{m - 1} = 100 - 12\frac{1}{2}$
 $= 87\frac{1}{2} = s.$ Or, $\frac{ax - a}{n - 1} = s + \frac{bx - b}{m - 1}$

In numbers $(\frac{1}{2})x - \frac{100}{24} (\frac{1}{3})x = 87\frac{1}{2}$.

This equation reduced by logarithms gives $x = 4.2645$. Hence A will have travelled when he meets B $12\frac{1}{2} + 51.4 = 63.733$ miles, and B 36.267 miles.

VARIETIES.

NATURE AND ART.—On the subject of natural and acquired Genius, Mr. D'Israeli relates the following anecdote:—Cecco maintained that Nature was more potent than Art, while Dante asserted the contrary. To prove his principle, the great Italian bard referred to his cat, which, by repeated practice, he had taught to hold a candle in its paw while he supped or read. Cecco desired to witness the experiment, and came not unprepared for his purpose. When Dante's cat was performing its part, Cecco, lifting up the lid of a pot which he had filled with mice, the creature of art instantly showed the weakness of a talent merely acquired, and dropping the candle, flew on the mice with all its instinctive propensity. Dante was himself disconcerted; and it was adjudged, that the advocate for the occult principle of native faculties had gained his cause!

NEW PRINTING MACHINE.—Dr. Church is now at Birmingham preparing his new printing machine. The compositor has only to sit down at this curious piece of mechanism as he would at a piano-forte, and as he strikes the keys the types all fall from the case into their proper places with a velocity that keeps pace with the most rapid speaker. The form having been worked off, the type moves into the melting-pot, from which it is returned recast into its original state without any diminution of material, and thence distributed into the case quite new. One of these machines placed at the bar of the House of Commons, would always insure a correct report of the debate. Dr. Church, the inventor, is a native of Boston, New England.

THE STEAM-BOAT.—We went to Richmond by the Steam-boat, and I have scarcely yet recovered from the effect of the journey. You know I hated this self-willed machine when first I saw it hurrying and clattering along between the wharfs and coal-barges, and through the muddy water, at Blackfriars-bridge; but now I have not common patience with it. It is, to be sure, a most atrocious invention, and fit for nothing but to transport convicts to Botany-bay or condemned souls across the Styx. To see a huge, noisy monsterity like this, breathing fire and smoke, come insolently trundling itself up the clear stream, beneath the willows and alders, and between the classical banks of Pope's Twickenham, and treating all one's feelings, fancies, and associations, past, present, and to come, with contempt, is intolerable, and ought to be forbidden by act of Parliament. It jolts worse than a French diligence over the pavé, and roars like a corn-mill; and instead of being able to look at the scenery along the banks of the river, which I so much wished for an opportunity of seeing, all I could do was to sit perversely counting the abominable strokes of the steam-engine, as they jarred and vibrated on every nerve about me. But really the bodily inconvenience attending a voyage in this new "infernal machine" is nothing compared with its insolent violation of all one's most cherished notions of keeping and consistency. Think of a drunken Dutch boor in the midst of one Claude's reposos; or imagine a great rough cloven-footed Satyr in Titian's Bath of Diana; or conceive a herd of porpoises tumbling about in one of the Italian lakes, and you may gain some idea of the effect of seeing a London steam-boat intruding itself upon the Thames at Twickenham.—Letters on England, by Count de Soligny.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Mr. Rogers, the Astronomical Lecturer, affirms, that, the whole of the Northern Islands will be embathed in the seas, in from four to five thousand years:—I should be glad to learn from Mr. R., through the medium of the Iris, upon what facts he founds this theory, which, to me, appears equally novel, unscriptural, and presumptuous.

Mr. R., also mentions a "golden age," and favours us with a good round number of years, after which, continual summer will again visit the earth. This gentleman would oblige me much, by exhibiting an outline of the theory of the vegetation of the earth, when its inhabitants shall be blessed with one unvarying season. Mr. R. has shown no cause of a change in the position of the earth's axis, consequently there is no reason to believe, that the seasons were ever different from what we now find them; neither has he made a prospective change in the least probable, either from observation or rational conjecture. MR. ROGERS' Lectures, in the large room of the EXCHANGE-BUILDING, prove particularly interesting. His ASTRONOMICAL theory contains the improvements of Newton upon the hypothesis of Pythagoras as revived and illustrated by Copernicus, Galileo, &c. We must here beg to suggest to Mr. R. that the phases of the moon are not distinctly shown, neither is his representation of the solar system on a sufficiently large scale to enable those unacquainted with the science to form any idea of the comparative distance and velocity of the planetary bodies in their revolution round the sun. His MICROSCOPICAL exhibitions are really beautiful; and his offer of the use of his lenses to medical gentlemen for the examination of morbid parts we consider to be gentlemanly and liberal.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The long promised English Flora of Sir J. E. Smith, President of the Linnean Society, is now printing. The English botanist will thus be furnished with an original and authentic guide to the study of our native plants, in his own language, free from all unnecessary technical terms; and, according to the plan which the author has long been studying to attain, of a classical English style, rejecting that barbarous (neither English nor Latin) phraseology, which so many writers have, without principle, or consideration perhaps, adopted. The essential characters and descriptions will all be re-considered, and corrected after nature.

An epigrammatic and satirical work, entitled 'The Cambridge Tart,' is in the press. It is intended as a companion to 'The Oxford Sausage.'

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

With our correspondents we are this week considerably in arrear owing to our copious extracts from the professional and exploratory voyage of that amiable, intelligent, and able navigator—Captain Scoresby.—And, although we have been so liberal of our columns for the information and entertainment of our readers; we should be doing them an evident injustice were we, for a moment, to give them to understand that our imperfect analysis might any thing like supersede a perusal of the entire volume;—our sketch should be viewed merely as an invitation to the wholesome and agreeable intellectual repast, which the intrinsically valuable and highly interesting work under consideration most amply furnishes.

F. W.—We shall be happy to comply with the wishes of Rusticus, should F. W.'s expectation be realized.

We cannot surrender our own judgment to that of our "Hen's Claw" correspondent.

In consequence of the unexpected demand which has been made for last week's Iris, the impression is nearly disposed of; but Burns' beautiful Ballad of "When wild War's deadly blast was blown," the music to which is composed by the author of "O Mary turn those eyes away,"—may now be had at the Office with any preceding number.

Narrative of a Journey to the Shores of the Polar Sea, in the years 1819, 20, 21, and 22.
By JOHN FRANKLIN, Capt. R. N. F.R.S.
London, 1823.

This volume has indisputable claims upon our attention. It is neither a tissue of the imagination, nor a superstructure of the closet; but the unvarnished, yet elegant narrative of arduous, persevering enterprise. It is also a work of taste and judgment; and the beauty of the letter-press and engravings, would justly dispute comparative excellency with the contents of many very popular, but infinitely less interesting books. Whilst we add a few short extracts, we cannot but invite our readers to an attentive perusal of the entire Journey.

THE BEAVER.

The beaver (castor) furnishes the staple fur of the country. Many surprising stories have been told of the sagacity with which this animal suits the form of its habitation, retreats, and dam, to local circumstances; and I compared the accounts of its manners, given by Cuvier, in his Règne Animal, with the reports of the Indians, and found them to agree exactly. They have been often seen in the act of constructing their houses in the moon-light nights, and the observers agree, that the stones, wood, or other materials, are carried in their teeth, and generally leaning against the shoulder. When they have placed it to their mind, they turn round and give it a smart blow with their flat tail. In the act of diving they give a similar stroke to the surface of the water. They keep their provision of wood under water in front of the house. Their favourite food is the bark of the aspen, birch, and willow; they also eat the alder, but seldom touch any of the pine tribe unless from necessity; they are fond of the large roots of the sugar luteum, and grow fat upon it, but it gives their flesh a strong rancid taste. In the season of love their call resembles a groan, that of the male being the hoarsest, but the voice of the young is exactly like the cry of a child. They are very playful, as they following anecdote will show:—One day a gentleman, long resident in this country, espied five young beavers sporting in the water, leaping from the trunk of a tree, pushing one another off, and playing a thousand interesting tricks. He approached softly, under cover of the bushes, and prepared to fire on the unsuspecting creatures, but a nearer approach discovered to him such a similitude betwixt their gestures and the infantile caresses of his own children, that he threw aside his gun. This gentleman's feelings are to be envied, but few traders in fur would have acted so feelingly.

PATERNAL AFFECTION AND AUTHENTICATED PHENOMENON.

A young Chipewyan lad, separated from the rest of his band for the purpose of trenching beaver, when his wife who was his sole companion, and in her first pregnancy, was seized with the pains of labour. She died on the third day after she had given birth to the boy. The husband was inconsolable, and vowed in his anguish never to take another woman to wife, but his grief was soon in some degree absorbed in anxiety for the fate of his infant son. To preserve its life he descended to the office of nurse, so degrading in the eyes of a Chipewyan, as partaking of the duties of a woman. He swaddled it in soft moss, fed it with broth made from the flesh of the deer, and to still its cries he applied it to his breast, praying earnestly to the great Master of Life, to assist his endeavours. The force of the powerful passion by which he was actuated produced the same effect in his case, as it has done in some others which are recorded; a flow of milk actually took place from his breast. He succeeded in rearing his child, taught him to be a hunter, and when he attained the age of manhood, chose him a wife from the tribe. The old man kept his vow in never taking a second wife himself, but he delighted in tending his son's children, and when his daughter-in-law used to interfere, saying, that it was not the occupation of a man, he was wont to reply, that he had promised to the great Master of Life, if his child was spared, never to be proud, like the other Indians. He used to mention, too, as a certain proof of the approbation of Providence, that although he was always obliged to carry his child on his back while hunting, yet that it never roused a mouse by its cries, being always particularly still at those times. Our informant* added that he had often seen this Indian in his old age, and that his left breast, even then, retained the unusual size, it had acquired in his occupation of nurse.

INDIAN TRADITION.

The earth had been formed, but continued enveloped in total darkness, when a bear and squirrel met on the shores of a lake; a dispute arose as to their respective powers, which they agreed to settle by running in opposite directions round the lake, and which ever arrived first, was to evince his superiority by some signal act of power. The squirrel beat, ran up a tree, and loudly demanded light, which instantly beaming forth, discovered a bird dispelling the gloom with its wings; the bird was afterwards recognised to be a crow. The squirrel next broke a piece of bark from the tree, endowed it with the power of floating, and said, Behold the material which shall afford the future inhabitants of the earth the means of traversing the waters.

PROBABILITY OF A NORTH-WEST PASSAGE, AND SAFETY OF CAPTAIN PARRY'S EXPEDITION.

Our researchers, as far as they have gone, seem to favour the opinion of those who contend for the practicability of a North-West Passage. The general line of coast probably runs east and west, nearly in the latitude assigned to Mackenzie's River, the Sound into which Kotzebue entered, and Repulse Bay; and very little doubt can, in my opinion, be entertained of the existence of a continued sea, in or about that line of direction. I entertain, indeed, sanguine hopes that the skill and exertions of my friend Captain Parry will soon render this question no longer problematical. His task is doubtless an arduous one, and, if ultimately successful, may occupy two and perhaps three seasons; but confiding as I do, from personal knowledge, in his perseverance and talent for surmounting difficulties, the strength of his ships, and the abundance of provisions with which they are stored, I have very little apprehension of his safety. As I understood his object was to keep the coast of America close on board, he will find in the spring of the year, before the breaking up of the ice can permit him to pursue his voyage, herds of deer flocking in abundance to all parts of the coast, which may be procured without difficulty; and, even later in the season, additions to his stock of provision may be obtained on many parts of the coast, should circumstances give him leisure to send out hunting parties. With the trawl or seine nets also, he may everywhere get abundance of fish even without retarding his progress. Under these circumstances I do not conceive that he runs any hazard of wanting provisions, should his voyage be prolonged even beyond the latest period of time which is calculated upon. Drift timber may be gathered at many places in considerable quantities, and there is a fair prospect of his opening a communication with the Esquimaux, who come down to the coast to kill seals in the spring, previous to the ice breaking up; and from whom, if he succeeds in conciliating their good-will, he may obtain provision, and much useful assistance.

If he makes for Copper-Mine River, as he probably will do, he will not find it in the longitude as laid down on the charts; but he will probably find what would be more interesting to him, a post, which we erected on the 26th August at the mouth of Hood's River, which is nearly, as will appear hereafter, in that longitude, with a flag upon it, and a letter at the foot of it, which may convey to him some useful information.

SNOW HOUSES OF THE ESQUIMAUX.

The winter habitations of the Esquimaux, who visit Churchill, are built of snow, and judging from one constructed by Augustus to-day, they are very comfortable dwellings. Having selected a spot on the river, where the snow was about two feet deep, and sufficiently compact, he commenced by tracing out a circle twelve feet in diameter. The snow in the interior of the circle was next divided with a broad knife, having a long handle, into slabs three feet long, six inches thick, and two feet deep, being the thickness of the layer of snow. These slabs were tenacious enough to admit of being moved about without breaking, or even losing the sharpness of their angles, and they had a slight degree of curvature, corresponding with that of the circle from which they were cut. They were piled upon each other exactly like courses of hewn stone around the circle which was traced out, and care was taken to smooth the beds of the different courses with the knife, and to cut them so as to give the wall a slight inclination inwards, by which contrivance the building acquired the properties of a dome. The dome was closed somewhat suddenly and flatly by cutting the upper slabs in a wedge form, instead of the more rectangular shape of those below. The roof was about eight feet high, and the last aperture was shut up by a small conical piece.

The whole was built from within, and each slab was cut so, that it retained its position without requiring support, until another was placed beside it, the lightness of the slabs greatly facilitating the operation. When the building was covered in, a little loose snow was thrown over it, to close up every chink, and a low door was cut through the walls with the knife. A bed-place was next formed, and neatly faced up with slabs of snow, which was then covered with a thin layer of pine branches, to prevent them from melting by the heat of the body. At each end of the bed a pillar of snow was erected to place a lamp upon, and lastly, a porch was built before the door, and a piece of clear ice was placed in an aperture cut in the wall for a window.

The purity of the material of which the house was framed, the elegance of its construction, and the translucency of its walls, which transmitted a very pleasant light, gave it an appearance far superior to a marble building, and one might survey it with feelings somewhat akin to those produced by the contemplation of a Grecian temple, reared by Phidias; both are triumphs of art, inimitable in their kinds.

With these few incidental extracts we conclude our notice of a work, from the consecutive narrative of which, no particulars could be taken that would prove sufficiently concise for our columns, and satisfactory to our readers.—A journey of nearly six thousand miles amidst the snows, lakes, rivers, and barren and inhospitable regions of the north; and which requires eight hundred quarto pages for its Journal, cannot be fairly condensed within our limits.

Should future expeditions of this description be thought necessary, we sincerely hope that they will be better provided for. The sufferings of our countrymen, and of their Indian guides, hunters, &c., were intense and appalling; and we are convinced that much of their disappointment and consequent wretchedness, might have been prevented by more judicious arrangement.

THE CLUB.

No. XXXII.—FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1823.

He try'd
To touch the kindling canvass into life;
With sature his creasing pencil vy'd,
With sature joyous at the mimic strife:
THOMSON.

THE Antiquary has been so long accustomed to praise the profession of the artist, and to borrow illustrations from it, that we urged him the other night to give us some account of the subject. He complied with our wishes the more willingly as several of the members have on certain occasions, been rather jocular at his expense, when alluding to his favourite art.

The art of drawing, gentlemen, observed our friend, has many claims to attention. It is not only a delightful and elegant accomplishment, but it is, at the same time, susceptible of many highly useful applications.

The human mind is always delighted to observe the progress which is made in any undertaking; but in no case is this pleasure more strongly excited than in the solitary labours of the artist. To perceive at first merely a few unintelligible lines; to see those lines when joined by others, gradually assuming a form of intelligence; and by further additions, wrought into a beautiful and attractive picture, is a process of creation and improvement, which must, it is presumed, excite in every well disposed mind a considerable degree of pleasurable interest. The very increase which we discover in our skill during our study, is, perhaps, more conspicuous, and therefore, more calculated to gratify the mind, in this pursuit than in any other.

The consciousness of power which we feel in being able to take the representation of an object which may have excited our interest, and secure from the feebleness of memory, or the alterations of association, all of it which was subject to the eye; and to be capable, moreover, of exhibiting that object to others, in the point of view in which it most affected ourselves, are circumstances which must impart to us an emotion which few other studies are able to inspire.

But it is rather on account of its practical utility that this art deserves to be recommended. The advantages which it supplies to the Mechanic, the Architect, and the Surgeon, are well known; and in the study of natural history and botany it is of the highest importance.

It not only supplies the want of verbal communication, but in many instances surpasses it. The truth of this remark is confirmed by a mere allusion to the value of plates in books of voyages and travels. The traveller who wishes to convey to us an accurate representation of beautiful or sublime scenery, can do it but imperfectly in words; but when he has recourse to his pencil he is able to impart to us at once as complete and correct a view of the whole scene as can be had from an inspection of the original. How much more captivating is the work of Belzoni rendered by his fine delineations. What a powerful effect might the pencil of a skillful artist have produced in a sketch of the Dutch vessel described on a former evening, agitated as it was in apparent mockery by the waves which had wrecked it, and shunned by animated beings, except, perhaps, when a sea-fowl, tired of its flight, may rest for a few moments upon it.

The mind is enlightened and refined by a frequent examination of the works of eminent artists. To distinguish their peculiar merits is certainly not an occupation of mere amusement. The taste is improved, and habits of acute observation are acquired by examining the characteristics of admired productions; as the delicacy and sweetness exhibited in the Venus de Medici; the powerful expression of feeling in Laocoon; and the dignity and elegance in the Apollo Belvidere.

Of the Fine Arts which have contributed much to promote civilization, I know of none which has a right to rank before the profession of the artist. The painters of the greatest eminence in every country will be found, I believe, to have flourished when those countries were rising in refinement and reputation. The art is by no means ungrateful; it rewards the national taste by which it is encouraged, in several respects, besides securing to the country a reputation far more durable and honourable than that of Military glory.

A few remarks of an opposite tendency were made by several other members, some of whom were rather jocular upon the Antiquary for having assumed a style so much more florid than that which is generally held in the meetings of the Club.

In most of the observations in favour of painting, said the President, I am glad to concur. I consider the study to be a source not only of pleasure but of power. It certainly has, in many respects, a happy effect upon the mind. It tends, in the case of young people in particular, to cultivate a nice perception of the beauties of nature, and to form habits of activity. An inspection of the elaborate pieces of the first masters shews us, in a very striking manner, how much it is in the power of human effort to achieve by steady, persevering, well-directed application. Drawing is more especially worthy of the attention of the female sex; and it is, I am happy to say, an art in which several of the Ladies of Manchester have already acquired great credit on public occasions.

On its advantage in preserving to us the likeness of our friends, and of those persons who have attained distinction for their learning, their talents, or their virtues, some observations were made in a former paper.

The Widower remarked that it is only by the pencil of the artist that we can convey to future generations, a clear idea of those truly contemptible beings, who, having been intended by nature for men, spared no exertion to assume the character and qualities of the other sex. J. T.

THE OLD MAN.

"Old man, old man, thy locks are grey,
And the winter winds blow cold;
Why wander abroad on thy weary way,
And leave thy home's warm fold?"
"The winter winds blow cold, 'tis true,
And I am old to roam;
But I may wander the wide world through,
Ere I shall find my home."
"And where do thy children linger so long?
Have they left thee, thus old and forlorn,
To wander wild heather and hills among,
While they quaff from the lusty horn?"
"My children have long since sunk to rest,
To that rest which I would were my own;
I have seen the green turf placed over each breast,
And read each loved name on the stone."

"Then haste to the friends of thy youth, old man,
Who loved thee in days of yore;
They will warm thy old blood with the foaming can
And sorrow shall chill it no more."
"To the friends of my youth in far distant parts,
Over moor, over mount, I have sped;
But the kind I found in their graves, and the hearts
Of the living were cold as the dead."

The old man's cheek as he spoke grew pale;
On the grass green sod he sank,
While the evening sun o'er the western vale
Set midst clouds and vapours dank.
On the morrow that sun on the eastern skies
Rose ruddy and warm and bright;
But never again did that old man rise
From the sod which he press'd that night

ACCOUNT OF HALLOWE'EN.

(From "Popular Superstitions, &c. of the Highlanders," just published.)

"Ye powers of darkness and of hell,
Propitious to the magic spell,
Who rule in silence o'er the night,
Be present now."
FRANCIS.

Of the whole series of annual festivals, Halloween forms the most important occasion in the Highlands of Scotland. The fascinating round of varied enjoyments the night presents to the young and juvenile—the delightful peeps into futurity it affords to the enchanted lover—and the fond recollections it revives in old age—all conspire to render its approach more interesting, and its celebration more joyful, than any other occasion within the compass of the year. Nor is the happy influence diffused by Halloween confined to the human class of the inhabitants of the Highlands alone: most of the supernatural inhabitants are in some degree partakers in the general happiness. With the fairy community, in particular, it is an occasion of peculiar grandeur, as the great anniversary on which they are reviewed by Auld Nick, their nominal chief potentate, in person; whilst many others of the classes treated of in the foregoing pages regard it as a night of no ordinary pomp and joviality.

On this occasion of universal hilarity, the natural coldness and jealousy which generally subsist between the human species and their supernatural neighbours, are changed into perfect harmony and benevolence. Like two belligerent armies, whose hostility towards each other is more the offspring of public duty than private resentment, and who, therefore, during the intervals of war, exhibit in their mutual intercourse the marks of personal good will—so, in like manner, those two classes forget for the night all animosity, in their more laudable zeal to contribute to each other's gratification. Nay, stern Satan himself relaxes for this night his avarice; and, alive to no other object than the promotion of universal enjoyments, dispatches showers of his emissaries to the several kiln-pots, peat-stacks, and barn-yards in the Highlands, to afford to those adventurers who desire it, a peep into the secrets of futurity.

Such a display of seeming benevolence, did it proceed from any other individual than Satan, could not fail to meet with some share of applause. But heads of families, whose opinions are entitled to some respect, have been known to affirm, that Satan's affected generosity on this occasion is nothing but a mere stratagem, for inveigling the more effectually the young and unwary into his vile snares; and that he gets more game by those specious artifices than he could realize by any other means. Hence it is that the anxious parent this night, instead of extolling Satan's generosity, is so intent on magnifying his perfidy; and in order the better to dissuade his offspring and family from the dangerous practices of the night, details, without qualification, his numerous treacheries on similar occasions.

But these ebullitions of the parent's jealousy of Satan's practices are soon subdued. The big-bellied bottle and bumper glass will have a great effect in relaxing his heart of its illiberal suspicions. Speedily animated by the conciliating qualities of the "barley tree," and softened by the recollection of his own youthful frolics and manly deeds on similar occasions, he no longer regards as a crime those practices which he recently condemned; and the good-natured matron, being happy at her husband's felicity, and averse to chide, they both tacitly connive at the family's indulgence in the customary arts of divination.

Generally the first spell they try is pulling the stock of kail. Joining hand in hand they go forth to the kail-yard, previously blind-folded, lads, lasses, and children, equally anxious to have their fortunes told as their seniors. Pulling the first stock they meet with, they immediately return to the light to have an examination of its qualities; its being large or little, straight or crooked, is prophetic of the size and shape of the puller's conjugal companion. If any earth adheres to the root, it indicates tocher or fortune; and the taste of the custoc or stem, whether sour or sweet, shows the nature of his disposition.

They go next to the barn-yard, and pull each a stalk of oats, and, according to the number of grains upon the stalk, the puller will have a corresponding number of children. It may be observed, that it is essential to a female's good fame, that her stalk should have the top grain attached to it.

An individual goes to the barn, opens both its doors, then takes the instrument used in winnowing corn, called a wecht, and goes through all the gestures of letting down corn against the wind. This is repeated three several times, and the third time an apparition will pass through the barn, in at the one door and out at the other, having a retinue emblematical of his or her station in life.

A person goes privately to Tor-na-ha, or the kiln-pot, throws into it a clew of blue thread, which the person winds into a new clew. Towards the latter end something will hold the thread, on which the person demands, "who holds?" an answer will be returned by the agent below, by naming the Christian name and surname of the person's future spouse.

A person steals out unperceived to the peat-stack—sows a handful of hemp-seed, calling out something to the following effect:—

"Hemp-seed I saw thee,
Hemp-seed I saw thee,
And he who is my true love
Come after me and put thee,"

And, on looking over his shoulder, he sees the apparition of the person invoked, in the attitude of pulling the hemp, which had immediately grown at the magic command. Or, if hemp-seed is not at hand, let the person take the floor-besom, which he will ride in the manner of a witch three times round the peat-stack, and the last time the apparition will appear to him.

They go, one or more, to what is called a dead and living ford, or, in other words, a ford which has been crossed by a funeral, and observing profound silence, dip the sleeve of their shirt in it. On returning home, they go to bed in sight of a fire, and, lying awake in bed, they will observe an apparition, being an exact similitude of the grand object in question, turn the shirt-sleeves, as if to dry the other side.

An individual goes to a public road, which branches in three several directions, (i. e. the junction of three roads,) bearing with him the cutty or three-legged stool, on which the person seats himself just on the eve of twelve o'clock; and, as the hour strikes, he hears proclaimed the names of several persons who shall die in the parish before the next anniversary. Note—If the person carries along with him articles of wearing-apparel, and throws an article away on the proclamation of each person's name, it will rescue the person from his impending fate.

These and some other out-of-door spells having been tried, the parties return to the dwelling-house to burn the nuts. Burning the nuts is a very popular charm. They name a lad and a lass to each particular nut, as they lay them in the fire, and, accordingly, as they burn quietly, or start from beside one another, so the issue of the courtship will be.

A person takes a candle and goes unattended to a looking glass—eats an apple before it, combing his or her hair all the while, occasionally holding over the shoulder a table-fork with a piece of the apple upon it, and ultimately the adventurer's conjugal partner will be seen in the glass, in the attitude of taking the proffered piece of apple.

These and some other spells of less note, such as dipping for the apple, groping for the clean dish, which are generally known, and, therefore, need not be particularly described, joined to each individual's relation of the sights which he saw on the present and former occasions, together with the reflections they draw from "narrative old age," bring the well buttered sowans, or more favourite bannocks upon the table. The sonic kebbok is roasted at the fire, and fangs cut down from end to end. Branded bannocks, and every other luxury that can be procured, load the hospitable board. The welcome guests surround it; the silver head is bared with solemn reverence, and the temperate feast, qualified with a few rounds of the Boghile dhu, is as much relished as if it consisted of the most delicious luxuries that crown a monarch's board. But the hours are too happy to remain long;—they flee like a shadow, and call the guests to their respective homes. Each swain and damsel now repose themselves on their pillows, full of those tender emotions which the night's amusements excited, and in their mid-night slumbers see those objects, whose image they so ardently wished to see in all their comeliness and beauty.

EXTRACT FROM A MS. POEM.

"Indeed those eyes were never made for you,
"Too eloquent by far for such a saint;
"I only wish for my sake they'd been blue,
"I pray do you ever rouge my dear or paint!
"I wish for certain reasons that I knew;
"I see no cause indeed why ladies mayn't,
"Provided that they tell us all in time;
"I cannot think it then would be a crime.

There is a certain language in the eye,
That generally is understood by all;
A sort of mutual sympathy by the by,
In which young people very often fall;
And is a habit which I must decry
As not becoming to the sex at all;
I mean that staring in each other's face,
Without regard to either time or place.

Exchange of glances, looks of love and such like,
Are things that I should certainly condemn;
And which, in truth, I cannot say I much like,
Although, perhaps, I've had my share of them;
It gives one too a sort of quick'ning touch like Lightning—the brilliancy of a gem
Darted upon us from a female eye;
And then we cannot tell the reason why.

The lady I alluded to before,
Had been in youth a very arrant flirt;
But now as she was verging on two score,
[In fact she'd done her character some hurt]
She would reform and never do so more;
[I hope she will not think that I am part]
And so resolv'd at once to turn a saint—
She really held herself in great restraint.

Her rouge et cetera were now laid aside,
And all such articles of ladies' fair,
In which they take a mighty deal of pride,
As making them as beautiful as they are.
No doubt but many blemishes they hide,
Altho' in fact, it's but a sort of snare;
And hanging out false colours as they say
Which surely's not a very honest way.

She gave up balls, and now abhor'd a rout;
Had very great aversion to a play;
Although indeed I had myself some doubt,
Whether she really was inclin'd that way;
I would not have this thought to get about,
Because you know it's but what people say;
And I would be the last man to defame,
Or otherwise to injure her good name.

If I might be permitted now to give
An opinion on so delicate a subject, Which — — — — —

I really own that I do much suspect
Those ladies, who with modest, and with pious looks
Make you believe they read nought but their prayer books.

I've many weighty reasons for so thinking,
Which if I chuse I could explain to you;
Some that would make your eyes begin of winking,
So very wonderful but yet so true;
I should not like it to be thought I'm shirking
From what I said before, no more I do.
I say if I were willing I could prove
All that to you, which I have said above.

In youth this lady had been much admir'd,
A fine good-looking woman, you would call her;
Not that I think they're most to be desir'd—
I've seen some pretty women rather smaller,
Which to my taste would not so soon have tir'd;
But let that pass I'd never wish one taller.
In spite of her complexion being brown,
She look'd much better in an evening gown.

She'd had some lovers (so at least I've heard)
Amounting to in all about two score,
Which some say is a thing that's quite absurd,
Having never heard the like of it before;
Now as to this I will not pledge my word;
She might have had you know as many more
Without us knowing aught about the matter.
Except by what we hear from idle chatter.

I do not think that novels or romances
Ought to be put into young ladies' hands;
They only fill their heads with whims and fancies,
And such like nonsense no one understands,
As knights in love and damsels too in trances,
Who wander far away in foreign lands;
Also such stories too, as Miss Florida,
Who jump'd out to her lover through the window.

But I must bring this canto to a close,
And wish the courteous reader a good bye;
My muse I'm sure would wish to take a dose—
In fact, she's rather tired—so am I;
And as we have not too much time to lose,
I'll not defer this opportunity
Of wishing you, kind reader, a good night,
And pleasant reveries, and slumbers light.

THE CABINET.

PERE LA CHAISE.

(By the Author of the Magic Lantern.)

Père La Chaise is the modern and fashionable burying-ground of Paris. Will it be believed that even to the "Narrow House" fashion carries its influence—but so it is; and all the persons of a certain rank—that is to say, those who can afford to pay for it—who may enter the dull precincts of death at Paris, are consigned to Père La Chaise, which is certainly the most cheerful (if I can apply this term to such a place) church-yard that ever was seen.

The French only could have thought of decorating the last sad earthly home as this is adorned; nothing can be more incongruous; every size, sort, and shape of monument, from the pyramid of Egypt in miniature to the ornamented Gothic chapel,—all are jumbled together in the strangest confusion. Here we have a sarcophagus supported by sphinxes, while next to it a Greek cross of delicate proportion rears its modest front. Several of the monuments have recesses in them, which are filled with baskets of artificial flowers covered over with glass, and almost all adorned by garlands of flowers, moss, or beads, while many have beds of flowers, rose-trees, and flowering shrubs planted round them. The place is thickly planted with cypress, poplars, and other trees, and several walks are formed in it. The mixture of frivolity and sentiment visible in this asylum of the dead must impress itself strongly on the mind of an English person, and is no bad epitome of the French character.

Here the ruling passion is strikingly evident; and I confess I have so much of the natural John Bull feeling about me, that I would prefer having my grave in the most secluded sombre spot that could be found, to leaving my bones in the fashionable, sentimental Père La Chaise. The beautiful monument of the unfortunate lovers Heloise and Abelard is removed to this cemetery, and wretchedly placed in a corner, near the wall that incloses the ground. Surely, if "in the ashes glowed their wonted fires," they would doubly glow at the situation and society in which they are now placed.

It is the custom to pay a certain sum for the ground, which is generally bought at so many years' purchase. The general period is fifty years, and at the expiration of that time it is broken up, and disposed of again. The tomb-stones usually bear inscriptions specifying the length of time for which they are to stand. Reading those inscriptions suggested the following lines:

"Reader, this grave for fifty years is mine,
But when my term is up, it may be thine."

Thus the epitaph answers the double purpose of honouring the dead, and of offering the tenement to a future customer.

SEVEN SYMPTOMS OF SPRING IN LONDON

Symptom 1. To hear, some morning, before you are well awake, a hoarse unfeminine voice squalling, "primroses, two bunches a-penny;" followed, in a few days, with "buy my pretty bough-pots and sweet briar," or daffydow dillies.

Symptom 2. Happening to go as far from the city as the parish of Clerkenwell; to see some little urchin of a boy with his rod and line, like another Polyphemus, sitting on the wall by the side of the New River, and bobbing for a gudgeon; and, at the same time, to observe that the little bit of garden belonging to Sadler's Wells has been fresh raked, the white rails on that side of the river newly painted, as also the entrance doors, and the magic words, boxes, pit, and gallery.

Symptom 3. To hear Jews and Irishmen, on some Sunday morning (for you generally hear mackarel cried first on that day, so massaged, perhaps, because folks have more time to eat and money to spend), bawling "my-brel."

Symptom 4. To see a fine quarter of lamb, tempting you at your butcher's: but this is an awkward symptom, for, upon inquiring the price, you find it heavier perhaps than your pocket.

Symptom 5. A fine cream cheese at the butter shop, and divers bunches of radishes at the green-grocers, as an accompaniment.

Symptom 6. Rather a rural symptom; viz. to see, in passing through one of the inns of court, or past a London church-yard, a shrub or tree showing its first budding attempt to put forth a yellow-green leaf in its murky and foggy atmosphere.

Symptom 7. To go to Covent Garden (the finest garden in England, as we cockneys say) on some fine Tuesday or Thursday morning, being market-days, and see the fair goddess of Spring personified by young summer cabbages, cauliflowers, (those best of flowers) bundles of asparagus, early dishes of green peas, and other tempting vegetable matters. To see, also, Maia's coronet, torn apparently from her brows, offered for sale in the shape of beautiful and blooming flowers, tastefully disposed in nosegays for the mantle-piece or the boudoir. And, more than all, the flowers having real and right-earnest roots to them, with or without pots, and to be bought for various sums, from the two-penny root of southern wood and double daisies, or sixpenny one of Sweet William, to the half-crown myrtle or the half-guinea camellia japonica.

Who, then, should dare to say that we Londoners know nothing of Spring and her beauties, but that we must succumb and knock under to the rustics and men of the shires, when we have seven such symptoms as the above to apprise us of her arrival? Let, then, the followers of the plough keep their dirty fields and lanes to themselves; and come home from a spring-day's walk with half a hundred weight of clay hanging to their heels; let them go on eating their fat bacon in peace, and leave us to our good pavements, our gas-lights, our lamb and mint sauce, and our seven symptoms of spring.—Lit. Chron.

AN OLD INDIAN CHIEF.

(From Manners and Customs of several Indian Tribes.)

Here, after I had become acquainted with their language, I was accustomed, in company with the Indian boys, to listen with indescribable satisfaction to the sage counsels, inspiring narratives, and traditionary tales of Tshut-cho-nau.* This venerable worn-out warrior would often admonish us for our faults, and exhort us never to tell a lie. 'Never steal, except it be from an enemy, whom it is just that we should injure in every possible way. When you become men, be brave and cunning in war, and defend your hunting grounds against all encroachments. Never suffer your squaws or little ones to want. Protect the squaws and strangers from insult. On no account betray your friend. Resent insults; revenge yourselves on your enemies. Drink not the poisonous strong-water of the white people; it is sent by the Bad Spirit to destroy the Indians. Fear not death; none but cowards fear to die. Obey and venerate the old people, particularly your parents. Fear and propitiate the Bad Spirit, that he may do you no harm;—love and adore the Good Spirit, who made us all, who supplies our hunting grounds, and keeps us alive.

He would then point to the scars that disfigured his body, and say, 'Often have I been engaged in deadly combat with the enemies of our nation, and almost as often come off victorious.—I have made long walks over snow and ice, and through swamps and prairies, without food, in search of my country's foes: I have taken this and that prisoner, and the scalps of such and such warriors.

Now looking round on his auditors with an indescribable expression of feeling in his countenance, and pointing to the green fields of corn, and to the stores collected from the hunting grounds, he would continue, 'For the peaceful enjoyment of all these, you are indebted to myself and to my brave warriors. But now they are all gone, and I only remain. Like a decayed prairie tree, I stand alone: the companions of my youth, the partakers of my sports, my toils, and my dangers, recline their heads on the bosom of our Mother.† My sun is fast descending behind the western hills, and I feel that it will soon be night with me.

ON MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTIONS.

Chiefly extracted from an Essay by the late Dr. V. Knox.
[By S. X.]

We have many fine poetical Epitaphs: those of Dryden and Pope are most deservedly celebrated. In general, the metrical are inferior to the prosaic.

The love of rhyme, indeed, descends to the lowest ranks; and there are few church-yards where that favourite,

"Affliction sore, long time I bore,"

does not occur more than once.

Few, perhaps, of the more common inscriptions, which are to be met with in almost every church-yard, in England, are read with greater pleasure than the following descriptive one, the original of which may be seen in the 8th edition of Francis Quarles' "Divine Emblems," printed in 1687, and quaintly dedicated "To the Royal Bud of Majesty, and Centre of our Hopes and Happiness, CHARLES, Prince of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Son and Heir Apparent to the High and Mighty CHARLES, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, &c."

"Our Life is like a winter's day:
Some only breakfast, and away;
Others to dinner stay, and are full fed;
The oldest man but supper, and goes to bed.
Large is his debt that lingers out the day;
Who goes the soonest, has the least to pay."

The misfortune has been, that many of our Epitaphs in prose have encroached on the province of biography, and real dignity has been lost in a tedious and circumstantial detail of descents, pedigrees, and relationships. The reader is tired before he has obtained a clear idea of the character and family described. The following Epitaph on the Great Nelson occupies more than eighty lines of the tablet on which it is inscribed. This justly admired Tribute to the incomparable merits of the Hero of Trafalgar, was written by the Right Hon. R. B. Sheridan:

"At an early period of life He entered into the Naval Service of his Country; and early were the instances which marked the fearless nature and Enterprise of his Character; uniting to the loftiest Spirit, and the justest title to Self-confidence, a strict and humble obedience to the sovereign rule of Discipline and Subordination. Rising by due gradation to command, he infused into the bosom of those he led, the valorous Ardour and enthusiastic Zeal for the Service of his King and Country which animated his own; and while he acquired the Love of all, by the sweetness and moderation of his Temper, he inspired a universal Confidence in the never-failing resources of his capacious Mind. Solicitous of Peril, and regardless of Wounds, he became, at length, the Glory of his Profession! He commanded and conquered at the Battles of the NILE and COPENHAGEN: victories never before equalled, yet afterwards surpassed by his own last Achievement, fought on the 21st of October, in the year 1805.

THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR!

On that day, before the conclusion of the Action, HE FELL, mortally wounded; but the sources of Life and Sense failed not until it was known to him that, the destruction of the enemy being completed, the Glory of his Country and his Own had attained their summit; then laying his hand on his brave Heart, with a look of exalted resignation to the Will of the Supreme Disposer of the Fate of Man and Nations, HE EXPIRED.

The Period to Nelson's Fame can only be the end of Time!

FINE ARTS.

MUSIC.

Harmony is the result of a combination of sounds modulated according to the order of nature and art. This definition is applicable equally to Vocal and Instrumental Music; consequently eminence in the science depends on the skill and degree of perfection with which it is cultivated. Since, however, the endowments of men are almost endlessly diversified, we must ascribe to every competitor comparative, rather than absolute merit. Nor must it be overlooked that different individuals may rank equally high, in point of excellence, in different branches of the profession; so that in adjusting the balance with any precision, it requires peculiar discrimination and judgment.

In a course of Musical Lectures, delivered by Dr. Crotch at the London Institution, the various powers of three great Masters in composition, Handel, Haydn, and Mozart, were exhibited and critically examined. The order in which we have named them appears to be prescribed by their talents and productions. This judgment seems to be awarded by public opinion, and will no doubt be sanctioned by impartial posterity. They all contribute to our delight; but the effect of their Music on our feelings almost compels the verdict of our judgment as now recorded.

The subject of his concluding Lecture was the Opera of Le Nozze di Figaro, by Mozart. The remarks which Dr. Crotch made upon it were but few, and not of material consequence. He performed thirteen specimens, selected from different parts of the Opera. They were rich, melodious, and impressive. The Professor gave it as his opinion, that if Mozart is not to be considered as the greatest of all Composers, he must be allowed the pre-eminence amongst the moderns. His genius is original, and his style forms an epoch in the Musical Art. His Symphonies are learned, his Dances airy, his imagination rich, his sensibility deep, and his taste pure. The very early intimations which he gave of his great powers were justified by the productions of his more mature years. At six years of age he is reported to have written, though in a rude manner, music which his father, notwithstanding he was an able practitioner, found it difficult to perform. His ear is said to have been so exquisitely formed, that the slightest harshness or discordancy in a note was a torture to him. If there is such a thing as musical inspiration, it would almost seem that, at least in the early part of life, Mozart was visited by it, since his ability for regular or extemporary composition was not at all times the same. A capacity, however, for peculiar exertion and the manifestation of great excellence, is not confined to this Science, or to a solitary individual, but is conferred in various branches of mental power.

SKETCHES AND FRAGMENTS.

(By the Author of the Magic Lantern.)

COQUETRY.—In No. 198 of the Spectator there is a remarkably good paper by Addison, on the dangers of coquetry and levity. He commences by saying, 'There is a species of women whom I shall distinguish by the name of Salamanders. Now, a Salamander is a kind of heroine in chastity, that treads upon fire, and lives in the midst of flames without being hurt. A Salamander knows no distinction of sex in those she converses with, grows familiar with a stranger at first sight, and is not so narrow-spirited as to observe whether the person she talks to be in male or female attire. She plays a whole evening at picquet with a gentleman, walks with him two or three hours by moonlight, and is extremely scandalized at the unreasonableness of a husband, or the severity of a parent, that would debar the sex from such innocent liberties.'

There is no character more prevalent in the present day than that of the Salamander, though it is perhaps better known as the coquette, and none more injurious to society. It may be questioned whether the woman who, in private, sacrifices her honour, but in public wears the semblance of virtue, is not less dangerous to society; and whether there be not greater hope of her amendment. Her sin, enormous as it is, being concealed from the world, and accompanied by all the outward appearances of propriety, has not the same pernicious effect of bad example. Conscious of her own crimes, she pays the deference of Virtue of assuming its mask; and it is to be hoped that she may see the error of her ways and amend: but the Salamander goes on priding herself on the consciousness of preserving her chastity; while her conduct is so full of levity, that the generality of mankind believe that so much public impropriety must be accompanied by actual guilt; and her example cannot fail of being injurious to the young and thoughtless. There is but little prospect of her amendment; for though suffering under a loss of character, she is unconscious of her faults, and fancies herself the victim of unjust slander. She is insensible of the necessity of appearing virtuous, as well as of being so; and this blindness to her own errors engenders an angry feeling at what she considers the injustice of the world, which leaves the mind ill prepared for reflection and repentance. Another danger attached to the Salamander is, that by her levity she encourages freedoms which often so far exceed the bounds of propriety, that even she feels indignant; and, instead of reflecting on her own want of conduct, which led to such liberties, and resolving never again to betray the same levity, she resents the insult with all the warmth and astonishment of outraged modesty and decorum; like a person who has thrown down the fence which guards his property, and is then surprised that people trespass on it.

FRIENDSHIP.—'I call the man my friend who is inclined to treat me, when present, with candour; when absent, with consideration.' This was Marmontel's idea of the requisites essential in a friend; but how few, how very few, deserve that appellation, which is so indiscriminately bestowed by the unthinking, on any companion whom chance or circumstances have thrown in their way, or with whom, by some similarity of pursuit or of taste, they have formed an intimacy; which, though it brings them often together, still leaves them devoid of sentiment of real regard or esteem!

Friendship, in the modern acceptance of the word, is merely an association produced by habit or convenience, and dissolved as easily as it is formed. Happy, thrice happy, are they who in this 'weary pilgrimage' meet with that most inestimable of all blessings—a true friend; feelingly alive to their good qualities, and correcting the bad with the mild and patient voice of truth, kindness, and sincerity, which only wishes to raise the object of its censure.

Rousseau has said, and with great delicacy of feeling, that we may repulse blows aimed at us by our enemies; but when we behold among the assassins our friend, sword in hand, nothing remains but to hide our head. How strangely did the 'Et tu Brute' of Julius Caesar express this sentiment, when, folding his robe over his head, he resigned himself to his fate! It is from friends, or at least nominal ones, that we frequently receive the deepest wounds; and bitter experience daily inculcates the sage advice, from which the generous youthful mind turns with disdain, 'Live with your friends as though they may one day become your enemies.'

CHILDREN.—It is pleasing to behold the gradual expansion of the youthful mind. We may look upon children as little men and women, and trace in the former most of the propensities of the latter; but, with all due respect to maturity, children are often much more entertaining, first, because there is in them a freshness of mind that gives elasticity to their thoughts, and freedom to their actions; and, secondly, because, though they have all the propensities of men and women, they have not, like them, the sense or cunning to conceal them.

More depends on first impressions than people are aware of; and parents should, if possible, be more careful in the selection of their nurse-maids than of their governesses. The former often lay the foundation of evils that the latter never can erase. It is from the first they imbibe that most detestable of all mean vices, cunning, which engenders lying and deception; and how often do we see a child emerge from the nursery, devoid of that freshness and simple purity which constitute the greatest charm of infancy!

'A child without innocence is like a flower without perfume,' is, I believe, an observation of Chateaubriand's, and its truth has often struck me, when I have beheld the petty artifices so disgusting in children. If we believe, with Locke, that there are no innate ideas in the human mind, we may consider that of a child as a sheet of blank paper. But as it cannot long remain so, how careful ought we to be what characters first deface its unsullied purity!—characters so often indelible;—and can we, or ought we to permit them to be traced by a menial hand? a hand perhaps stained by theft, and the ready minister to the crimes and vices of its owner.

But allowing that the menials, to whom we trust our children, are not dishonest or vicious, how few of them are to be found that are not ignorant and full of prejudices; and what security have we that our children will not imbibe the latter, however we may, by education, guard against the former? Who is it that cannot trace to the first impressions conveyed to their minds by servants the many false opinions and injurious prejudices of youth, which in after age they have found it so difficult to conquer entirely? Beware, then, ye who are blessed with children, how ye abuse the treasures committed to your charge, and reflect, that on early impressions depends much of the good conduct and happiness of your offspring.

MENTAL IMPROVEMENT.—It is pleasant when one is prevented a whole evening from reading, to make amends for it by amusing and instructive conversation; for when we reflect how short is our span of life, and how much of that short span is consumed in sleeping, dressing, eating, and visits, with a long et cetera of frivolous amusements, we have indeed but a short time for mental improvement. And how frequently is even that short time interrupted by dull, trifling, or petulant companions, who without any mercy break in on our time!

We should, therefore, never omit an opportunity of improvement; for certainly the Almighty never intended that the powers of mind with which he has endowed us were to be unemployed. The best way to ensure our own happiness, as well as to show our gratitude to our Creator, is to cultivate to the highest state of perfection the talents bestowed on us, and to employ those talents usefully and honorably.

THE VISION.

Beneath a cooling shade I lay,
Retired, in softest slumbers laid,
While shattering from the heat of day;
Before my mind this vision past.

A lovely form of azure light,
Just like a Seraph clothed in air,
Whose robe flow'd as a trail of light,
Amongst the clouds divinely fair.

Descending swift, on downy wings,
She cuts the liquid ether pure,
And thousand odours round her fling,
And waits them to my shade obscure.

Softly she lit upon the ground,
And as she trod, it brighter grew;
Her gentle feet with sandals bound,
Scarce beat the flowers that sprang new.

She stood, combining every grace,
And fix'd on me her emerald eyes,
Which darted radiant on my face,
And then majestic bid me rise.

She led me far o'er plains and hills,
Thro' many a grove, and winding vale,
Last, to a chrystal stream that trills,
In gentlest murmurs through a dale.

It issues from a mountain's side,
And murm'ring mossy banks are there;
'Tis where to sport in joyous pride,
The virgin muses oft assemble.

"Come," said my heavenly visitant,
"Here drink thy muse and nobler kind;
"Long have I heard thy dear complaint,
"Now bolder strike the vocal string."

"No longer here obscurely dwell,
"Amidst the vulgar passing throng,
"For future times at least shall tell,
"The rising wonder of thy song."

"Fare then that true poetic fire,
"Which fills and constitutes thy soul;
"The muse thy fancy will inspire,
"Nor dare thy spirit to controul."

She said: and stripp'd the myrtle tree,
To weave a pure, perennial crown;
"This I design," she said, "for thee,
"And may'st thou wear it with renown."

"See! thou'rt thou four winged messenger,
"That flies as lightning swift:—'tis true,
"A mighty Goddess, trust in her,
"And thou shalt find a deathless name."

She ceas'd the music of her tongue—
(Whilst I stood wrapt in awe and fear,
And felt as though the heav'n had rung
Their silv'ry harps upon mine ear),

Then vanish'd from my eager eyes,
And left me silent at the stream:
At last awak'ning with surprise,
I found the passing vision a dream.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I have little leisure, and less inclination, for newspaper controversy; particularly with anonymous opponents, who are seldom to be silenced, even by refutation; and over whom victory is but the shadow of a triumph. Permit me however, in this instance, briefly to observe, for the satisfaction of your intelligent correspondent Y., that the "novel theory" against which he has so heroically taken the field, is to be found, (the date at least from which it is deducible, by every school boy) in all elementary works on Astronomy!

The remarks in my lecture which elicited the formidable displeasure of Y., referred to effects naturally, and unavoidably, resulting from causes which are in themselves, as well established, and demonstrable as any in the science; namely the revolution of the Earth's perihelion point, or line of apsides, and the certain, though gradual diminution of the obliquity of the Ecliptic.—If your correspondent is still disposed to doubt the consequences which must obviously arise from these motions, perhaps he will condescend to inform us by what other rational or philosophical supposition we are to account for the fact, that shells and various marine productions are constantly found in situations so far above the present level of the sea?—and further, what cause but the extension of the tropics (a necessary effect of the changes in the angle of the Ecliptic,) could have placed organic remains of animals peculiar to latitudes now so widely different, in the rocks and soils of this Island? With this interesting subject for Y.'s scientific powers, I must leave him, but with the assurance that whenever he shall condescend to ~~summarise~~ and assume "a local habitation and a name," I shall be ready to meet him in the pages of the Iris.—Let him however observe that a real name (for I will not dispute with a phantom,) is a sine qua non of my engagement,

I am &c., A. F. ROGERS.

STENOGRAPHY.

MR. EDITOR.—(Of all the different systems of Short-hand which have been incidentally mentioned, in various numbers of your scientific miscellany, no allusion, I believe, has yet been made to one that has recently been announced to the world, by a Mr. Kitchingman, and which has certainly, partly by its own merits, and partly by the strong recommendation of its numerous patrons, obtained no inconsiderable degree of celebrity. This system, the principles of which I have lately had an opportunity of investigating, has not, at present, been committed to the press, the alphabet, and elementary parts, alone, being engraved, and printed on a quarto page, for the use of Mr. Kitchingman's pupils. This plate contains a brief summary of the whole scheme, comprising almost every thing essential to a complete knowledge of the system, and serving, at the same time, as the basis of all the Teacher's future instructions, which are communicated, visâ voce, and in a very able manner, to each individual pupil, as circumstances may require.

Mr. Kitchingman's system of Stenography is founded on a novel and very ingenious expedient, never before attempted, consisting of what is termed a duplicate or reverse Alphabet, the second or duplicate character for each letter, being precisely the reverse of the first character. This gives great facility in joining different characters together, in words containing two or more letters. The characters which compose the second set are also used, at the beginning of words, for certain prepositions, in connexion with the remaining characters in the same word; and the terminations, also, are expressed by peculiar marks, or quaint turns, joined to the preceding part of the word, without lifting the pen. From this diversity of character for one and the same letter, the different combinations are, for the most part, greatly superior to those which occur in other systems of Short-hand; and by this means also is preserved the correct form of each individual character, both in its commencement and termination, and therefore easily distinguished from the rest of the characters, with which it is connected, in the same word. The words are, in general, more fully expressed, and by fewer characters, than are usually employed, even in the best and most approved systems of Short-hand. I have already observed, that the prepositions and terminations, as they occur in Mr. Kitchingman's system, are not detached from the other part of the word to which they belong; and the vowels, likewise, which occur at the beginning or end of words, are connected with the next consonant, either following or preceding the vowel. Those which occur in the middle of words, are, if I mistake not generally omitted. Such sweeping omissions, however, must, I should conjecture, prove a grievous impediment to reading the character with facility and at sight, particularly what has been written by another person, and on a subject perhaps with which the reader may not have been previously acquainted.

On the whole, as far as I have been able to judge, the system of Mr. Kitchingman comprises a great number of very minute particulars, and some nice discriminations, which cannot fail to be a great imposition on the memory; and a practical knowledge of it, therefore, cannot be acquired in so short a time, as is requisite for the attainment of other less complicated systems. It seems, however, to possess some advantages that are not to be found in Byrom's Method of Short-hand, which is acknowledged, even by Mr. Kitchingman himself, to be greatly superior to any system which had appeared antecedent to the date of that publication; and, moreover, that it formed a new and distinct era in the history of this Art. On some accounts, Mr. Byrom's Method will be found to possess a decided superiority over Mr. Kitchingman's curious and truly ingenious System, being, it is apprehended, better adapted for all the common purposes to which Short-hand is most generally applied, and having greater simplicity, both in its plan and execution.

Yours, &c. S. X.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The "Author of Waverley" has, I think, puzzled the Literati to pronounce the titles of some of his works. I have frequently had occasion to remark the following:—"Wa'-verley," (the a sounded as in wave,) or Wav'-erley: "I'-vanhoe," Iv'-anhoe or Ivan'-hoe: "The Fortunes of Ni'-gle," (the g hard as in Mangle,) Nig'-el. (the accent upon the g hard,) Ni'-gle, (the g soft as in cudgel,) or Nig'-le, (the accent upon the g soft.)

If any of your correspondents, can inform me of the true pronunciation of these renowned heroes, I shall feel particularly obliged.

Yours respectfully,

Oldham, April 17th, 1823.

VARIETIES.

Anecdotes of Peter I. of Russia.—The Czar was so desirous that every one should have his due, that he very frequently administered the discipline of the cane with his own hands, and Menzikoff, together with the rest of his ministers, often experienced the strength of his arm. One night, the Emperor having travelled from Casan, and arriving late at Petersburg, the senators, presuming that he would lie in bed the next morning beyond his usual time, thought they might also indulge themselves, and did not repair to the senate at the hour appointed, which was seven o'clock—but Peter was as punctual as ever; and not finding any one in the court, except the clerks, he ordered them to bring the decisions of the judges, and sat down to revise them, according to his usual custom: if pleased with a decision, he confirmed it by affixing his signature (Pitre); if he disapproved it, he wrote in the margin ill-decided. While he was thus employed, the invalids, who guarded the senate, sent messengers to inform the members that his majesty was come: on which they hastened to the court. As soon as the first senator entered, the Czar left his seat, walked with great gravity to meet him, and with his cane gave him a severe thrashing, accompanied with a reprimand on account of his laziness; the rest were received in the same manner, and each underwent the same chastise-ment: the last of the train was an old infirm admiral, who fell on his knees at the door, and cried, "Sire! If you thrash me, as you have the rest, you will kill me."—"Rise, my worthy old man," answered the Emperor, "the law, which commands the punctual attendance of the senators, was not intended for you. You have long served me, and your time is fully expired. I placed you here merely to afford you a more comfortable subsistence: but these fellows have been essentially deficient in their duties, and I have given them a good lesson. As to you, you may either stay or retire, as you please."

Peter always rewarded punctuality and strictness in the obedience of orders, even in cases which they were productive of inconvenience to himself. Though free from most of the superstitious notions of his church, he was so weak as to fancy that there was a peculiar efficacy in the ringing of bells. Accordingly, at the birth of his son Peter Petrovitch, as soon as the Empress was in labour, he ran to the admiralty in order to ring the bells there. As it was midnight, he found the gates shut, and was very rudely repulsed by the centinel; who, when Peter said he was the Emperor, treated him as an impostor, and answered, that he had positive orders not to admit any one. Peter had forgotten that he had given this order: but, on recollecting it, he told the soldier that he now revoked it, and desired that the gate might be opened: the centinel persisted in his refusal, and threatened to turn him away by force, if he would not go about his business: the Czar continued to expostulate, and asked the man from whom he had received this order?—"From my serjeant."—"Call him."—"The serjeant came: Peter told him who he was, and commanded him to open the gate."—"That I cannot do," was the answer; "my orders are, not to let any one in, and though you were the Emperor, you should not enter."—"Go," (said Peter,) and tell your commanding officer that the Czar wants to speak to him." On his appearance, the monarch repeated his request to be admitted; this the officer at first refused: but, ordering a light to be brought, he recognized the Emperor, and commanded the gate to be opened. Peter entered without speaking to any one, went to prayers, and afterwards spent a quarter of an hour in ringing one of the bells. When he had finished his devotions, he went into the guard-house, and declared that he would make the centinel a serjeant, the serjeant an officer, and promote the commanding officer to a higher rank: "Continue," said he, on leaving them, "continue, my friends, to obey my orders with similar punctuality, and you may be certain of being rewarded."

Beaux of Former Times.—We question whether the celebrated Beau Brummell, and even the equally celebrated Romeo Coates, are not absolutely mere Quakers in dress, compared with some of the distinguished dressers of former days. Sir Walter Raleigh wore a white satin pinked vest, close sleeved to the wrist; over the body a brown doublet, finely flowered and embroidered with pearl. In the feather of his hat a large ruby and pearl drop at the bottom of the sprig, in place of a button: his trunk or breeches, with his stockings and ribbon garters, fringed at the end, all white; and buff shoes, with white ribbon. On great court-days his shoes were so gorgeously covered with precious stones, as to have exceeded the value of £6000, and he had a suit of armour of solid silver, with sword and belt blazing with diamonds, rubies, and pearls.—King James's favourite, the Duke of Buckingham, could afford to have his diamonds tacked so loosely on, that when he chose to shake off a few on the ground, he obtained all the fame he desired from the pickers-up, who were generally les Dames de la Cour; for our Duke never condescended to accept what he himself had dropped. His cloaks were trimmed with great diamond buttons, and diamond hat-bands cockades, and ear-rings, yoked with great ropes and knots of pearls. He had twenty-seven suits of clothes made, the richest that embroidery, lace, silk velvet, silver, gold, and gems could contribute; one of which was a white uncut velvet, set all over, both suit and cloak, with diamonds, valued at fourscore thousand pounds, beside a great feather, stuck all over with diamonds, as were also his sword girdle, hat, and spurs. When the difference in the value of money is considered, the sums thus ridiculously squandered in dress must have been prodigious.

Highland Revenge.—A Highlander entered a haberdasher's shop in Perth, the other day, and asked for a piece of scarlet cloth to make him a waistcoat. The rustic manners of the Gael set some young women who were at the counter a giggling; and the shopman, willing to afford them sport, began to play off his small wit upon the stranger. "So, good man, ye want a piece of scarlet? Would you know scarlet if you saw it?" "I tink I would," replied the mountaineer. The shopman threw down a piece of blue cloth: "Is that scarlet?" "Hout, no, no! that no be it." A piece of green cloth was produced: the same question was repeated, and received a similar answer,—to the great amusement of the querist and his female friends, who were at no pains to conceal their mirth. The Highlander took revenge in his own way: he put his nose to the cloth, and affected to judge of the colour by the smell. The shopman, at his request, did the same; but the instant he bent his nose towards the counter, the Highlander seized him by the ears, and made his nasal protuberance come in such violent contact with the boards that the blood sprang from it. "Tat," said the Highlander, "is a colour o' scarlet tae ye noo lad;"—and he walked away.

Signor Castrucci a famous performer on the violin, but a man of very eccentric habits, who came over from Italy with Lord Burlington in 1715, was the person immortalized by Hogarth in his celebrated picture of the Enraged Musician. Previous to making his drawing, the painter was wicked enough to have the poor Italian's house beset by all the noisy street performers he could collect together, whose clamorous and discordant instruments brought the distracted Castrucci to his window in all the agonies of auricular torture, and then it was that the artist made his expressive sketch.

A Hint to Christians.—A proposal for an Edition of the Laws of the Jews (says a correspondent) has lately been published by a learned Rabbi, who is naturally, although erroneously, more attached to the Mosaic than to the Christian dispensation. He says: "Nor is the humane disposition and tendency of many precepts in the Mosaic Code confined to the care of the poor, the destitute, and the oppressed, but is extended also to brute animals, the care of the labouring ox, the ass, the sucking kid, and the tender birds, violence to whose natures and services was not permitted by the law of the God of Israel. Christianity stands abashed at some of these precepts, where the most servicable animals, subjected to the dominion of man, are made the victims of rage and wonted barbarity! The criminal code of the ancient Hebrews has one remarkable principle—a principle which should ever be regarded in the framing of laws for the prevention of crime, and that is 'Restitution': this principle is clearly shewed in the cases of ox-stealing and sheep-stealing; where the thief when found was to make restitution in proportion to the theft, from two to four-fold or five-fold, with the principal, or to be sold for the theft. Christian Legislators have yet to learn proportion between crime and crime, and between crime and punishment."

Anecdote of Mr. Zoffani.—When, many years ago, Mr. Zoffani the painter, began his picture of the late King and his family, there were ten children; he made his sketch accordingly, and after attending two or three times, went on with finishing the figures. Sundry circumstances prevented him from proceeding: his majesty was engaged in business of more consequence; her majesty was engaged; some of the princesses were engaged, or some of the princes ill. The completion of the picture was consequently delayed, till a message came to the artist that another prince was born, and must be introduced into the picture. This was not easy, but with some difficulty, was done; all this took up much time; when a second message came, informing him of the birth of a princess, and that the illustrious stranger must have a place on the canvass. This was impossible without a new arrangement: some of the figures were obliterated, and put closer together to make room. To do this occupied some months, and before the completion, a letter came from one of the maids of honour, informing the painter that another addition was made to the family, for whom a place must be found. "This," cried the artist "is too much, if they cannot sit with more regularity. I cannot paint with more expedition, and must give it up."

Rhinoceros.—The skeleton of a rhinoceros was discovered a short time ago, by some miners in search of lead ore, ninety feet below the surface of the earth in the neighbourhood of Wirksworth, in what is called diluvian soil. The bones are in a perfect state, and the enamel of the teeth uninjured.

Figures of the Earth.—Capt. Sabine, who accompanied Capt. Parry, as astronomer, in his voyage to Melville Island, proceeds directly to Spitzbergen, for the purpose of making observations for determining the true figure of the earth, similar to those he has already made on the coast of Africa, the West Indies, and America. The Griper gun-brig is sitting out at Deptford for the conveyance of Capt. Sabine.

At the election for a foreign associate of the French Institute, in the room of the late Dr. Jenner, the following gentlemen were proposed:—Dr. Wollaston, Dr. Young, M. Olbers, M. Schumacher, M. Von Buch, Mr. Lambton, Mr. Brown, Mr. Dalton, and M. Oersted. The number of members who voted was 44, and the ballot was as follows:—Dr. Wollaston, 38—Olbers, 5—Von Buch, 1. It is highly honourable to the English nation, that out of nine persons proposed by the Institute, amongst all the learned and talented men of the civilized world, five should be Englishmen.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER,

From Monday April 14th, to Friday April 18th, 1823.

Monday.—For the Benefit of Mr. Ward. Trip to Scarbro': with Simpson and Co.

Wednesday.—Wallace: with Simpson and Co.

Friday.—Virginus: with Simpson and Co.

On Monday night Mr. Ward our Directing Manager, took for his benefit "A Trip to Scarborough;" and the new and deservedly popular farce of "Simpson & Co." Simpson and Bromley are merchants in partnership; the former a sober staid Dr. and Cr. person, of the old school; the latter a dashing specimen of the more modern class, who mix up a little of the "Corinthian" with the more homely brass acquired east of Temple Bar. Both the partners are married, and reside together in the same house in Mincing-lane. Bromley, in the spirit of the licence of the fashionable world, although attached to his wife, assumes the Mahometan liberty of falling in love with the young widow of General Fitzalan, just returned from the East Indies, whom, under the assumed name of Captain Walsingham, he assails with letters, which are all returned unopened. We are next introduced to Mrs. Simpson a very good kind of woman, but, like many other good kind of women, inclined to be unreasonably jealous; and to Mrs. Bromley, the elegant and accomplished wife of the erratic and erotic Bromley. These ladies are unfolding their particular characteristics, in dialogue, when they are interrupted by Madame La Trappe, a dealer in smuggled lace, who accidentally lets fall that a part of her business in Mincing-lane is to get cash for an acceptance of Simpson & Co. which she has received from a beautiful lady in Harley-street. This information instantly excites the attention of the jealous Mrs. Simpson, who extorts from the Frenchwoman, that she had frequently seen a gentleman walking before the door of the lady in question, which gentleman, strange to say, she had just recognized in the counting-house below. This is quite enough for Mrs. Simpson, who attacks her astonished husband with the ferocity very usual, but certainly not very politic, on such occasions, until he angrily quits the room. Bromley is partially informed of these particulars, and humorously quizzes his sober partner; but being suddenly called away, leaves his pocket-book, containing certain securities, with Mr. Simpson, and in it the miniature portrait of his obdurate mistress. This pocket-book Simpson leaves on his desk, by which means it gets into the hands of his wife, who discovering the miniature, is of course confirmed in all her suspicions, and poor Peter Simpson is overwhelmed with incomprehensible reproaches a second time. At this moment, Mrs. Fitzalan, the fair subduer of Bromley, is announced; it seems she was an old schoolfellow of Mrs. Bromley's; she no sooner appears, than Mrs. Simpson recognizes the original of the miniature, and a very happy comic situation is produced. At this moment Bromley makes his appearance, and Mrs. Fitzalan finds out that her rejected enamorado is a married man, but out of friendship to Mrs. Bromley, does not expose him. In the mean time Mrs. Simpson is made aware of the folly of her jealousy, by the return of the pocket-book to the right owner. Bromley, in the temporary absence of his wife, declares he will confess to her his folly, and on her return is preparing to do so, when Mrs. Fitzalan, with much address, prevents him; and the whole being thrown upon the fictitious 'Captain Walsingham,' this amusing tissue of equivocal concludes."

In the Historical Play of Wallace on Wednesday night, MR. SALTER's general performance, but particularly in the scenes where he (Wallace) is betrayed, and led to execution, was excellent, and loudly applauded; MR. BASS' Douglas was spirited and well conceived; and MRS. M'GIBBON, although labouring under a severe cold, sustained the character of Helen with the best effect.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Lapland.—M. Zetterstedt, the professor of botany at the University of Lund, is about to publish two very interesting works on the natural history of Lapland; the result of personal observations made in a pedestrian excursion in the summer of 1821.

A Tragedy by Mr. Haines, the author of Conscience, has been accepted by Mr. Kemble, and is shortly to appear at Covent Garden.

R. P. Knight has a new poem in the press, entitled Alfred, which will appear next month, in an 8vo. vol.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S.'s wishes shall have our support.—Our correspondent's judgment will lead him to study conciseness, and a familiar style. Colatus must prosecute his mighty reformation by his own exclusive power; at any rate without our interposition.—It is indeed a warfare of pigmy pretension; and, if not precluded by prejudice and presumption, can only be carried on by a toil of an equally liberal, repulsive, and disreputable cast.—The columns of the Iris are devoted to subjects of an infinitely more useful and interesting nature than Clerical Criticisms.

Edwin's muse has chosen an excellent subject, and we like the sentiment, but wish for it in a superior dress.

Alceus is inadmissible; his prolixity is, to us, a very serious objection.—Neither can we approve of his style, which is generally stilted, and frequently unnatural.

REVIEW.

The Bardiad, A Poem; in Two Cantos. By CHARLES BURTON, L. L. B. with copious Critical Notes and Illustrative Selections.

ON reference to page 2 of the Manchester Iris for the present year, will be found a Review of "AN ODE ON THE USE AND ABUSE OF POETRY;"—of this Ode "The Bardiad" is announced as a "SECOND EDITION, with copious Critical Notes and Illustrative Selections."

The justness and perspicuity of our animadversions upon Mr. Burton's "Ode," have produced a most salutary effect; and, although Mr. B. is not only so uncondemned as not to avow the benefits he has derived from our notice, but is also so ungenerous and malignant as to satirize and vilify his best friends,—yet, inasmuch as we find ourselves in good company, and that OUR "logomachy" is only sharing in common with "the splendid sophistry" of DR. JOHNSON, we reserve our own vindication and a glance at the Doctor's "Utopian enterprize" for our next. The task of reviewing Mr. B.'s present poem, and of pointing out the extent to which he has adopted our suggestions, and conformed to the tenor of our strictures and criticism, shall occupy us for the present.

Mr. B.'s design in publishing his "ODE" was to "exhibit the LEGITIMATE and VALUABLE objects of Poetry;" but, he so completely failed, that after quoting ten lines we observed, "We are now obliged to declare that the author has not at all entered into his design," and again, "his address to the reader is so fallacious, as not to be realized, in any, the least degree." We are pleased to see that Mr. B. felt the weight of our objection; and that he has now attempted to remove it. Of course these additions must considerably lengthen his poem; but, we cannot, even now, discover a more intimate acquaintance with the old poets than that which would be obtained from a slight perusal of their Biography and of the "Beauties" which are prepared for the formation of juvenile taste.

The only original part of this volume which possesses merit, is the notice of the Hebrew Poets; we give it without abridgment:—

"Thy Genins, sacred Palestine! demands
The boldest homage that the heart expands.
Apart from inspiration, where can we
Such Poets find as once distinguished thee?
What fields of Fancy shall the gleaner call,
Earth'd with such sublime and beautiful?
See Learning, Genius, Taste, at once unite
What'er the theme on which the prophets write!
Not polish'd Greece, nor proud Imperial Rome,
Can boast such "writings" as thy hallow'd Place.
We need not shrink thy splendid sons to place
Beside the proudest of the classic race;
Their loftier verse had beam'd, in rich display,
A thousand years before e'en Homer's day.
To us, perchance, is lost the flowing line;
But not the grandeur of the thought divine;
This brightens still, with undiminish'd ray,
When changeful sound has lost its measur'd sway.

"What soil Parnassian could more charms combine,
Than sur'd the Bards of ancient Palestine!
Then Carmel's mount and holy Tabor rose;
Rich dew descended like incensive snows;
O'er lofty Lebanon proud cedars wav'd
Lakes slept within, without, the ocean rav'd;
A sky, serenely soft, its mantle threw;
A storm, this storm, the frightful whirlwind blew.
Wells, wealth'd with rine, on Joseph's fruitful plain,
Gardens of olive, fields of golden grain,
Milk, such as stream'd thro' Asher's rich abode,
And humming rocks whence pteuous honey flow'd;
A Holy Plain, by none but Hebrews trod,
With awful symbols of Incumbent God,—
A land where genius might unfetter'd rise,
With high demands its powers to signalize;
Such charms propitious, more than Muses nine,
Might well exult Minstrels such as thine.

Asced from the swiftings of the fruitful Nile,— Cassid and taught in Egypt's regal isle,—

Then forc'd the flock of Midian's Priest to feed,
Till sent of God his chosen tribes to lead,
The reverend Moses, rapt on "holy ground,"
To Hebrew accents gave melodious sound,
Hark! on the margin of that fruitless shore,
His "song" triumphant, Israel's legion's pour!
The flood had closed on Egypt's impious band—
Chariots and horsemen, floating, reached the strand—
Then rose to Heav'n, the exulting hosts among,
The first "Ta Drum" of the Hebrew tongue.

Mysterious Jon, with rich description shows
How awful visions of still midnight rose;
Tells Heaven's remonstrance with short-sighted man,
Who dares his secret purposes to scan:
Himself, exemplifies the worst estate
Hell could inflict, or earth commiserate;
And proves, how justly, to the child of tears,
His greatest blessing is the rod he fears.

With heart in heaven, and with adoring eye,
Fix'd on the glories of the spangled sky:—
In cedar'd forest, far from human gaze,
With joy, exultant, in the courts of praise,
Or banish'd far from Judah's rightful throne,
From Temple distant—exiled—and alone,
The Lyre of David sounds. And, still, the song
Consoles the pilgrim of the Christian throng;
The heart, o'erwhe'd in anxious doubts and fears,
With faith supports, with holy comfort cheers;
Still, to thy lyre, melodious Minstrel-King!
In every church a thousand voices sing.
In thy great Son, the wisest of mankind,
(What'er the subject of his song design'd,)—
Luxuriant fancy's effulgent tide
Flows sweetly on by matchless wisdom's side.

ISAIAH sings:—the desert hears his voice,
The barren wastes of wilderness rejoice,
The harmless wolf with sportive lambskins plays,
The adder stings not, nor the lion slays;
Mountains and forests hail the list'ning skies,
The Heavens are vocal, and the Earth replies.
When spoke the Seer whom we deem'd our own,
The proud Assyrian trembled on his throne;
The people oft, in sad defections found,
His voice relentless, warn'd with awful sound,
To lean no more on Egypt's "broken reed."
But turn to God, their help in times of need.
And, when predicting, the great Prophet show'd,
The Lamb ensanguin'd, and the Blood that flow'd,
With all the splendours, in a countless train,
That mark the progress of Messiah's reign,
Rapt, in the vision, every sentence glow'd
With all the grandeur of the coming God.

Sad JEREMIAH! whom, methinks, I see
Like some lorn spirit of adversity,
Seated, in tears, midst Zion's lov'd remains,
"Lamenting" loud "Chaldees'" galling chains;
Of all the harps that sing of woeful tale,
None breathes with plaintive Elegy like thine.
Sprit of grief! thine head, thine eye appears
A flood of "waters," and a "fount of tears."

Mystic and awful, as the "wheel" he drew,— Dazzling and rapid, as his "seraph" flew,—
The great Ezekiel, Judah's confines shook.
(Whose mould our Ossian and our Dante took.)
Amos, whose herds on bleak Tekoa fed,
The poor man's solace, and the tyrant's dread,
Deign'd not the chastening of his harp to spare,
But woke to strains "the land refused to hear."
Famine and drought on Jotham's page appear,
With pathos equal to Uziah's scer.
When Judah bled with vile Manasse's crime,
The stern HIRAIKUK sang. No more we name.

There are a few beauties in these lines; but there is much bathos.—A slight tincture of Sternhold, and Hopkins, a little of "pensioned Quarles," and rather more of the negative of sense, and of anti-hereditary policy, than Mr. B. will like more explicitly to avow. Of DAVID it is said—

"Or, banish'd far from Judah's rightful throne."

Certainly not his right by birth.

We are told of

"HUMMING rocks, whence plenteous honey flow'd."

And in true mechanical style—

"The great EZEKIEL, Judah's confines shook—

Whose MOULD our Ossian and our Dante took."

Herbert, Crashaw, Waller, Roscommon, Pomfret, West, Parnell, Milton, &c. are complimented as being "English sacred Poets." And many others have equally fanciful distinctions.

The Dramatic Poets are despatched in the following summary and ludicrous manner;—

"Of Dramatists a countless host we find
In every age, of every rank and kind,
From ROVING THESPIAS, with his FACE BESMEAR'D,
Till SHAKESPEARE, greatest of the race, appear'd;
Whose works to scan is not a province mine
Yet, for the last, admit one dutious line!"

"One dutious line" for SHAKESPEARE! Lo! HE turns—
And Burton's praise, with look contemptuous, spurns!
Ungen'rous Critic!—Heart of nerveless tone!
Nature's poor illegitimate, of lone
And grov'ling intellect, 'midst souls that scan
Earth, Heav'n, and all the mazy heart of man!
Dost thou suppose that rage or aid of thine,
Can strip a plume or give a ray divine?
Ah! no; Retire, and teach thy erring soul,
The PROVINCE of her toils—and "BARDIAD" toils control!!

After "Dramatists" we presume not to insult the public with another quotation; but merely observe (as being introductory to an analysis of Mr. B.'s preface, in our next) that the legitimate objects of poetry are now in a manner exhibited; that the preposterous interrogatories to Solitude, Beauty, &c., are a little qualified; that the lines for which we declared a School-boy would be castigated are omitted; that the plagiarism we pointed out is chiefly expunged; that the "patents" the "whilomes," the "wights," the "yburnish'ds," the "yrvish'ds," the "tremendous agony," the "hireling," that was prefixed to critics, &c. &c. are all expunged—and that the Vision of Judgment has also disappeared! The reader will expect that we should congratulate Mr. B. on his openness to conviction; and that we, ourselves, should feel gratified by such a conformity to our strictures; but, what will he say on being informed, that, although this compliable gentleman has so fully admitted our superiority and candour, he has, nevertheless, politely managed to evade an acknowledgement, by fabricating a tissue of declamatory bombast? And this he has presumed to do, when, if possessed of common discernment, he must have been aware that we well knew he was but in his PUPILAGE; and that it was in our power to identify many parts of his poem, by internal, and even less equivocal, evidence, with the taste, pretensions, and characteristics, of one to whom we are no strangers.—And to this hint, we would briefly add, that, although our "author knows that he stands on the platform of Truth and Virtue," we MUST POSITIVELY assure him, that he also "knows" that HE rests on a prop—say, a basis that is adventitious, and of which we know something!

"THE BARDIAD" consists of two Cantos; and is comprised in sixty pages. It is then, with many and copious extracts from the popular poets,—the bible,—and other generally read books,—MODESTLY extended to two hundred and ninety pages,* and sold at a price which affords an inducement that is just about proportionate to the intrinsic excellency of its contents. The poetic and the prose conclusions are such admirable specimens of equivocation, that we are induced to reserve them for our next; in which we shall endeavour to convince this aspiring STUDENT that Dr. Johnson is less a splendid sophist, than Mr. Burton is a presumptuous sciolist and an inconsiderate declaimer.

* That is, SIXTY pages of twenty lines each, and containing about 12000 syllables, are illustrated by TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY pages of notes, averaging twenty five lines each, and containing about eighty-six thousand syllables—making, on every syllable of text, seven syllables of illustration! And these notes the author says are "ONLY SUCH as may tend to illustrate the observations that are made in the course of the Poem."—Here is a Scrupian indeed!—A compilation that out-Valpy's-VALPY!

† The Bardiad, or "Two Cantos" exclusively.

FASHIONABLE EDUCATION.

(From DWIGHT'S "Travels in New York.")

The end proposed by the parents is to make their children objects of admiration. The means, though not sanctioned, are certainly characterised by the end. That I have not mistaken the end may be easily proved by a single resort to almost any genteel company. To such company the children of the family are regularly introduced: and the praise of the guests is administered to them as regularly as the dinner or the tea is served up. Commendation is rung through all its changes: and you may hear, both in concert and succession, "beautiful children;" "what a charming family!" "what a delightful family!" "you are a fine little fellow," "you are a sweet little girl;" "my son, can't you speak one of your pieces before this good company?" "Caroline, where is your work?" "Susan, bring Miss Caroline's work, and show it to that lady:" "Susan, bring with you the picture, which she finished last week:" with many other things of similar nature. Were you to pass a twelvemonth in this country, and to believe all you heard said by people, not destitute of respectability; whatever opinion you might form of the parents, you would suppose that the children were a superior race of beings, both in person and mind: and that beauty, genius, grace, and loveliness had descended to this world in form, and determined to make these States their future residence.

The means of effectuating this darling object are the communication of what are called accomplishments. The children are solicitously taught music, dancing, embroidery, ease, confidence, graceful manners, &c. &c. To these may be added what is called reading and travelling. You may very naturally ask me what I find in these branches of education to complain of. My objection lies, originally to the end which is proposed, and to the direction which it gives to the means; in themselves harmless, and capable of being useful. Children educated in the manner to which I refer, soon learn that the primary end of their efforts, and even of their existence, is appearance only. What they are, they soon discern is of little consequence; but what they appear to be, is of importance inestimable. The whole force of the early mind is directed, therefore, to this object; and exhausted in directing the trifles of which it is composed.

The thoughts of a boy, thus educated, are spent upon the colour, quality, and fashion of his clothes, and upon the several fashions to which his dress is to be successively conformed; upon his bow, his walk, his mode of dancing, his behaviour in company, and his nice observance of the established rules of good breeding. To mingle, without awkwardness or confusion, in that empty, unmeaning chat, those mere vibrations of the tongue, termed fashionable conversation, is the ultimate aim of his eloquence; and to comprehend and to discuss, without impropriety, the passing topics of the day, the chief object of his mental exertions. When he reads, he reads only to appear with advantage in such conversation. When he acts, he acts only to be admired by those who look on. Novels, plays, and other trifles of a similar nature, are the customary subjects of his investigation. Voyages, travels, biography, and sometimes history, limit his severe researches. By such a mind thinking will be loathed, and study regarded with terror. In the pursuits to which it is devoted there is nothing to call forth, to try, or to increase its strength. Its powers, instead of being raised to new degrees of energy, are never exercised to the extent in which they already exist. His present capacity cannot be known for want of trial. What that capacity might become cannot be even conjectured. Destitute of that habit of labouring, which alone can render labour pleasing, or even supportable, he dreads exertion as a calamity. The sight of a classic author gives him a chill: a lesson in Locke, or Euclid, a mental ague.

Thus, in a youth formed perhaps by nature for extensive views and manly efforts, sloth of mind is generated, dandled, and nursed, on the knee of parental indulgence. A soft, luxurious, and sickly character is spread over both the understanding and the affections; which forbids their growth, prevents their vigour, and ruins every hope of future eminence and future worth. The faculties of the mind, like those of the body, acquire strength only by exercise. To attain their greatest strength, both must be exercised daily, and often to the utmost. Had Goliath never exerted the powers of his body, he would have been an infant in strength: had Newton never exerted those of his mind, he would have been an infant in understanding. Genius, in the abstract, is a mere capacity for exertion. This is the gift of nature; and is all that she gives. The utmost of this capacity can never be conjectured, until the mind has in a long continued habitual course made its most vigorous efforts.

If these observations are just, they furnish every parent an easy and sure directory for the intellectual education of his children. If he wishes them to possess the greatest strength of which they are capable, he must induce them to the most vigorous mental exertions. The reading education, which I have described, will never accomplish the purpose. Hard study, a thorough investigation of mathematical science, and a resolute attention to the most powerful efforts of a distinguished logician; in a word, an old-fashioned, rigid, academical education will ever be found indispensable to the youth who is destined to possess mental greatness.

On girls, this unfortunate system induces additional evils. Miss, the darling of her father and the pride of her mother, is taught from the beginning to regard her dress as a momentous concern. She is instructed in embroidery merely that she may finish a piece of work, which from time to time is to be brought out, to be seen, admired, and praised by visitors; or framed and hung up in the room, to be still more frequently seen, admired, and praised. She is taught music, only that she may perform a few times, to excite the same admiration and applause for her skill on the piano-forte. She is taught to draw, merely to finish a picture, which, when richly framed and ornamented, is hung up, to become an altar for the same incense. Do not misunderstand me. I have no quarrel with these accomplishments. So far as they contribute to make the subject of them more amiable, useful, or happy, I admit their value. It is the employment of them, which I censure; the sacrifice made by the parent, of his property and his child at the shrine of vanity.

The reading of girls is regularly lighter than that of boys. When the standard of reading for boys is set too low, that for girls will be proportionally lowered. Where boys investigate books of sound philosophy, and labour in mathematical and logical pursuits, girls read history, the higher poetry, and judicious discourses in morality and religion. When the utmost labour of boys is bounded by history, biography, and the pamphlets of the day, girls sink down to songs, novels, and plays.

Of this reading what, let me ask, are the consequences? By the first novel which she reads, she is introduced into a world literally new; a middle region between "this spot which men call earth," and that which is formed in Arabian Tales. Instead of houses, inhabited by mere men, women, and children, she is presented with a succession of splendid palaces, and gloomy castles inhabited by tenants half human and half angelic, or haunted by downright fiends. Every thing in the character and circumstances of these beings comes at the wish or the call of the enchanter. Whatever can supply their wants, suit their wishes, or forward, or frustrate their designs, is regularly at hand. The heroes are as handsome, as dignified, as brave, as generous, as affectionate, as faithful, and as accomplished as he supposes will satisfy the demands of his readers. At the same time, they have always a quantum sufficient of money; or, if not, some relation dies at the proper time, and leaves them an ample supply. Every heroine is also a compound of all that is graceful and lovely. Her person is fashioned "by the hand of harmony." Her complexion outvies the snow, and shames the rose. Her features are such as Milton's Eve might envy; and her mind is of the same class with those refined beings, to whom this great poet, in his list of the celestial orders, gives the elegant name of Virtues. With these delightful inhabitants of Utopia are contrasted iron-banded misers, profligate guardians, traitorous servants, and bags, not excelled by those of Lapland itself. It ought not to be omitted, that in this sequestered region the fields and gardens are all second-hand copies of paradise. On them, wherever it is convenient, the morning beams with every tint of elegance, and every ray of glory: and, when Aurora has no further use for these fine things, her sister Evening puts them on herself, and appears scarcely less splendid, or less delightful.

With this ideal world the unfortunate girl corresponds so much, and so long, that she ultimately considers it as her own proper residence. With its inhabitants she converses so frequently, and so habitually, that they become almost her only familiar acquaintance.

But she must one day act in the real world. What can she expect, after having gazed so long in novels, but that fortunes, and villas, and Edens, will spring up every where in her progress through life, to promote her enjoyment. She has read herself into a heroine, and is fairly entitled to all the appendages of this character. If her imagination may be trusted, she is to be romantically rich and romantically happy. The mornings which dawn upon her are ever to be bright, the days serene, and the evenings fragrant and delightful. In a word, the curse pronounced upon mankind, as to her is, to lose its gloomy influence, and sorrow and toil are to fly from the path in which she chooses to walk through life.

With these views, how disappointed must she be by the rugged course of nature! How untoward must be the progress of facts! How coarsely must the voice of truth grate upon her ear! How disgusted must she be to find herself surrounded—not by trusty Johns, and faithful Chloes, but by ordinary domestics, chilling her with rusticity, provoking her by their negligence, insulting her with their impudence, and leaving her service without even giving her warning. Must she not feel, that it is a kind of impertinence in the days to be cloudy and wet, in the nights to be dark and chilly, in the streets to encumber her with mud, or choke her with dust, and in the prospects to present nothing but the mere vulgar scenes of this vulgar world.

The very food which she eats, (for eat she must,) will disgust her by its coarse unlikeness to the viands on which her imagination has so often feasted. Her friends, even those most intimately connected with her, will lose all the amiableness with which they are invested by natural affection, because they differ so grossly in their persons, manners, and opinions, from the fee forms of fancy, and from the poetical minds, whose residence is a novel or a song. In a word, the world will become to her a solitude; and its inhabitants strangers: because her taste for living has become too refined, too dainty, to relish any thing found in real life.

If she is at all pleasing and amiable, she will be addressed. But by whom? Not by a Corydon, a Strephon, or even a Grandison. At the best, her suitor will be a being formed of flesh and blood, who intends to live by business, and to acquire reputation by diligence, integrity, and good sense. He is in pursuit of a wife, and therefore can hardly wish for an angel. It will be difficult for him to believe that a being so exalted would assume the marriage vow, do the honours of his table, direct the business of his family, or preside over the education of his children. He has hitherto spent his life, perhaps, in acting vigorously in the counting-room, contending strenuously at the bar, or pursuing with diligence some other business merely human. How can such a being frame his mouth to lisp the pretty things which alone can be in unison with so delicate an ear? Figure to yourself the disgust, the pain, the surprise of this silken existence, even at the most refined language of honesty, and at the most honorable sentiments of affection, obtruded on her by such a suitor.

Should some man of art and mischief happen to think the conquest worth obtaining, how easily might she become a victim to the very accomplishments in which she considers all excellence as involved!

Besides, this life is always, in some degree, a season of suffering and sorrow. In what manner can our heroine encounter either? To patience and fortitude she has from her infancy been a stranger; with religion she is unacquainted. Principles such as religion approves, she has none. This world has daily blasted all her expectations: with the future world she has not begun a connexion. Between the Bible and novels there is a gulph fixed, which few novel readers are willing to pass. The consciousness of virtue, the dignified pleasure of having performed our duty, the serene remembrance of a useful life, the hope of an interest in the Redeemer, and the promise of a glorious inheritance in the favour of God, are never found in novels; and of course have never been found by her. A weary, distressed, bewildered voyager amid the billows of affliction, she looks around her in vain, to find a pilot, a pole-star, or a shore.

Under the influence of this education, persons of both sexes also are in extreme danger of becoming a voluntary prey to the modern philosophy, and to the principles of enchantment and perdition which it so successfully holds out to minds destitute of sound principle and defensive prudence. Unaccustomed to think, they are pleased to find others willing to think for them. Unaccustomed to reason, their minds will be perplexed by every argument advanced against their opinions. The admission of truth, the comprehension of good sense, requires the toil of sober, vigorous thought. The admission of fiction, and of philosophical, as truly as of poetical fiction, demands nothing but the luscious indulgence of fancy. To a soft and dainty mind, a taste fascinated by mental luxury, how much more congenial is the latter employment than the former. How improbable is it, how hopeless, that such a mind can fail to reject the dictates of sober truth and sound understanding; and from a self-indulgence, by habit rendered indispensable, imbibe the wretched doctrines created by the philosophers of the present day! How improbable it is, that any mind which has once imbibed these doctrines can escape from absolute ruin!

I know that this education is expressly attempted with a view to superior refinement: but it is not a refinement of the taste, the understanding, or the heart. It is merely a refinement of the imagination—of an imagination already soft and sickly; of a sensibility already excessive; of a relish already fastidious. To a genuine perfection of taste it bears no more resemblance than the delicate white of decay to the native fairness of complexion; or than the blush of a hectic to the bloom of health.

It is not here intended, that this mode of education prevails more in Boston than in other populous places on this continent; perhaps it prevails less. That it actually exists in such places, that it is fashionable, and that this town has a share in the evil, will not, I believe, be questioned. I have taken this occasion to enter my protest against it. In every part of it the dictates of common sense are laid aside: that which is of the least importance is most regarded, and that which is of the greatest most forgotten. To enable children to appear with such fashionable advantages as to gain admiration and applause, is the sole concern. To enable them to be what they ought to be—wise, virtuous, and useful—is left out of the system. The mind, instead of being educated, is left to the care of accident and fashion. Dress, manners, and accomplishments, are placed under expensive masters, and regulated with extreme solicitude. With this education, what can a son, or a daughter become? Not a man, nor a woman; but a well-dressed bundle of accomplishments. Not a blessing, nor an heir of immortality; but a fribble, or a doll.

HATIANA, OR LOOSE REMARKS ON HATS AND HEADS.

(FROM THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

The hat, the hat! that crowning tegument of our dress, is, I think, much more frequently indicative of the qualities, propensities, situation, &c. of the wearer of it, than any thing else. It has been long said, that—

"The wisdom's in the wig;"

and, as far as the remark applies to judges, counsellors, doctors of divinity, king's coachmen, and a few other great men, it is a very good one; but, in the absence of a knowledge of physiognomy, and craniology (that lump and bump system), neither of which do I profess to know much about, give me the system or science of Hatiana, whereby the adepts in it know, even if following a man, and when "the human face divine" is invisible to them, what sort of person he is who bears it on his pate. Indeed, if you saw the hat itself hung upon a pole or peg, you might decide almost to a certainty as to the owner of it. Some hatters have attempted (and in a few cases succeeded) to make the hat so as to suit the character of the wearer; but I think the hat oftener assumes a new shape, and assimilates itself, gradually, to the head, &c. of the possessor of it. Now to the proof.

If you see a hat "all tattered and torn," with a piece out of the brim here and there, and the crown beat in, or sewn on with a bit of pack-thread; it requires no prophetic power to declare the wearer of it to be some poor wretched outcast, who, rather than be quite bare-headed, has robbed some stick, set up in a corn-field or gardener's ground to scare the birds, of its highest appendage; thus leaving the crows to sport and riot unmolested, or at all events unalarmed, on the losses of the poor farmer.

As a complete opposite to this, you see a hat as sleek and as new-looking as if just from the maker's, without a hair out of its place, the brim unbent, the edges unworn, the ribbon and buckle all precisely even and in order; who can doubt for a moment that it is an old bachelor's hat; it looks placid, quiet, snug, even sly, like the owner of it; and seems to say, as he would, "don't touch me."

I dread to say, that a very greasy round hat, though kept otherwise clean, is too apt to belong to some poor author, more likely a poet than any thing else, and it seems to say that neither its owner nor itself are any longer nappy; much might be said about this sort of hat and its wearers, but it is an awful subject, and I will quit the theme.

If you see, towards nine or ten in the evening, a smart chapeau bras flitting along the street, with a form under it dressed in black, you may depend it is some young fellow gliding away to a ball, who has paid a hatter half-a-crown for his head-ornament for the evening, and who cannot well afford to hide himself in a hackney-coach, but yet is ashamed to be seen on foot; perhaps there may be a gold-loop in his hat; if so, he is Captain Somebody, till the next morning finds him at his desk.

Now and then you meet with the real old three-cornered cocked hat, the true and original Egham, Staines, and Windsor (formerly so nicknamed from the triangular situation of those towns), but its visits to us are like those of angels,

"Short and far between;"

and it is universally the mark of an old pensioner, or of some old gentleman born about the year 1740, and who mounted just such a hat when he was first breeched, and who is now determined to part with his cocked hat but with his life. The present rising generation would hardly believe, that about fifty or sixty years ago, all the hats worn were of that shape, even to the little boys, and a man in a round hat would then have been hooted.

The broad-brimmed low-crowned hat generally gives token of a Quaker,—I beg pardon, a friend—but there are a few queer, quaint, formal chaps, who assume the same sort of covering for their crowns; and when you see such a hat upon a head where the sad-coloured suit is not to be observed beneath it, set down the wearer as a man who wishes to be thought either wiser or better than his neighbours, perhaps both; but who, it is quite likely, is neither. Perhaps this might be called the hypocritical hat.

The extremely oval hat, whose rim is drawn into the segment of a circle on each side, seems to indicate the long-headed man; which head I take to be very different from that of the counsellor's, whose wig-maker grinned amazingly when measuring him for that awful thing, a two-tailed peruke; and upon being asked the reason, said that the learned gentleman's head was just as thick as it was long.

I hardly know what sort of hat can be said to designate the really thick headed and stupid man, except it be that which you now and then see, standing upon the top of some ponderous noddle, perfectly circular in the crown, and as perfectly straight and unbent in the rim, which stands out as regularly all round, as if it had just been ironed.

The white hat in summer-time, covers the head either of a country-gentleman, a coachman, or a sporting flash-man, who would give you more slang in five minutes, than you would understand in five months, unless with the aid of Grose's Dictionary of the vulgar tongue, or that of some other slang lexicographer.

I shall now only name one other hat as indicative of any peculiarity of character, and that is the well-thumbed one; being bent up on the right side of the brim, by constant compression between the thumb and fingers of some adept at making a how; and I generally suspect such a man of being a genteel beggar, and if he is a courtier, he will have thumbed his hat in begging a place from the crown; or if a shabby plebeian, in begging for half-a-crown.

I could almost fill your paper with a great variety more, but I will have mercy on your readers, as well as yourself, for the rest are principally nondescripts, and therefore could only be guessed at. But there are two or three modes of wearing hats, that I will just name, as being tolerably explanatory of the character of the wearers, such is the hat shoved off the forehead; the man who does this is either a hot-headed choleric man or a star-gazer: and the hat sunk over the eyes as clearly marks a sloven, or one who is ashamed or afraid of being recognized: the last is the hat lifted, or cocked, on one side, which is sure to belong to a dandy, or would-be-buck.

I have purposely avoided saying any thing about the clerical, magisterial, or official hat; having too much respect for the powers that be, to affront even a beadle or a street-keeper.

LOUISA.

Louisa's charms are quickly known,
To ev'ry heart (except her own);
Her blushing beauty, sweetly speaks
A language pure affection wakes;
Creating in the feeling breast
A sense of beauty sweetly drest.

So lovely nature's fragrant rose,
Unconscious of its beauty blows;
And though its virtues so prevail,
And sweeten ev'ry passing gale,
Yet to its still sequester'd shade
'Twould cling—for peace and beauty made!

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

One evening, beneath a lofty myrtle-tree, the beautiful Amaryllis was lamenting the death of a nightingale. She said, Sweetest tears have fallen with the touching close of its delicious tones: I felt the music creep along my nerves, and the fine vibrations play through my heart. I weep now, Lycidas, when I think such a charming sadness may never again give delightful tears.

Ah! that I could recal thy nightingale into existence, as I did thy drowned lamb! exclaimed the amiable youth.

Thou never canst, dear companion! it breathed a long and dying fall, like the gentle airs, moving the tops of the hollow reeds, making a moaning melody.

Studious to charm his beloved with the voice of the nightingale, the thoughts of Lycidas produced a sleepless night: the next day he gave Amaryllis the care of his goats, and promised an early return. The sun declined, and Lycidas returned not. Amaryllis sighed at its farewell beam. She sat, her head reclining on her arm. Suddenly aerial notes floated in soft remote sounds. The startled Amaryllis exclaimed—The air sings in the clouds! The notes seemed approaching to her. She looked up at the myrtle-tree. They warbled more musically clear. She perceived Lycidas: he held something in his hands to his lips—Hast thou found another nightingale? (Lycidas replied but by the accents of his harmonious mouth.) What miracle is this! Canst thou give a vocal voice to a hollow reed?—Yes, (replied Lycidas,) it was thou who didst instruct me: Thou didst resemble the voice of the nightingale to the light AIRS breathing on the hollow REEDS. All day I wandered for a nightingale, and I found none: I took a reed, and made little entrances for my breath: I said, Oh, gentle reed! I can give thee AIR, if thou canst yield me the VOICE of the nightingale: I BREATHED, and it was MUSIC!

This first of flutes was their most valued acquisition, for it bestowed a new pleasure; and in the solitude of lovers, pleasure is their only avarice. Lycidas, gradually modulating his reed by his ear, perceived the successive sounds of MELODY, and, at length, the concords of HARMONY; but often, weary with trying musical sounds, the eyes of Amaryllis fired his soul, and the rapt enthusiast, tender or gay at such moments, made his lively inflections, and variety of accent imitate their sensations and echo their passions.* Such was the progress of INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC!

As they wept or laughed, they marvelled how the air, through a hollow reed, could speak more persuasively to their hearts, than their own voices; they knew not that the imitations of Art please more than nature herself. When Lycidas played, Amaryllis could not sit still, and her gestures corresponded with the passions he inspired. Was Amaryllis capricious? Lycidas breathed a long dissolving strain; sounds associated in her mind with ideas of tenderness; her ear arrested her steps, and silenced her tongue; while the sweetness of her physiognomy melted in the dew of her eye, and expressed itself in many a passionate attitude. Was Amaryllis plunged in the softest melancholy? Aerial tones, rapid and voluble, vibrated around; till, stealing the sense of thought from the pensive beauty, they broke into gay melodies; while, responsive to their cheerful influence, her light footsteps gave what Lycidas termed, the music to the eye: and such was the origin of THEATRICAL DANCE!—D'Israeli's Origin of the Fine Arts.

* Such is imitative music, which, says Rousseau, expresses all passions, paints all pictures, represents all objects, and subjects all Nature herself to its skilful imitations; and thus conveys to the heart of men those sentiments proper to touch and to agitate.

COGGESHALL FACETIÆ.

1. Some inhabitants not liking the situation of their church, and being unable to afford the expense of pulling it down and building another, resolved to attempt to remove it entire. Some dozen stout labourers were hired to shove it to the desired site. Before they commenced their operations, they pulled off their jackets and laid them down, to mark how far they were to move the church; they then went to the other side and set to work. Meantime their clothes were stolen. After shoving for some time, they went to the other side to see what progress they had made, and finding their clothes gone, they said it was a pity they had not left off sooner, as they had shoved the church too far, and covered their clothes.

2. A man having received from Colchester some red herrings as a present, was so pleased with them, that he sent for a bushel to stock his pond.

3. A gentleman having received some oysters, ordered his cook to send them up for supper. She served up the shells nicely washed. Being asked what she had done with the oysters, she replied that she had only gutted them.

4. Another, who had received a barrel of oysters, paved his court-yard with them, in various devices, of circles, stars, &c.

5. One who had planted French beans, watched anxiously to see them shoot; but perceiving the beans appear above the ground, he conceived he had planted them the wrong end downwards, and accordingly took them up and reversed them.

6. A countryman returning home one evening, saw the reflection of the moon in a pond; he immediately gave the alarm that the moon had fallen into the water. The peasants, with their long rakes, proceeded to get it out; but when they had disturbed the water, they said they had unfortunately broken the moon to pieces, and it would be useless to proceed in their operations, as they never should be able to put all those fragments together.

7. One sent his servant to buy cherries, charging him to bring very large ones; the man bringing them much smaller than he expected, he eat them with spectacles on, that he might fancy they were large.

8. A good housewife having received a pound of coffee, boiled it, and served it up with parsley and butter. She declared they were the very worst peas she had ever seen, as she had boiled them for hours, and yet they remained quite hard.

9. Another boiled a pound of tea, and served up the leaves like spinach, throwing the water away.

10. The moat of a neighbouring manor-house being to be drained, the fish were advertised for sale. Some inhabitants of Coggeshall, who attended the sale, were met on their return, with their carts heavily laden, fagging up a steep hill. From the inquiries made of them by a citizen of Colchester who met them, it appeared, that intending to buy some of the fish, they had providently taken tubs full of water to put them in; and that, though they did not buy any, they were returning with their tubs still full, without thinking to relieve their horses, which were sinking with fatigue.

11. Their crops having failed one year, for want of warmth, they selected certain barns, which they set wide open on a very hot day, when the sun was in full lustre, and then very carefully closed them, to preserve a stock of sunshine against a time of need.—Lit. Gaz.

We have been favoured with a copy of the following interesting and pathetic Poem, in MS. by our esteemed correspondent, S. X.; and as we understand there is another Poem, entitled "Female Celibacy," written in the same measure, by the Author of the "Bachelor's Soliloquy," if S. X. will also favour us with a correct copy of that Poem, we have no doubt it will prove a very acceptable present to our readers.—Eo.]

THE BACHELOR'S SOLILOQUY,

ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF HIS BIRTH-DAY.

Let youthful lovers fondly greet,
With song and dance, their natal day;
Let them in jovial circles meet,
And laugh their lightsome hours away:
But mine, alas!
Must sadly pass,
With no kind congratulations blest;
Mine but excites the silent tear
That now another, lonely year
Hath followed all the rest!

And whither, whither are they flown?
What traces have they left behind?
What transports can I call my own?
What social bosom can I find?

I view the past,
And stand aghast;
How much, alas! of life's short span!
And Memory cries, as thus I gaze,
"Where are thy friends of former days;
Thou solitary man!"

Some, bless'd of heaven, and timely wise,
Are link'd in Hymen's silken bands;—
Have learnt "Heaven's last, best gift" to prize,
And join'd with hers their willing hands:

With fond embrace
Each grief they chase,
Whatever ill their steps betide;
And hand in hand they sweetly stray
Through life's perplex'd and thorny way,
With truest love their guide.

Some seek their Country's banner'd plain,
And fearless dare the hostile fray;
And some, the growing love of gain
Hath lured to foreign lands away;
And some, indeed,
Whose names I read
Engraved on many a mossy stone,
Were early number'd with the dead.
Thus all, their different ways have sped,—
And left me here, alone!

They say that my unfeeling breast
Ne'er felt Love's pleasing, anxious smart;—
Was ne'er with doubts and fears oppress'd,
Nor sigh'd to win a woman's heart.

And let them say
Whatever they may;
I heed not censure now, nor praise:
I could not ask a lovely maid
To seek with me the lowly shade;—
I hoped for brighter days.

Yes;—I have felt that hallow'd flame
That burns with constant, chaste desire;
I too have cherished, long, a name
That set my youthful breast on fire!
But Hope's sweet smiles,
And 'witching wiles,
Beguiled my heart of every pain;
And I have slept in her soft bowers,
Till now, of life's last, lingering hours,
How few, alas, remain!

Ah! now her fairy reign is past,—
 For youth's warm raptures now are o'er;
 Those visions all, too bright to last,
 Of love and joy, can charm no more!
 Some little toys,—
 Some puny joys,
 To wear life's listless calm away;
 Then near some old, neglected stone,
 Unwept, unnoticed, and unknown,—
I yield the worm its prey!

Then come, whatever ills await,
 Though age sits hoary on my brow,
 I care not for the frowns of fate!
 And poverty, I scorn thee now.
 I shall not see,
 Obscured by thee,
 Fair lovely woman's charms decay!—
 Have I no tie to keep me here?
 Not one!—Why then, without a tear,
I yield the worm its prey.

NATURAL HISTORY.

RATTLE SNAKES.

They are numerous through the country, but particularly high up on the Missouri, and on the White and St. Francis rivers. Two species are met with: the black is from three to four feet long, disproportionately thick, exceedingly venomous in its bites, and slow in its movements; it lives mostly on the low and wet lands. The other is black, and yellow spotted, grows sometimes to the length of seven or eight feet, but its poison is not so venomous as that of the former. It is found on the dry prairies and rocky grounds. They both live to a very great age; that is, if it be a fact that they annually acquire a new process to their rattles. I once met with one that had upwards of 90 of these annular cells attached to its tail. When alarmed the young ones, which are generally eight or ten in number, retreat into the mouth of the parent, and re-appear on its giving a contractile muscular token that the danger is passed. Towards the close of the summer, they become in appearance partially blind; their ability to move is diminished, and their bite, if possible, more deadly. The Indians erroneously ascribe this difference in its habits and character, to a diffusion of the inordinately secreted poison through its system. The common black, copper-head, and spotted swamp snakes, never fail, I believe, to engage with, and destroy them, whenever they meet, which, together with the hostility that exists between the two species, prevents an increase that would otherwise render the country almost uninhabitable.

When the two species fight, it is by coiling and striking at each other; they frequently miss in their aim, or rather, avoid each other's fangs by darting simultaneously in a direction different from the approaching blow. When one is bitten, it amounts to a defeat, and it instantly retreats for a watering place, at which, should it arrive in time, it slakes its thirst, swells, and dies. I have witnessed the effects of the poison on their own bodies, or on those of the antagonistic species, in several instances, and have never known one that was bitten to recover, notwithstanding the generally prevailing opinion to the contrary, that such instinctively resort to efficient antidotes. The other hostile snakes grasp their necks between their teeth, wring round, and strangle them.

The Indians know nothing about the charming powers of this, or any other snake; they believe the rattles are designed to alarm their enemies, and terrify such animals as they are accustomed to prey on. The latter, no doubt, is the fact, whatever the former may be; because, whenever they fix their piercing eyes on a bird, squirrel, &c. they commence and keep up an incessant rattling noise, until the animal, convulsed by fear, approaches within the reach of its formidable enemy, and sometimes into its very jaws. This, however, is not always the result, for I have repeatedly seen animals thus agitated, and in imminent danger, make their escape without any intervention in their favour, except the recovery of their own powers.—Hunter.

THE CABINET.

PECULIARITIES OF DR. JOHNSON.

(By Sir W. Scott.)

Of all the men distinguished in this or any other age, Dr. Johnson has left upon posterity the strongest and most vivid impression, so far as person, manners, disposition, and conversation are concerned. We do but name him, or open a book which he has written, and the sound and action recal to the imagination at once, his form, his merits, his peculiarities, nay, the very unsmoothness of his gestures, and the deep impressive tone of his voice. We learn not only what he said, but how he said it; and have, at the same time, a shrewd guess of the secret motive why he did so, and whether he spoke in sport or in anger, in the desire of conviction, or for the love of debate. It was said of a noted wag, that his bon-mots did not give full satisfaction when published, because he could not print his face. But with respect to Dr. Johnson, this has been in some degree accomplished; and, although the greater part of the present generation never saw him, yet he is, in our mind's eye, a personification as lively as that of Siddons in Lady Macbeth, or Kemble in Cardinal Wolsey.

When we consider the rank which Dr. Johnson held, not only in literature, but in society, we cannot help figuring him to ourselves as the benevolent giant of some fairy tale, whose kindnesses and courtesies are still mingled with a part of the rugged ferocity imputed to the fabulous sons of Anak; or rather, perhaps, like a Roman Dictator, fetched from his farm, whose wisdom and heroism still relished of his rustic occupation. And there were times when, with all his wisdom and all his wit, this rudeness of disposition, and the sacrifices and submissions which he unsparringly exacted, were so great, that even Mrs. Thrale seems at length to have thought that the honour of being Johnson's hostess was almost counterbalanced by the tax which he exacted on her time and patience.

Johnson's laborious and distinguished career terminated in 1783, when virtue was deprived of a steady supporter, society of a brilliant ornament, and literature of a successful cultivator. The latter part of his life was honoured with general applause, for none was more fortunate in obtaining and preserving the friendship of the wise and the worthy. Thus loved and venerated, Johnson might have been pronounced happy. But Heaven, in whose eyes strength is weakness, permitted his faculties to be clouded occasionally with that morbid affection of the spirits, which disgraced his talents by prejudices, and his manners by rudeness.

The cause of those deficiencies in temper and manners, was no ignorance of what was fit to be done in society, or how far each individual ought to suppress his own wishes in favour of those with whom he associates; for, theoretically, no man understood the rules of good breeding better than Dr. Johnson, or could act more exactly in conformity with them, when the high rank of those with whom he was in company for the time required that he should do so. But during the greater part of his life, he had been in a great measure a stranger to the higher part of society, in which such restraint became necessary; and it may be fairly presumed, that the indulgence of a variety of little selfish peculiarities, which it is the object of good breeding to suppress, became thus familiar to him. The consciousness of his own mental superiority in most companies which he frequented, contributed to his dogmatism; and when he had attained his eminence as a dictator in literature, like other potentates, he was not averse to a display of his authority: resembling in this particular Swift, and one or two other men of genius, who have had the bad taste to imagine that their talents elevated them above observance of the common rules of society. It must be also remarked, that in Johnson's time the literary society of London was much more confined than at present, and that he sat the Jupiter of a little circle, prompt, on the slightest contradiction, to launch the thunders of rebuke and sarcasm. He was, in a word, despotic, and despotism will occasionally lead the best dispositions into unbecoming abuse of power. It is not likely that any one will again enjoy, or have an opportunity of abusing, the singular degree of submission which was rendered to Johnson by all around him. The unreserved communications of friends, rather than the spleen of enemies, have occasioned his character being exposed in all its shadows, as well as its lights. But those, when summed and counted, amount only to a few narrow-minded prejudices concerning country and party, from which few ardent tempers remain free, and some violence and solecisms in manners, which left his talents, morals, and benevolence, alike unimpeachable.

ALARM OF FIRE GIVEN BY A MONKEY.

A short time ago the inmates of a house in Hatton-court, Holborn, had a very narrow escape from being burnt to death by a fire, which broke out in the front parlour, occupied by some Italians, who go about with dancing monkeys. Six or seven persons slept in the room, and the monkey was chained to the bed-post; on their going to bed, one of the women hung some linen to dry; the linen caught fire, and nearly the whole of the bed clothes were burnt, when the dreadful cries of the monkey, and his endeavours to pull his master out of bed, at length awoke him; all the inmates got up, and the fire was put out by a few dozen pails of water; the floor and furniture were nearly destroyed, together with most of their wearing apparel; and some of those who slept in the room were nearly suffocated.

DR. JOHNSON ON CRITICISM.

"Before Criticism," says the doctor, "departed from the earth, to accompany her patroness, Astrea, back into heaven, she broke her sceptre; of which the shivers that formed the ambrosial end were caught up by Flattery, and those that had been infected with the waters of Lethe, were, with equal haste, siezed by Malevolence. The followers of Flattery, to whom she distributed her part of the sceptre, nor had nor desired light, but touched indiscriminately whatever power or interest happened to exhibit. The companions of Malevolence were supplied by the Furies with a torch, which had this quality peculiar to infernal lustre, that its light fell only upon faults."

'No light, but rather darkness visible,
 Served only to discover sights of woe.'

"With the fragments of authority, the slaves of Flattery and Malevolence marched out, at the command of their mistress, to confer immortality, or condemn to oblivion. But the sceptre had now lost its power; and Time passed his sentence at leisure, without any regard to their determinations."

EXTRAORDINARY PORTRAIT.—"Shaffon Paca was, indeed, ugly beyond all parallel: she was of Egyptian origin; yet her countenance was not of simple Egyptian ugliness, but seemed to exhibit a characteristic mark of every original nation. Her legs appeared to have been put together by mistake; the right one being considerably shorter and thicker than the other. She was corpulent; and her eyes, which saw even more than other eyes can see, never looked in the same direction. She had, besides, the peculiar power, like the chameleon, of fixing the one upon an object while the other turned leisurely round, as if seeking for somewhat else. In her voluble conversation no idea was distinct. It seemed as if an endless memory, stored with the beginnings and endings of all that ever had been, was running over the heads and hints of what she wished to express. Learning appeared to have overpowered her; she had dabbled in metaphysics until it was hardly possible to understand what she meant, and she was continually misquoting passages in the dead languages. Under these circumstances it is not much to be wondered at that Ada Reis could not bear to converse with her: indeed from the first he had spoken to her with such extreme harshness, that the fright into which he had thrown her increased, to the greatest degree, the confusion of her ideas, and consequently the natural tediousness of her discourse. In his first interview he asked her a few questions concerning education; and as he knew that there is a great deal to be said upon that subject, he was not surprised that she took much time and many words to answer. But though not surprised, he was fatigued; and in order to get rid of her, he sent for the child, and delivered her into her hands: for it is a common practice to condemn children to the society of those with whom parents cannot endure even for a moment to associate.—Ada Reis.

AN IRISH WAKE.

Some months ago, during a residence in the south of Ireland, I was frequently the guest of an Irish cabin during the singular ceremony of "waking the dead," as it is termed; and on one occasion in particular, I beheld it in all its native purity, in a village in the neighborhood of Cork.

The village of Blarney is celebrated in the history of Ireland; it was formerly the seat of war; and its proud castle, still one of the most perfect in the country, bears many a mark of the besiegers' cannon, which, like the scars on a warrior's forehead, tell the story of its "hair-breadth 'scapes." Its present attraction consists in the far-famed Blarney-stone, which, if once kissed by living lips, gives the power that Irishmen are allowed to possess so eminently, of saying fine things, or, in other words, of lying with a good grace. This stone, which is believed to have existed and retained its charm for ages, is placed conspicuously on the tower of the castle, but, in consequence of recent alterations, is now so situated as to render very dangerous any attempt to touch it; very few, therefore, are found willing to risk their necks, even for its miraculous influence. So that, of latter days, scarcely any have "kissed the Blarney-stone;" and this may account for the lamentable deterioration of our neighbours of the sister country from the gallantry of their ancestors, the O'Callaghans and O'Brallaghams of other years, who, when exhibited on the boards of our theatres, serve but to expose the failings of their degenerate children, who are indeed but the shadows of those heroes of the olden time. The Blarney-stone is however still pointed out to the longing eyes, and still more longing lips, of visitors to Blarney Castle.

In one of the cottages of Blarney, the villagers were assembling to take their last look at a neighbor's corpse, an old man who had died the day before; and the call had gone forth to summon them to "the wake." They were gathering, by degrees, around the house, some with melancholy and others with cheerful countenances, but all preserving a deep silence, which seemed to promise only an evening of gloom. The men were dressed in their best, their sky-blue jackets and breeches, and they had not forgotten their constant companions, the long cloaks, to which so many qualities have been attributed, both for peace and war. The women had also robes of a similar description; many had the large hood drawn over the face, so as intirely to conceal it; and this, together with the deep shade of the garments, nearly allied to black, gave a very mournful cast to the assembly.

In the room where lay the dead, the spectators were sitting silently on the ground; a few women were standing near the corpse, and the air of abstraction, and the swinging to and fro of the head only, denoted the deep sorrow of those whose features were completely enveloped in their large cloaks. The dead man lay in his coffin, on a table covered with white linen; flowers were plentifully strewn on it; at the head were placed three mould candles, and a plate of salt was laid on the body. The whiskey had began to circulate, but not yet in sufficient quantity to dissipate the gloom which appeared to spread over the whole party. In a few moments after the room had filled, the women who were near the corpse commenced the funereal cry, or the keening, as it is called, which consisted in a lengthened "ul-la-gone," and, at times, "O yea, O yea, Paddy, O yea." This continued for about ten minutes, the keeners occasionally clasping their hands and striking their foreheads; then the sounds of mourning ceased, and the women mingled among the group. The talisman of a magician could not have wrought a greater change. The transition from wailing to merriment was instantaneous; the corpse lay neglected, and the visitors seemed to have forgotten altogether the purpose for which they had assembled, in the quick and plentiful circulation of the whiskey punch. Yet now and then I heard a few passing remarks on the dead man, mingled with observations of a very different nature. "There 'll be nine masses said for his soul, any how; and Father O'Donoghue, honest man, 'll give him the worth of his money." It may be well to observe that the generality of the Irish take especial care, on the death-bed, to leave money for masses; and this is not unfrequently the subject of much bargaining, or huttering, as the phrase is, with the holy father. On one occasion, a gentleman ordered his executors to pay for so many masses, and as they could not find a priest in Ireland to do the job sufficiently cheap, they actually transmitted the sum to Portugal, where they purchased the repose of the poor man's soul on more reasonable terms.

In a short time another set of keeners had arranged themselves round the corpse, and their deep and long "ul-la-gone" was echoed from various parts of the room. When their lungs became tired, they took their seats, and enjoyed with the rest the tobacco, whiskey, and snuff, of which there was no lack, while some old crones were preparing the meal of bacon, cribeens, potatoes, &c. Apart from the rest, a group of young men and maidens had got together, little heeding the solemnity of the occasion; and it was only by gazing at times on the pale face of the dead, that I was myself reminded of it.

Among the medley of merry mourners, I noticed one who was sitting on the table beside the corpse; her head was bent almost to her knees. I noticed her because she had taken part neither in the gaiety nor the loud mourning of the rest, and because she formed a strange contrast to those around her. Now and then, when the noise of the guests became most loud, she would turn and gaze with an air of disapprobation, and then relapse into her apparent apathy. While the party were enjoying themselves with supper, I found an opportunity of asking her, in a tone of commiseration, if she were not some relation to the dead man. "'Tis my father, sir," she replied; "that's my husband's father: he's far away now, over the salt seas, and 'tis little he thinks the poor old man's a corpse this night. He was a good father, sir, and I'd never want, nor my childer, if God left him to me; but 'tis God's will." Again the sound of the keeners grew loud, and I left them to their mourning, and their merriment. Such is an Irish wake.—Museum.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

"I say he was a Tartar," said an old Pensioner, turning round the quadrangle of the building—"I say he was a Tartar." "Then you're mistaken, Harry; he was a lad who did his duty, and saw that every one did theirs."—"I allow that he was strict, but always a sailor's friend," replied his companion. "Aye, aye, tarring a rope's end, or rope's-ending a tar, 'twas all the same to him; his cats were oft-n fed, Tom."—"That's poor wit, Harry; I sailed with him, Captain and Admiral, some years, and ought to know a little about him."—"Well, well, messmate, let's hear; there's old James has just dowsed his coach-whip (pendant), and gone out of commission; and Keith has got a lift over the standing part of his fore-sheet. I've sailed with 'em both, but I'll not say more till you've told me of Seymour."—"Why then, d'ye see, where could there be a stronger attachment shown to our officers than when we arrived at Spithead during the Mutiny? Ah, Harry, you old cartridge! you was then in that rebel ship the Triumph—but howsoever I won't blow you up. You must know Lieutenant Q—— was commanding officer when the delegates came on board. 'Well, my men,' says he, 'what do you want here?'—'We want to speak to the ship's company, Sir,' said the foremost. 'Oh certainly, certainly,' replied the Lieutenant. 'Here, Boatswain! Mate, pass the word, and walk forward my men.' Well, Harry, you old rogue, didn't we all muster on the fore-castle, and listen to their lingo?—aye, that we did. And says our spokesman, says he, 'Mayhap, gemmen, you have had bad treatment, and are dissatisfied with your officers?'—'Yes, yes,' said the leader, 'your're right.'—'Then all we have to say is,' said our spokesman, 'that we are not. We like our ship, like our Captain, like our Officers, and like one another—and so, gemmen, good day.' There was reasoning for you, you old swab. Ah, Harry, you ought to have been taken in low for a mutineer;—and now I'm in the line, I'll tell you more. D'ye see, every order was exposed publicly for the ship's company to read, so that every man fore and aft knew what he had to do. This was his plan: 'Do your duty, and no one shall wrong you; neglect it, and I'll punish.' Among other orders, there was one, that no man should sing out, either in pulling a rope, or any other duty, but all were to be silent as death. One day we were mooring ship, when some one sung out, at the capstan, 'Hurrah, my boys! heave!' The Captain heard it—'Send that man on deck directly.' The Officer immediately pick'd him out, and he was ordered aft under the sentry's charge. As soon as the ship was moored, the hands were turned up for punishment. Well, up we goes, and there stood the Captain with the Articles of War in his hand—by the bye I don't think he was a Lord then. Howsoever there be stood, and the Officers around him in their cocked hats and swords. The gratings were lashed to the larboard gangway, the Quarter Masters ready with their foxes, and the Boatswain's Mates with the cats. 'Come here, my man,' said the Captain. 'Was it not my orders that there should be silence fore and aft?'—'Yes, Sir.'—'And why did you disobey?'—'It warn't me, Sir; I never opened my lips.'—'Are you sure this was the man that sung out at the capstan?' said the Captain, turning to the Officer. 'Yes, Sir, confident; I removed him instantly from the bar.'—'Indeed, Sir, Mr. — is mistaken—I never spoke.'—'Are you certain, Mr. —?'—'Yes, Sir, quite certain.'—'Strip, then.' It was complied with. The poor fellow was seized up—hats off—the article for disobedience of orders read—and 'Boatswain's Mate, give him two dozen,' was heard. The tails of the cat were clear'd, the arm was lifted up, and the blow just falling, when a man rush'd from amongst us, caught the uplifted arm, and call'd out, 'Avast! avast! d—me it was I that sung out at the capstan!' and in an instant his shirt was over his head, and his back bare. 'Stop,' said the Captain. 'Come here, my lad. Why didn't you come forward before?'—'Because, Sir, I was in hopes you would have taken my messmate's word, for he never tells a lie, axing your pardon; but when I saw him likely to suffer for me, no, by —, I couldn't stand that.'—'And did he know it was you?'—'Yes, your honour, he knew it well; I was alongside of him at the bar—but he seem'd to finish.'—'Cast him off, and pipe down,' said the Captain. But oh, Harry, if you had seen the two bare-backed dogs stand and look at each other for more than a minute, without moving, and then walk off together—but I can't describe it, though I've got it all in my heart as strong now as I had then."

"And what became of the Officer?"

"Why, the Captain sued round to him, and . . ."

Here they again turned the quadrangle; all was hush'd, and I sought my pillow.

VARIETIES.

GALLANTRY OF JAMES I.—The following novel anecdote of James I. is related by Mr. D'Israeli:—The King and Queen being at Theobalds, her Majesty, shooting at a deer, mistook her mark, and killed Jewel, the King's favourite hound; at which he stormed exceedingly awhile; but after he knew who did it, he was soon pacified, and with much kindness wished her not to be troubled with it, for he should love her never the worse. And the next day he sent her a diamond worth two thousand pounds, as "a legacy from his dead dog."

GOOD MOTTO.—Mr. Davenport, a tailor, who had acquired a large fortune, asked Foote for a motto for his coach. Latin or English, asked the wit. "Pooh! English, to be sure; I don't want to set up for a scholar." "Then I've got one from Hamlet, that will match you to a button-hole—List! list! oh, list!"

COMEDY AND TRAGEDY.—A Critic once observed, that the principal difference between a Comedy and a Tragedy was, that the former generally concluded in a Church, and the latter in a Church-yard.

SILK WORM.—In a communication to the Society of Arts and Manufactures, (vol. iv. p. 163,) it is stated by Miss Henrietta Rhodes, that one line of the silk-worm, when unwound, measured 404 yards, and, when dry, weighed 3 grains. Hence it follows, that one pound avoirdupois of the thread, as spun by the worm, may be extended into a line 536 miles long, and that a thread which would encompass the earth would weigh no more than 47 pounds.

FRENCH ENTHUSIASM.—In March 1800, while Bonaparte was conducting an army across the Alps, by the pass of the Great St. Bernard, General Bethencourt was dispatched, at the head of a thousand men, to force a passage over the same range of mountains, by the Simplon. Avalanches of snow and rocks had swept away a bridge that formed a communication over a gulph of great depth, and above sixty feet in width. In this dilemma, a soldier undertook and effected an exploit equally difficult and dangerous. Holes had been made in the precipice, to introduce the beams which supported the bridge; by placing his feet in these holes, and catching hold of the rocky projections above them, he scaled the summit, and, fixing a rope at the opposite side of the precipice, at a proper height above the holes, the general was the first to follow him, hanging, as it were, by his hands on the rope, and trying to place his feet in the holes. In this way, the whole body of a thousand men cleared the gulph, loaded with arms and knapsacks, without the smallest accident. When the last man had passed over, five dogs, belonging to the party, threw themselves down into the gulph: three were carried off by the torrent, but the remaining two effected their landing on the other side, climbed up the opposite front of the precipice, and arrived at the feet of their masters, severely cut and bruised by the rocks.

EXTRAORDINARY CHANGE.—"It is a remarkable fact, that white people generally, when brought up among the Indians, become unalterably attached to their customs, and seldom afterwards abandon them. I have known two instances of white persons, who had arrived at manhood, leaving their connections and civilized habits, assuming the Indian, and fulfilling all his duties. These, however, happened among the Cherokees. Thus far I am an exception, and it is highly probable I should ever remain such; though, I must confess, the struggle in my bosom was for a considerable time doubtful, and even now my mind often reverts to the innocent scenes of my childhood, with a mixture, of pleasurable and painful emotions that is altogether indescribable. But my intercourse with refined society, acquaintance with books, and a glimpse at the wonderful structure into which the mind is capable of being moulded, have, I am convinced, unalterably attached me to a social intercourse with civilized man, composed as he is of crudities and contradictions."—Hunter.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER,

From Monday April 21st, to Friday April 25th, 1893.

Monday.—For the Benefit of Mrs. McGibbon. King Henry VIII.: The King and Miller of Mansfield: and The Falls of Clyde.

Wednesday.—The Castle Spectre: with The Review.

Thursday.—The Law of Java: with X. Y. Z.

Friday.—For the Benefit of Mr. Bass. Brutus: Winning a Husband: and The Two Pages of Frederick the Great.

On reference to the Dramatic Register in our last, it will be seen that Virginus was performed on the 18th instant. Amongst the numerous compositions which our age has produced professedly for the stage, there is not one more likely to retain its place than the tragedy we are now considering.—It is a picture of paternal and filial affection that must ever interest our feelings—a display of bravery and nobleness of soul, which, resisting tyranny, ultimately annihilate oppression—and an exposure of intrigue that at once excites detestation, and involves the intriguer in merited destruction. Such it is in substance; but, in representation, the individual character of Virginus, in many particulars completely baffles description.

In the performance of Mr. SALTER, as Virginus, there were pathos and energy of expression that evinced the nicest discrimination—gentle and commanding attitudes, so appropriate to the situation of a sensible, a brave, an injured man, as to exactly identify the performance with nature—and a command and management of countenance that marked the whole with an air of unaffected reality, and confirmed each part as the sincere and genuine working of the soul. Mr. SALTER was probably never more felicitous than in the scene where Lucius first names Virginus, and communicates the claim of the pander Claudius.—The instantaneous effect on his voice—the tremulous and convulsive motion of his frame—and the dread of hearing, yet anxiety to hear, the result—were striking illustrations of conception and ability.—And in the second, third, and fourth scenes of the Fifth Act, the vacant and ghastly stare of a frenzied mind was sustained with consummate judgment and most appalling consistency.

These are features for which the Author of the Piece is under infinite obligation to the Actor—they are improvements that embellish and realize the scenes in which they occur beyond what he could have anticipated, or even imagined—and they excite feelings in the beholder which the utmost effort of language would vainly attempt. The applause poured upon Mr. SALTER must have been most gratifying to that gentleman; as, indeed, it could not but be to every one who appreciated the talent, assiduity and power requisite to so accurate and able a representation.

Virginus is a tragedy that will increase the reputation of Author and Actor so long as the legitimate Drama is supported and true theatrical talent elicited. The Liberation of Rome is a noble subject; in the hands of Mr. Knowles it obtained ample justice; and from the performances of MACREADY, YOUNG, and SALTER, it cannot fail to advance in public estimation.

THE PHILANTHROPIST.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The letter addressed to you with an offer of some observations on the violent causes of death, for insertion in your miscellany, having been favourably received, I shall beg to occupy a column or two of your Iris of this week with some preliminary remarks. The reasons which urged me to undertake the work were mentioned in my letter to you of last week, and it would appear from your reply that they were sufficiently good to induce you to give up a portion of your sheets to the execution of my plan. I hope too that the interest universally felt for the cause of humanity will be ample enough to ensure to me the indulgence of your numerous readers. If I rob them of a page of enigmas, anecdotes, or poetry, I shall endeavour to supply a substitute much more useful, though not so amusing.

Among the most serious calamities incident to mankind we may class those which result from poisons; and in the same train of melancholy events we may range those cases where, from submersion, strangulation, or the inhalation of noxious gases, life is suspended, and without prompt assistance will quit the body to which it gave sense and motion. The importance of the affections arising from the causes mentioned is so great as to demand the solicitous attention of all men; the unfortunate victim comes upon us in a sudden manner, the antidotes or resuscitative means must be immediately employed, and how few there are who can in these dreadful emergencies reason so as to concert measures the best calculated to avert the dangers which threaten life! The horror which strikes the mind on these awful occasions is very hostile to the suggestion of proper remedies; instead of order and promptness, we find confusion and delay; it therefore becomes desirable that every dwelling house should be provided with written or printed rules of management, with a view to point out what ought to be done by friends or bystanders, in the absence of a medical practitioner. It is my intention, through the medium of your weekly publication, to supply this desideratum in a series of Essays, composed of established facts, rendered plain and intelligible by a familiar style, and an entire exemption from all technical difficulties.

Before we enter upon a description of the most common poisons existing in the three kingdoms of nature, we will mention three cases which include the moral circumstances connected with all poisons, closely linked to the fate of the poisoned person, and often essential to the success of our endeavours to restore the unfortunate to his friends and society.

A young man in a fit of despondency determines on self-destruction by poison: he watches an opportunity and secretly takes a quantity of arsenic, soon after doing so he is unexpectedly broken in upon, and wishing to avoid suspicion he conceals his sufferings, and with an affected cheerfulness talks of indifferent subjects; this he does until the severity of his symptoms can be no longer suppressed—he complains of illness, but much time elapses before the cause of it is suspected, and antidotes can do no good.

A person in mistake swallows a solution of oxalic acid in lieu of Epsom salts; here all the symptoms appear without disguise, but they are modified by circumstances absent in the former case, namely, fear and a mental disquietude, which, by augmenting irritability, adds to the patient's danger.

In the third case poison is criminally administered: here as in the preceding instance there is no concealment of suffering, but the horror and alarm which beset the mind of the poisoned person determine a nervous excitement by which the symptoms are increased in violence.

The mental serenity of the first case no doubt lessened the intensity of the symptoms, and if antidotes had not been deferred in consequence of the deceit practised on the bystanders, the patient might have recovered. The mental disturbance which prevailed in the two last was favourable to the operation of the poison, and remedies were on that account rendered less efficient.

These circumstances suggest some moral indications of treatment. When present at a case of poisoning we are naturally led to consider how the catastrophe occurred; a train of questions rushes into the mind; has he taken the poison voluntarily? accidentally? or was it intentionally given to him? it is proper that we should ask ourselves these questions, and act upon the conclusion which our judgment dictates; but it is not prudent to acquaint the patient with it. If the poisoning be voluntary we have two things to apprehend, viz. that the person will refuse to take the remedies proposed; or that he will repeat the dose if opportunity permit, fearful the first may not have been sufficient; our suspicions should be alive to these occasional occurrences. To avoid the first we should administer the counter-poison with the professed intention of alleviating pain, not of counteracting the fatal effects of the baneful drug. To prevent the second, the poison (if any be left) should be immediately thrown away.

If the poisoning be accidental, the mind is harassed with the fear of death; this must be removed by the consoling assurance that the poison will not prove fatal.

If the poisoning be criminal the person should not be informed of it, for the idea that he has near his person a wretch who could be guilty of an attempt on his life could not fail to increase the mental perturbation, and thereby do harm.

In brief, we must aim in all cases of poisoning, at tranquillizing the mind, and buoying up the hopes of the unfortunate with the consolation applicable to his case; this is an indication of great moment, and must be attended to in the treatment of all these melancholy accidents.

After the Poisons I purpose in my essays to treat on Suspended Animation, upon which subject I shall in this preliminary paper introduce a few observations. Before defining the term "suspended animation," it is necessary to endeavour to give an idea of that principle which we call life. Physiologically speaking it is difficult to define life in a satisfactory manner; but for our present purpose we may convey a sufficiently correct sense of it, by saying that it is a something in organized bodies, which renders these bodies susceptible of receiving impressions, and of reacting upon them; the former denotes sensibility, the latter irritability, and these are the properties of life. Suspended animation is that state of an organized body in which the vital principle is so far expended that the body is not perceptibly affected by impressions, consequently not sensibly capable of reacting upon them. The suspension may of course be in different degrees, from the degree which takes place in fainting, to that of seven days duration as in the case of Lady Russell. Seeing how protracted the period may be, and that the horrible danger of premature interment is incurred, it is much to be wished that we had an early criterion of actual death; we do not possess one that is infallible, save that cadaverous smell and change in appearance indicative of incipient putrefaction. The obliteration of the pulse, the extinction of animal heat, and the cessation of respiration are presumptive signs, but not positive evidences. It is a common experiment to place a looking glass before the mouth in order to determine whether the person still breathes; if the mirror grows dim, the anxious bystander is elated with hope, but alas! his hope is too often groundless, because the test is deceptive. An evaporation or emanation from the face will condense on the surface of the cold glass, and cause a dimness similar to that produced by a condensation of the pulmonary vapour. The occurrence then of this effect is no positive ground for hope, nor is the absence of it a positive ground for despair, because the functions of the heart and lungs have been so far suspended as to shew no signs of existence and yet resuscitation has been effected. Nothing but that change which precedes putrefaction can be looked upon as indubitably denoting that the body is dead. It is our duty in all cases of sudden transition from life to apparent death to apply the resuscitative means, however little the prospect of their having any good effect. They have succeeded in cases of drowning, after being continued seven hours from the time the body was drawn from the water. To incite the living to use their utmost exertions to recall life to the apparent dead, rewards are offered by the different Humane Societies of large towns and dangerous sea-ports. Institutions of this kind have done much good too in diffusing instructions for the treatment of those violent accidents which threaten an extinction of life. In administering our aid to the drowned, suffocated, &c. we must not spare our labour; to persevere and fail is doubtless discouraging, but one successful case of rescue will afford pleasure enough to compensate for the disappointment attendant on a thousand failures. I will not trespass further on your sheets at this time. This introductory paper is intended to impress on the mind some moral views intimately connected with the medical management of those who unhappily labour under the effects of poison, or the various causes of suspended animation.

I am, &c.

The Bardiad.—By C. BURTON, L. L. B.

(Concluded from our last.)

Of all the branches of knowledge that lie within the compass of the human intellect, Metaphysics constitute a Science that is, throughout, the most obscure; a Science, in which our reasonings are unavoidably abstruse, and our most conclusive inductions frequently equivocal. To launch into disquisitions that are thus qualified, and, from which but very little information, and still less entertainment, can be derived, would be equally presuming and injudicious; and nothing less than a necessary determination to redeem our own word, and an honest ambition to obliterate a calumny, a most unfounded, undeserved, calumny, on that great luminary of English literature—DR. JOHNSON, we say, no objects of less consequence than these could possibly induce us to request the attention of the public to the present subject.

Having thus apologized, and developed our purpose, we have only further to solicit the sanction of our friends to the appropriation of a column or two, to considerations, which, in all less important cases, are professedly and very judiciously excluded from our pages.—And, giving them an assurance that we shall strictly observe simplification and brevity, we take the liberty to proceed.—

As Mr. Burton considers "that a judgment, determined by the genius and execution of isolated pieces, is scarcely possible to be correct;" and, as we, also, are of opinion, that "isolated pieces," should only be quoted as specimens of error, arrogance, and ignorance; or of truth, propriety, and judgment,—we crave the patient attention of our readers, whilst we quote Mr. B.'s objection and illustrations at length; which, with our own strictures, we shall throw into the form of a distinct article.

DR. JOHNSON NO SOPHIST.

"TRUTH is the basis of ALL excellence!"—JOHNSON.

"Where men's dearest interests are in hand, Sophistry must be banished."—ROBINSON.

"How vain the chase thine ardour has begun."—BRATTLE.

Mr. Burton says—"It is maintained by some critics, that sacred subjects, are by no means adapted to poetical composition. This little work proceeds entirely upon an opposite view of the question. To establish our position, we must encounter no less a writer than that colossal critic, Dr. Johnson. What Johnson writes, men, even of penetrating intellect, often admit without suspicion of error. That man, indeed, must be a contemptible sciolist, who would not pause, and pause again, before he could trust himself to differ from so profound and accurate a Philologist. On the present subject, notwithstanding, the Doctor seems to have made an aberration from his usual acuteness and discrimination. We quote his own words: 'From poetry the reader justly expects, and from good poetry always obtains, the enlargement of his comprehension, and the elevation of his fancy; but this is rarely to be hoped for, by Christians, from metrical devotion. Whatever is great, desirable, or tremendous, is comprised in the name of the Supreme being. Omnipotence cannot be exalted; Infinity cannot be amplified; Perfection cannot be improved. All that pious verse can do is to help the memory and delight the ear; and for these purposes it may be very useful; but it supplies nothing to the mind. The ideas of Christian Theology are too simple for eloquence, too sacred for fiction, and too majestic for ornament; and to recommend them by tropes and figures is to magnify by a concave mirror the sidereal hemisphere.' †

"This is the substance of the Doctor's reasoning. Doubtless there is something, in the march of this apparent demonstration, very magnificent. But a little calm reflection will disentangle and expose the SPLENDID SOPHISTRY. His expectations from poetry are legitimate, but his decision with respect to sacred poetry is, we conceive, inadmissible. That "metrical devotion has rarely a tendency to enlarge the comprehension and elevate the fancy, or as he, afterwards, much more roundly avers, "that it can supply nothing to the mind," is the statement to which we decidedly object. We are not accountable for all the doggerel hymns, and despicable compositions, which are pawed upon the religious world. We take sacred, on the same footing with classic, poetry. We view it in its best exhibitions. Now, analyze the Doctor's reasoning. He selects the optimism of sublimity for his proof; and tells us with a tone of Irreversible authority, Omnipotence cannot be exalted; Infinity cannot be amplified; Perfection cannot be improved.—"Prodigious!"‡ Who ever thought they could? or that poetry might be the means of accomplishing the Herculean task? And, pray, will prose succeed more effectually in this UTOPIAN ENTERPRISE? Omnipotence, indeed, cannot be exalted; but our notions or conceptions of Omnipotence may. Our APPREHENSION of the NATURE of the Supreme Being" admits of various degrees of clearness and extent."

HERE the charge MUST be PROVED, or RETRACTED! And, we first, unequivocally deny Mr. B.'s conclusion as to his conceptions of the Supreme Nature; Pray, what can his "APPREHENSION of the NATURE of the Supreme Being" be, even in its clearest and most extensive signification? As this point includes the "Omnipotence," the "Infinity," and the "Perfection" stated by Dr. Johnson to be incapable of exaltation, amplification, or improvement; and, as it also shews that the writer HAD a correct conception of the Doctor's view, (the "NATURE" of Deity)—upon its solution depends our decision that either Mr. B. is a (we cannot stoop to the use of his adjective—"contemptible") "sciolist," or that the Dr. is a splendid sophist!

* "The Bardiad."

† Life of Waller.—We cannot call to mind, more just—more beautiful observations.—ED.

‡ This impertinent pronoun, should have taken its stand before the charge of "sophistry"!

§ See Eustace St. Cler's Beauties of English Poetry—page 3 Manchester Iris, 1823.—This is a new mode of treating "so profound and accurate a Philologist" as "that colossal Critic, Dr. Johnson!"

And we beg the reader to mark our author's misconception (we had almost said evasion) of this real, this important, this ONLY point—we quote his own words:—"Now this (an APPREHENSION of the NATURE of the Supreme Being) must result from delineation and illustration [Impossible!]; and may not Poetry conduce to this?" [What, to an "apprehension of the NATURE of the Supreme Being"? No; nor even Prose!] "May not its (Poetry's) 'tropes and figures' enlarge our comprehension and elevate our fancy with reference to DIVINE SUBJECTS?" Certainly they may; but this is QUITE ANOTHER thing—this is the misconception! We are here removed, and that too very adroitly, from the ESSENTIAL BEING of the Creator, to "DIVINE SUBJECTS"—from "the NATURE of the Supreme Being" to the DIVINE OPERATIONS—from the NATURE and ATTRIBUTES of GOD in an abstract view (His Power, Immensity, and Perfection) to his WORKS ("DIVINE SUBJECTS") in the UNIVERSE! Is the "delineation" of steam-engines a delineation of Bolton and Watts' NATURE?—Or, is the "illustration" of spinning machinery an illustration of the NATURE of Arkwright? The absurdity is evident. From the investigation of MECHANISM we may infer that the authors possessed judgment to design and power to execute; but, is such conclusion explanatory of THEIR nature? Yet, this illustration is inaccurate; it conveys too much;—for, we have a particular knowledge of the nature, instruments, and operations, of human power; whereas, with regard to the DIVINE POWER, we are not in the least acquainted with its source; neither are we, with the power itself; no, nor even with the means by which it operates!

Where lies the "sophistry" now? But, we are bound to proceed with the solution of the queries of Mr. B.'s "Utopian enterprise."—"Because God is unchangeable must our views and notions of Him remain so?" No, not because He is unchangeable;—but, because we can make no advances in the comprehension of that which is, to us, wholly INCOMPREHENSIBLE,—and with regard to its essential Being, and form of Being, to us, in every particular, completely INEXPLICABLE.—Can the gnat or worm form "views and notions" of the nature of man? Yet, this were admitting too much,—for the capacities of the gnat are greater in comparison with those of man, than man's are in comparison with the divine nature, attributes and operations! "Does the child receive no supplies to his infant mind from WATTS' Divine Songs?" He does (and, apparently, so might Mr. B.); but why does he? Because all nature and society are, to him, a yet unopened book; every thing is new; words are not generally known, and his capacities are not expanded.—He is yet incapable of observation and reflection, and experience has not made any impression on his tender, vivacious mind. But, will WATTS' "Essay on Space" ever lead him, or PHILOSOPHICAL ADULTS, to any thing like an "apprehension of the NATURE of the Supreme Being"? No; the Supreme Nature cannot be investigated by man; of IT he can form no idea whatever! "Does the devout Christian derive no mental acquisitions from devout and beautiful Psalms?" Assuredly none with regard to the Divine NATURE! He may, indeed, learn something of the beauty and order of the universe; and something of the Providential interpositions, and Moral Government of Deity! But, is he to believe that the Stars are the works of the fingers of God? Is he to believe that God is the prototype of man in bodily figure? In short, is he to believe that the author of the universe is of some material form; has a circumscribed inhabitation; and is, in his own person and economy, the true original of the human passions? Or, should he not rather conclude that the DIVINE NATURE is wholly inexplicable; and, that ONLY the Attributes of Power, Wisdom, and Goodness, are ascertained—from the mechanism and provisions so observable throughout the sublunary creation,—and from the corroboration of the Sacred Word? And, must he not admit, that, as these Attributes can ONLY BE INFERRED from what is visible, and experienced,—their existence being once admitted, more cannot be expected, or done;—they cannot be further described, nor can we form ANY IDEA of their essential nature, operations, or manner of Being! Thus, JOHNSON is at once rescued from even a shadow of inconsistency; and his correctness and depth of knowledge easily shewn;—the reasoning which flowed from him with all the fullness and beauty of crystal streams from an exuberant source of translucent waters, is equally proof against the captious, the presuming, and the illiberal!

After quoting a few authorities, as to the superiority of Hebrew Poetry, Mr. Burton observes—"Were it needful to add another word, we should just remind the reader that the same mode of reasoning would, with equal propriety, apply to natural subjects—[Not in the smallest degree, nor by any possible construction!] We might declare with a tone of equal magnificence, the rose cannot be sweetened; the sun cannot be brightened; creation cannot be enlarged!" Yes, were the "NATURE of the Supreme Being" as PALPABLE, or even as PERCEPTIBLE as "the rose," "the sun," and "creation"—this, possibly, might be the case; but, it so happens, that, whilst the latter, and their various qualities, are evident to our senses, and also, except the sun, to our investigations, the spirituality of God not only surpasses all, but will ever infinitely transcend the comprehension of man, and of every other finite intellect!

Mr. B. thus concludes with Dr. J.—"We hope enough has been said, to demonstrate the SOPHISTRY of Johnson's reasoning about Sacred Poetry, and to exculpate us from the imputation of temerity in venturing to arraign such venerable authority."—Surely, some of our readers will now be surprised that we last week advised this would-be BARD and CRITIC, to,— —"Retire and teach his ERRING soul,

The province of her tolls!"

FEMALE CELIBACY;

OR, THE GRAVE OF CYNTHIA.

By the Author of 'The Bachelor's Soliloquy.'

[Communicated by S. X.]

Where youthful circles make resort
Nightly to flaunt in trim array,—
Where meet, in fashion's airy court,
The light, the giddy, and the gay,—
I would not seek
To wet one cheek
With gentle pity's holy dew;
Why shade with clouds a summer-sky?
Why dim the lustre of an eye
That sorrow never knew?

But lives there one whose feeling breast
Those festive scenes can bear to leave,
To wander where the weary rest
And feel how sweet it is to grieve?
If such there be,
O! come with me,
And view poor CYNTHIA's lowly bed;
'Tis yonder little fresh-green sod,
Where seldom mourner's foot-path trod,
Or pious tear been shed.

O, Time! I would not blame thy power,
For CYNTHIA's youth and beauty flows;
I mourn but that so sweet a flower
Should bloom and wither all alone:
For she was fair,
Beyond compare,
And ever was her heart so blythe,
By gay, good-humoured mirth upborne.
O, Time! she would have laugh'd to scorn
Thy very glass and scythe.

For her, soft dreams, and slumbers light,
Succeeded calm, untroubled days;
Each eye beam'd on her with delight,
Each tongue was tuneful in her praise:
And at her feet,
With reverence meet,
A crowd of flattering suitors strove;
Some proffer'd glittering gems and gold,
And some of endless transports told,
And everlasting love.

But little could their prayers avail,
Nor one could win the Maiden's choice;
She little heeded flattery's tale,
She scorn'd the sound of Mammon's voice:
The gay attire,
Could she admire,

Of beaux that glitter'd by her side ?
While every vagrant butterfly,
That frisks beneath a summer-sky,
Could rival all their charms.

Yet, had she seen some gentle youth,
Of manners mild, by sense refined,
Whose pure integrity and truth
Spoke manly dignity of mind ;
And had he sued
In plaintive mood,
And, sighing, look'd his anxious pain ;
And had he dropp'd a silent tear,—
The tribute of a soul sincere,—
He had not sued in vain.

What though the charms which Nature spread,
With raptur'd eye she oft survey'd ;
What though " by heavenly musing led,"
She loved to wander through the shade ;
Still from her breast,
Forlorn, distress'd,
Would sometimes break unbidden sighs,—
That she had none whose feeling heart
In all her griefs might bear a part,
And share in all her joys.

Vain was the oft-repeated sigh
For friends,—her youthful years had known,
Who now had own'd the sacred tie
Which binds all obitaries in one :
The moon's still beam
On lake or stream,
Dark woods, and precipices rude,
Would thus inspire sweet melancholy
That shunn'd the world, its noise and folly,
In love with solitude.

And now her charms are fading fast,
Her spirits now no more are gay ;
Alas ! that beauty cannot last !
That flowers so sweet, so soon decay !
How sad appears
The vale of years,
How chang'd from youth's too flattering scene !
Where are her fond admirers gone ?
Alas ! and shall there then be none
On whom her soul may lean ?

Poor CYNTHIA ! friendless and forlorn !—
When youth's gay flowers were all turned scar
Thou yet couldst shun the world's dread scorn,
And hide thy faded beauties here :
But in thy end,
A more than iresend
Was needed, who could watch each breath,—
Still near thy sickly couch could wait,—
Support thee on the brink of fate,
And cheer the gloom of death.

Thou ! who could mourn o'er Friendship's bier,— Why was thine own unwept to be ?
Thou ! who couldst give to all a tear,—
Why was there none to weep for thee ?
Now, o'er thy grave
The wild weeds wave,
Who shall thy perish'd worth deplore ?
Or say, ' The breast which lies beneath,
Though doom'd its sighs unheard to breathe,
Was never cold before !'

Adieu, poor CYNTHIA ! Though thy bier
By widowed love has not been press'd ;
What though no child, with starting tear,
Shall view thy place of lowly rest ;
This little mound
Shall still be found
In Spring's soft verdure first arrayed ;
The snow-drop, earliest of the year,
Spotless, like thee, shall flourish here,
Like thee, shall early fade !

MEN AND MANNERS.

MELANCHOLY STATE OF THINGS !

I got up one morning last winter two hours later than I ought to have done ; looked out at my window ; fog of the true dusky yellow, in which a fish might live. Water in my jug frozen to the bottom ; obliged to wait half an hour for hot, or rather lukewarm, water ; spent that half hour looking for my stockings, stripped to the shirt all the time. What a melancholy state of things !

Water come at last ; full of grease ; had an excruciating shave. Tore my only pair of pantaloons from hip to knee ; half an hour sowing them again ; a clumsy job after all. Drew on my boots, which were broken in two places ; filled up the interstices with ink. Ineffable torments from my ten corns and two bunions. What a melancholy state of things !

Fire just lighted in the other room ; atmosphere of smoke, soot, and sulphur, dense to desperation ; kettle not boiled. Won't breakfast at home. Two holes in my coat and one in my hat ; never mind, can't stay here. What a melancholy state of things !

Sally forth without my gloves ; streets greasy ; had three falls before I got out of my own alley. Coffee-house ; order coffee—execrable stuff ; order tea—the most vile and vapid wash imaginable ; addle eggs ; cold roast beef a month old ; bill for breakfast 3s. 6d. Pockets empty ; forgot that I paid off my last shilling yesterday ; obliged to leave my old pinchbeck. What a state of things !

Return home, as I expect a letter with money. Smoke gone, but fire gone along with it. Letter lying on the table ; open it eagerly—" Sir, I can wait no longer for my bill." Fling the letter into the fire, and rush out. N. B. Fell from the top of the stairs to the bottom and sprained my thumb. Pretty state of things !

Recollect that Mr. G— owes me 5l. for index-making ; post off to his office ; G— gone out, return uncertain ; no money disbursed in his absence ; I go out too. Think I see G— in Cheapside ; dash across the street to the imminent hazard of my bones ; splashed all over with mud by a passing cart. Not G— after all, but a very gentlemanlike-looking man. N. B. I am getting more short-sighted every day. Perhaps I drink too much porter.

Lucky rencounter ; meet G— at the corner of Birch-lane ; does not know me at first, I am so disfigured with mud ; laughs heartily when he recognises me. Swears he has not got a fraction ; I stick to him like a leech. At length, to get rid of me, he gives me a check on Mr. N— for 5l. ; I grasp his hands with ecstasy, and completely soil his new gloves. A better state of things !

Hurry off to Mr. N—'s house ; find the outside of it stuck all over with bills to let ! Inquire next door ; learn that Mr. N— has stopped payment, and is now in the Poultry Compter ! In a paroxysm of rage run back to G—'s office ; G— not there. Go to his private house ; he has left town for a week ! Abuse and strike the footman ; he shoves me down the steps and slams the door. Here's a melancholy state of things !

Dinner hour approaches ; desperately fatigued and hungry. Meet Jack Ogleby ; ask him to lend me 5s. ; Jack, in reply, turns his pockets inside out, which exhibit a deplorable vacuum. N. B. I believe Jack carries his money in his fob. Meet old Picklepork, the drysalter ; ask him whether he dines at home ; says yes, but never asks me to dinner. As a forlorn hope I called on the very reverend and sententious Caleb Crookbrain. The reply was characteristic—" I have no stock of money, as my money is all in the stocks." " I wish, with all my soul, that you were there too," thought I, and turned on my heel ; not much disappointed, however, for I expected nothing.

Driven now to my last resource ; go to the pawnbroker's and ask for 3s. 6d. on my waistcoat ; pawnbroker refuses to give so much, unless I throw my shirt into the bargain ; forced to comply. Button up my coat to my throat, and return to the coffee-house where I breakfasted, for my watch ; waiter very impertinent because I can give him nothing for himself. Back again to pawnbroker's ; pledge my watch for 10s. and regain my shirt and waistcoat.

Dinner at last ; slimed beef half cold, and altogether execrable, mouldy bread, cold potatoes, and stale porter. Horrid-looking fellow in the opposite box ; never takes his eyes off me ; what can he mean ? He is certainly either a bailiff, a pick-pocket, or a poet. I take up the paper to avoid his infernal glare ; a full account of the failure of my last piece at the Coburg. Melancholy state of things !

Pay my bill : rise to go away, but can't find my hat. Ill-looking fellow gone ; must have taken my hat while I was reading the paper. My conjectures of his charafter partly right ; no bailiff, but evidently a thief, and possibly a poet.

Obliged to go out without my hat, shivering with cold ; for I was in such a hurry to dine, that I didn't put on my shirt and waistcoat at the pawnbroker's, but thrust them into my pockets. Passing through Fleet-street, I called at Miller's ; my last article rejected, as being too low.

A row in the Strand ; got into it most innocently ; pockets picked in the crowd of my shirt and waistcoat, and remaining silver. Taken to the watch-house ; kept there all night between two chimney-sweepers and a pot-boy. Up at Bow-street in the morning ; narrowly escaped being sent to the tread-mill as a vagabond. As I walked out of the office, arrested for 17s., and taken to Tothill-fields. What a melancholy state of things !—Museum.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH CHARACTER.

Unity of effect is the great source of beauty in all nature and in all art. To speak of French and English scenery as matters of taste, and leaving particular associations out of the question, the difference between them seems to be, that, in the French, this unity of effect is perpetually broken, by the evident desire to blend, in the mind of the spectator, admiration of art with that of nature ; in the English it is perpetually preserved, by keeping art out of sight. An Englishman seems content to love nature for herself. A Frenchman can love nature too ; but his admiration of her increases in proportion as she calls up feelings connected with himself—just as he loves his wife or his mistress best when she happens to have on a dress that he chose for her.

Would it be too fanciful, to trace the character of national scenery to that of the people to which it belongs ? The crying fault of the French character is egotism, arising from open self-satisfaction ; that of the English is gloom, arising from secret self-discontent. A Frenchman cannot have too much of himself : an Englishman cannot have too little. A Frenchman constantly feels himself to be a part of his country, and his country to be a part of himself ; so that he never cares to quit it : an Englishman feels that he has a country only from the particular ties that bind him to it ; so that when they are broken, the world becomes his country, and he wanders from one part of it to another, without end or aim. It cannot be denied that both these are very faulty extremes in character ; but I think of the two, the English one is likely to produce upon the whole, the least pernicious effects. Indeed, it may lead to good ones ; but the other cannot. That which makes us content with the thing we are, and with all that is about us, binds us to earthly and tangible reality, with a chain that is the more strong from its being visible, and from our having no desire to break it. It keeps the mind in perpetual subjection ; checks the growth of all its faculties, except the very worst ; and, in the end, inevitably destroys the very best. But that which induces us to fly from ourselves, though it often leads to more fatal consequences, than the other, may have a contrary effect. The human mind cannot exist without love and admiration ; they are its daily food ; food that is scattered about for it every where. It is true that, when the mental appetite becomes vitiated, and cannot relish what it finds strewn about its feet, it may starve ; but, on the other hand, it may be driven to seek its food at a distance. Hatred of itself, and of humanity, may force it to seek refuge in other worlds—in the world of books—the world of thought—the world of nature : and, let it but once gain a true insight of these, and all its finer faculties must expand. Its fancy and imagination, which are always progressive, and yet always young, will then travel through all the regions of possible or impossible existence ; and if they return without finding a dwelling-place, they will yet bring back with them stores, from which they may for ever after create worlds of their own. The affections, too, will then recognise their kindred with humanity ; they will learn the true objects on which they were made to rest ; and will find, that, if they can for awhile expatiate in external nature, as in their country, they can, after all, have no home but in the human heart. The mind's vitiated appetite will then be corrected ; its taste for the simple and true will revive ; and all will be right again.—Comet de Soligny.

GENIUS.

Having then in my preceding remarks defined "Taste" to be "the capability of distinguishing the beauties and defects of specimens of Genius in the fine arts," I will now define "Genius" to be "that capacity of mind by which we are enabled to execute those specimens about which 'Taste' is employed." This definition may appear too limited, but as we are viewing "Genius" in connexion with "Taste," it will I think be sufficient for our present purpose. We perceive then that Genius is the capacity of executing, "Taste" of judging of that which is already executed; and consequently that though real Genius always includes Taste, the same cannot be affirmed of the reverse: for "Taste" may subsist and that in a very great degree without Genius.

When we have once come to the conclusion, that any power of the mind upon which we are treating is the gift of nature, and not acquired as an effect of a combination of causes, it appears as though our subject ought to close with our definition.—It is thus in the present instance.

When writing upon "Taste" I had room to dilate upon the sources whence the capability of judging is derived; but while treating upon Genius, having affirmed that it is the capability of executing, and that this capability is derived immediately from nature, my task seems finished and my subject closed. As however I have not yet thrown down my pen, and as I perceive there is still a small portion of ink in it, if the reader would wish to accompany me to the end of my journey, he must be content to travel a little farther yet. But should he feel already fatigued he can rest at this convenient stage which my prolix digression has afforded him.

Taste then being as I have endeavoured to prove wholly acquired, every one by cultivating his mind may hope to possess it; which (as it is a source of such refined pleasure) is a most delightful reflection. For, thus, though the sensibility of some men to the beauties of the best writers may at present appear almost infinitely greater than mine, yet by paying due care to the cultivation of my mind, the time will come when I shall be equally alive to them. But "Genius" on the contrary, though certainly capable of receiving improvement from diligent culture, and without it is like corn among thistles so choked and obscured that it is of very little profit to the owner, still must have its seeds first sown by the kindly hand of nature; and belonging to a much higher order of talent and not so necessary for general happiness, nature has been very frugal in the bestowing of it. In proof of this let us but glance through the records of antiquity, keeping in view at the same time the millions of beings which must have been continually renewed to people the nations, and we shall perceive with what a sparing hand great geniuses have been sprinkled, sometimes only one or two appearing to brighten the intellectual horizon for centuries. Upon this principle, viz. of Genius being derived almost entirely from nature, we can also account for the few great Poets, Painters, and Sculptors which have appeared in the various ages of the world, in comparison with the number of Philosophers, Mathematicians, and Metaphysicians: for the success of the former depending almost entirely upon "Genius" is only in the gift of nature, while the success of the latter depending more upon their own application and persevering exertions, is in their own power to insure: hence the maxim Poeta nascitur Orator fit—of the truth of the latter branch of which Demosthenes is a fine example, who almost in nature's spite made himself, by the intensity of his study, and the indefatigability of his exertions, the greatest Orator perhaps the world has produced. But where is the mind presuming enough to hope that by mere application and study, without possessing a poetic spirit, "that spark of fire divine," it could produce a Poem equal to the Iliad of Homer, or the Paradise Lost of Milton. Another fact which I think arises from the same principle is this: that in those arts which depend upon native Genius little or no improvement has been made from the times of David, Homer, Phidias, Praxiteles, and Apelles, to the present time, while in almost every other department of literature and science which depend more upon experiment and study we find a great and pleasing advancement has taken place.

Genius being derived from nature, it is no wonder that those who derive their powers from the same source should direct them: somewhat in the same way; and thus we find that when thinking upon the same subject, the conceptions of men of genius in all ages have been frequently similar, and even the very manner of embodying their conceptions has sometimes been the same, without any necessity for believing that they had copied from each other; and that though many of them wrote before any regular systems of composition were framed, yet their works are composed according to those rules which we now esteem as the standards of correct and pure taste. Of the truth of which we might mention as instances Homer, Sophocles, and Euripides, who directed by real Genius, and following nature for their guide, have drawn up their works with such order of arrangement and harmony of design, that they have ever since become models from which we draw as from nature herself. And let me not forget that true child of nature, our own admired Shakespeare; for notwithstanding the exquisite beauty of his works, says Harris, who can believe that he was versed in critical systems? This is the grand distinction between Taste and Genius, and shews how infinitely superior the one is to the other; for though we can open to ourselves a source of the most refined pleasure by acquiring a Taste for the beauties of the arts, yet we must still look to Genius for the recruiting of the fountain. For if Homer had not written his Iliad whence should we have gained our rules for judging of the beauties of an Epic Poem, or have reaped the pleasure which we now receive from the reading of it, unless some other Genius had supplied his place, and had consequently become an Homer to us.

Dr. Brown, in his work on the Philosophy of the human mind, says "That our thoughts follow each other either because they are similar—or contrasted—or have been on some preceding occasion contiguous." To these principles he gives the name of primary laws of suggestion, upon which he further observes, that it is in the modification of the suggesting principle, and the peculiar suggestions to which it gives rise, that he conceives the chief part or he may say the whole of what is truly called Genius to consist. Into this however I will not enter, merely mentioning it by the by, but conclude by repeating that Genius is the capacity of executing, Taste of judging of that which is already executed—that the latter depends upon the cultivation of the mind, the former upon the bounty of nature.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE ROYAL LIBRARY.—The general plan of the formation of the Royal Library appears to have been determined upon, by his late Majesty, King George the Third, soon after his accession to the throne; and the first extensive purchase which he made was that of the library of Mr. Joseph Smith, the British Consul at Venice, in 1762.

In 1768, Mr. Barnard the librarian, was sent to the Continent by his Majesty; and in France, Italy, and Germany, he bought numerous books of great variety and value. Previous to his departure, he received a letter from Dr. Johnson, who frequently visited the library, pointing out the best means of completing it. The rules laid down in that letter have been followed with unremitting attention.

Under Mr. Barnard's judicious directions the entire collection has been made and arranged; and manuscript catalogues of the whole, both classed and alphabetical, have been prepared and completed with the greatest care and judgment.

This library has been considered as very complete, for its extent, in all branches of science and literature; besides geographical and topographical works, to the acquisition of which his late majesty paid the most particular attention; it is very rich in classics, in English history, in Italian, French and Spanish literature, and in the scarce early printed books of the fifteenth century.

His Majesty has accompanied his munificent donation of this library to the public, with the gift of a selection of coins and medals, the description of which was carefully revised by the late Dr. Coombe.

During his late Majesty's long and lamented indisposition, an annual allowance, equal to the sum usually expended, was appropriated to the purpose of carrying his known intentions respecting the library into effect, and the trustees of his private property submitted to the present King the propriety of granting an increase of that allowance to defray the expense of printing the catalogue. This proposal was sanctioned by his Majesty's entire approbation.

The sum expended in the purchase of Mr. Smith's library was about 10,000*l.*, and the sum applied for the purchase of books, for a period of sixty years, has been about 2,000*l.* annually; in the course of that time many opportunities occurred, and which were not neglected, of making most valuable acquisitions upon very advantageous terms.

It is also to be observed, that additions have been made to the collection by persons anxious to shew their respect to his late Majesty, and to promote his views. Among these, the late Mr. Jacob Bryant deserves particularly to be mentioned, as having enriched the library with some of the rarest specimens of the art of printing, at its commencement in this country.

On the demise of his late Majesty, all the expenses of the library were paid up to the 28th of February, 1820, inclusive.

The following payments have since been made by his present Majesty, for periodical publications and works in progress:—

In 1821	1056	4	3

'It is no more than justice to these gentlemen to state, that the general arrangements of the library are considered by all those who have resorted to it, as very complete, and that the readiest access is easily obtained to any book to which the reader may have occasion to refer.'—Rep. of the Com. of the House of Commons.

BRITISH MUSEUM.—Since the foundation of the National Museum, in 1755, the sums which have been granted by Parliament, for works of art, of science, and of literature, have been very considerable; the principal of which have been applied to the following purchases, viz. :—

1753, for the Sloanian collection.....	£20,000
1753, for the Harleian collection.....	10,000
1772, for the Hamilton collection of vases	8410
1805, for the Townly collection of statues	20,000
1807, for the Lansdown manuscripts....	4925
1810, for the Greville minerals.....	13,727
1813, for the Hargrave library.....	8000
1814, for the remainder of the Townley collection.....	82000
1815, for the Phigalian marbles.....	15,000
1816, for the Elgin marbles.....	35,000
1808, for the Burney library.....	15,500
The donations also of individuals have been most liberal and extensive.— Rep. of the Committee of the House of Commons.

SOLIGNY'S LETTERS.—It appears that Mr. Patmore, (Mr. Scott's second in his unfortunate duel) is the author of the Count de Soligny's Letters.

QUENTIN DURWARD we can state, will be published about the 10th of May. This work treats of the well-known and highly interesting contests of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, with the tyrannical and subtle Louis XI. of France. The hero of the tale, (Quentin) is one of the guard of Scottish Archers in the service of Louis.

THE POETS OF ENGLAND.—Lord Byron is going to quit the shores of Italy, and take his departure for Greece, there to join the standard of the oppressed, whom his Lordship will largely assist with his purse, while he dedicates to them, at the same time, his personal services. Thomas Moore has just finished his Fables of Congress, and a new edition of The Loves of the Angels, and is on the point of returning to his cottage in Wiltshire. Wordsworth is on a tour in Holland. Southey is expected very shortly in London, with a new poem, the hero of which is a Quaker. Rogers has prepared a new edition of his poem on Italy, which was published anonymously last year.—Coleridge still continues to rattle under the kind and hospitable mansion of his friend, at Highgate. Charles Lamb perambulates between his snug little villa at Dalston and the India House—whilst the Great Unknown remains alternately at Abbotsford, and at his residence in Edinburgh, contemplating another new novel, that which has been for some time announced being nearly ready for publication.

THE CABINET.

MINERALOGY.—A new fluid, of a very singular nature, has been recently discovered by Dr. Brewster, in the Cavities of Minerals. It possesses the remarkable property of expanding about thirty times more than water; and, by the heat of the hand, or between 75° and 85°, it always expands so as to fill the cavity which contains it. The vacuum which is thus filled up is of course a perfect vacuum; and at a temperature below that now mentioned, the new fluid contracts, and the vacuum re-appears, frequently with a rapid effervescence. These phenomena take place instantaneously, in several hundred cavities, seen at the same time.

The new fluid is also remarkable for its extreme volatility; adhering very slightly to the sides of the cavities; and is likewise distinguished by its optical properties. It exists, however, in quantities too small to be susceptible of chemical analysis. This new fluid is almost always accompanied with another fluid like water, with which it refuses to mix, and which does not perceptibly expand at the above-mentioned temperature.

In a specimen of Cymophane, or Chrysoberyl, Dr. Brewster has discovered a stratum of these cavities, in which he has reckoned, in the space of 1-7th of an inch square, thirty thousand cavities, each containing this new fluid; a portion of the fluid like water, and a vacuum besides. All these vacancies simultaneously disappear at a temperature of 85°.

If such a fluid could be obtained in quantities, its utility in the construction of thermometers and levels would be incalculable. There are many cavities in crystals, such as those opened by Sir Humphrey Davy, which contain only water, and which, of course, never exhibit any of the properties above described. An account of these results was read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, on the 3d and on the 17th March.—Edin. Phil. Journal.

BIRDS.—The month of April is a very interesting one to the ornithologist, as at this period most of our migrating birds return from their travels, and we recognize, in the grove and the hedgerow, the voices of many of our old acquaintances, which we as much expect to hear about this time, as if an appointment were made for that purpose; and we greet them as the harbingers of a delightful season. A person, well conversant with birds, will know them as certainly by their voice, or flight, as if the creature were in his hand; but the parus tribe, (tom tits,) in the spring, have such a variety of notes, that they at times surprise, and occasion a disappointment: we hear an unusual note, and creep with caution to observe the stranger it proceeds from, and at length perceive our old acquaintance, searching, with his usual activity the lichens of an old apple tree. All these birds will often acquire or compound a note not common to each other, seem delighted with it for a day, and then we hear it no more. The larger tom tit has two particular calls, familiar to every gardener; and no spring passes without our hearing the singularly harsh notes of this beautiful bird. The arrival of the swallow, about the middle of the month, foretells the approach of summer. The next bird that appears is the nightingale. From the time of Homer to the present day the poets have ever considered the nightingale as a melancholy bird. But Vallans, in his Tale of Two Swannes, says,

'The cheerful birds
With sweetest notes do sing their Maker's praise:
Among the which the merry nightingale,
With sweet and sweet, her breast against a thorn,
Rings out all night.'

TWO GLASSES OF WINE.—A certain well-known Baccanalian officer, having been severely wounded in an engagement during the late war in the Peninsula, was admonished by the surgeon who superintended his cure, that he must now relinquish his usual habits of indulgence, which in that hot climate, and under his circumstances, would be fatal, and must confine himself to one, or at most two glasses of wine daily. Fully aware of the hardship of such a prohibition in his patient, the surgeon anxious that it should be obeyed, begged of him to give his word of honour, as a soldier, that he would drink no more wine than the prescribed quantity. The patient consented. The surgeon frequently visited his patient, and failed not to remind him of his promise, which he was assured was inviolably kept. Finding the wounds healing, he expatiated on the praises of sobriety, and assured his patient that to nothing but the change in his living, was he indebted for his life; that indulging in the daily use of a pint of wine, would to a certainty have been attended by the most fatal consequences. The general reply to all these harangues was, 'Very well, doctor, you know best.' At length the wounds completely healed, and the doctor still insisted on a rigorous observance of his former instructions towards a perfect cure. The officer, however, replied, that finding his wounds were healed, he would not only indulge himself with an extra glass of wine, but would request the doctor to partake of a few glasses of some that he could recommend. The servant was forthwith ordered to bring a couple of glasses of wine, one for the doctor and one for his master. He speedily returned, bearing a salver on which rested two glasses, each containing fully a quart and a half of wine. 'These,' said the officer, 'are my glasses, doctor; and on the honor of a soldier, I have drank no more than two of them daily, during the whole progress of my cure.'

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR.—Permit me to solicit the attention of your readers to the beautiful lines, inscribed on a Monument in the Parish Church of Preston, and inserted at page 75 of your Iris, of March 1, 1823.—Those lines have appeared, anonymously, in almost every respectable periodical work in the kingdom, and have been read, doubtless, with peculiar interest, by all who have taste and discrimination to appreciate their merits. They were designed to commemorate, with "deep concern," the sudden and appalling death of four amiable youths, who were drowned in the river Ribble, by the oversetting of a boat, on the 24th day of April, 1822, and "to perpetuate the salutary impression of this truly awful dispensation."

The writer of this inscription, it is presumed, is at present known only to very few persons; and if any of your readers should have hitherto omitted to peruse it, I am sure I shall not fail to bespeak their immediate attention to this excellent composition, by announcing the author's name, which I now do, from unquestionable authority, being no other than James Montgomery, Esq., author of "A World before the Flood."

April 29, 1823.

Yours, &c.

S. X.

* As the composition alluded to, by our esteemed correspondent S. X., consists of only two stanzas, we here reprint them, for the accommodation of such of our readers as may not have seen them before, or may not, possibly, have the Iris referred to, at hand.

They sailed in hope, but they returned no more;

Youth, health, and pleasure, cheered them on the way;

Brief was the voyage, yet they reached a shore

Beyond the seaman's track, ere close of day.

Low in the grave their ashes slumber now:

Reader, their days are numbered—Where art thou?

Though on the stream of time thy vessel glide,

And pure as heaven the waters seem to roll,

Ere long, in calm or tempest, shall the tide

Cast on a land unknown thy naked soul:

Ah! then, when life and death no more shall be,

Where, reader, wilt thou spend eternity?

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—There's nothing I so much admire as an ingenious appropriation of the thoughts, style, or sentiments of others; it is cheap, and saves a world of trouble, particularly when we have no thoughts, style, or sentiments, of our own! I was led into this train of profound meditation, on reading a number of a Liverpool periodical; in the letter of "no plagiarist." I met with as pretty, as neat an imitation,* as could have been imagined; and though I was in the open air, and it was rather cold at the time, I was under the necessity of taking off my hat out of respect to an old and esteemed acquaintance; and I ponder'd and paused, and paused and ponder'd, and ejaculated, verily! verily! there is nothing new under the sun. You will readily perceive that this little epistle of mine is principally composed of an article to which I am very partial, and often indulge in; but like the bird in the fable, I am occasionally stripped of a borrowed plume or so; but on n'importe pas. I am, &c.,

P. S.—I shall feel obliged to any of your correspondents who can inform me in what London newspaper or periodical publication a little piece entitled the "Lobby Challenge" appeared some 20 years ago, intending to republish it as original on the occasion of a squabble between an Alderman and a Cousin to a lord which lately happened at a watering place not so fashionable now as formerly.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Should the following lines, to the terminations which appeared in your last, obtain insertion, I shall feel obliged.

Manchester.

When launch'd upon the ocean wide,
By storms, and rocks, and darkness tried,
Thy name shall be a spell,
To guide me like a polar star,
Direct my wanderings when I'm far
From thee my Jane—Farewell!

And when I'm to the battle led,
And over mangled corse tread,
Thy pray'r my shield shall be!
Shall bring me safely back to twine
My arms round thee—my name with thine,
And make but one with thee.

THE DISCONTENTED PENDULUM.

An old clock that had stood for fifty years in a farmer's kitchen, without giving its owner any cause of complaint, early one summer's morning before the family was stirring, suddenly stopped.

Upon this, the dial-plate (if we may credit the fable) changed countenance with alarm; the hands made a vain effort to continue their course; the wheels remained motionless with surprise; the weights hung speechless; each member felt disposed to lay the blame on the others. At length the dial instituted a formal inquiry as to the cause of the stagnation, when hands, wheels, weights, with one voice protested their innocence. But now a faint tick was heard below from the pendulum, who thus spoke:—

"I confess myself to be the sole cause of the present stoppage; and I am willing, for the general satisfaction, to assign my reasons. The truth is, that I am tired of ticking." Upon hearing this, the old clock became so enraged that it was on the very point of striking.

"Lazy wire!" exclaimed the dial-plate, holding up its hands.—"Very good!" replied the pendulum, "it is vastly easy for you, Mistress Dial, who have always, as every body knows, set yourself up above me,—it is vastly easy for you, I say, to accuse other people of laziness! You, who have had nothing to do all the days of your life but to stare people in the face, and to amuse yourself with watching all that goes on in the kitchen! Think, I beseech you, how you would like to be shut up for life in this dark closet, and to wag backwards and forwards, year after year, as I do."—"As to that," said the dial, "is there not a window in your house, on purpose for you to look through?"

"For all that," resumed the pendulum, "it is very dark here: and, although there is a window, I dare not stop even for an instant, to look out at it. Besides, I am really tired of my way of life; and, if you wish, I'll tell you how I took this disgust at my employment. I happened this morning to be calculating how many times I should have to tick in the course only of the next twenty-four hours: perhaps some of you above there can give me the exact sum."

The minute hand, being quick at figures, presently replied, "Eighty-six thousand four hundred times."

"Exactly so," replied the pendulum; "well, I appeal to you all, if the very thought of this was not enough to fatigue one; and when I began to multiply the strokes of one day by those of months and years, really it is no wonder if I felt discouraged at the prospect; so, after a great deal of reasoning and hesitation, thinks I to myself, I'll stop."

The dial could scarcely keep its countenance during this harangue; but, resuming its gravity, thus replied:—

"Dear Mr. Pendulum, I am really astonished that such a useful industrious person as yourself should have been overcome by this sudden action. It is true you have done a great deal of work in your time; so have we all, and are likely to do; which, although it may fatigue us to think of, the question is, whether it will fatigue us to do. Would you now do me the favour to give about half a dozen strokes, to illustrate my argument?"

The pendulum complied, and ticked six times at its usual pace.—"Now," resumed the dial, "may I be allowed to inquire, if that exertion was at all fatiguing or disagreeable to you?"

"Not in the least," replied the pendulum,

"it is not of six strokes that I complain, nor of sixty, but of millions."

"Very good," replied the dial; "but recollect that though you may think of a million strokes in an instant, you are required to execute but one; and that, however often you may hereafter have to swing, a moment will always be given you to swing in."

"That consideration staggers me, I confess," said the pendulum. "Then I hope," resumed the dial-plate, "we shall all immediately return to our duty; for the maids will lie in bed till noon, if we stand idling thus."

Upon this, the weights, who had never been accused of light conduct, used all their influence in urging him to proceed: when, as with one consent, the wheels began to turn, the hands began to move, the pendulum began to swing, and, to its credit, ticked as loud as ever; while a red beam of the rising sun that streamed through a hole in the kitchen shutter, shining full upon the dial-plate, it brightened up as if nothing had been the matter.

When the farmer came down to breakfast that morning, upon looking at the clock he declared that his watch had gained half an hour in the night

MORAL.

A celebrated modern writer says, "take care of the minutes, and the hours will take care of themselves." This is an admirable remark, and might be very seasonably recollected when we begin to be "weary in well-doing," from the thought of having much to do. The present moment is all we have to do with in any sense; the past is irrecoverable; the future is uncertain; nor is it fair to burden one moment with the weight of the next. Sufficient unto the moment is the trouble thereof. If we had to walk a hundred miles, we should still have to set but one step at a time, and this process continued would infallibly bring us to our journey's end. Fatigue generally begins, and is always increased, by calculating in a minute the exertion of hours.

Thus, in looking forward to future life, let us recollect that we have not to sustain all its toil, to endure all its sufferings, or encounter all its crosses at once. One moment comes laden with its own little burdens, then flies, and is succeeded by another no heavier than the last; if one could be borne, so can another and another.

Even in looking forward to a single day, the spirit may sometimes faint from an anticipation of the duties, the labours, the trials to temper and patience that may be expected. Now this is unjustly laying the burden of many thousand moments upon one. Let any one resolve always to do right now, leaving then to do as it can; and if he were to live to the age of Methusalem, he would never do wrong. But the common error is to resolve to act right after breakfast, or after dinner, or to-morrow morning, or next time; but now, just now this once, we must go on the same as ever.

It is easy, for instance, for the most ill-tempered person to resolve that the next time he is provoked he will not let his temper overcome him; but the victory would be to subdue temper on the present provocation. If, without taking up the burden of the future, we would always make the single effort at the present moment, while there would, at any one time, be very little to do, yet, by this simple process continued, every thing would at last be done.

It seems easier to do right to-morrow than to-day, merely because we forget that when to-morrow comes, then will be now. Thus life passes with many, in resolutions for the future which the present never fulfils.

It is not thus with those, who "by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality:"—day by day, minute by minute, they execute the appointed task to which the requisite measure of time and strength is proportioned: and thus, having worked while it was called day, they at length rest from their labours, and their "works follow them."

Let us then, "whatever our hands find to do, do it with all our might, recollecting that now is the proper and accepted time."

PAINTING.

How terrible is the absence of him in whose presence alone the heart feels the sense of existence! Amaryllis thought this, one night in a cave where Lycidas was sleeping, while the wakeful beauty hung enamoured over each interesting feature: a SUSPENDED LAMP was placed near.—Ah! (she continued) even this pleasing light, this soft moon of my chamber, is the thought of his genius*. It was from the PENDENT LIGHT OF THE GLOW-WORM, in the illumined hedge, that he stole the hint; it is thus that, borrowing every happy conception from Nature, he discovers around him the sources of enjoyment.

The lamp threw its light on the even wall, and the solitary flame strongly reflected the shadow of his face.—Ye gods! (exclaimed the fond maid) behold two Lycidas! Ye speaking features, can ye not for ever dwell on that wall? then would Lycidas not entirely quit me in his absence. How consoling even the shadow of what we love! Lycidas! thy shade would to me prove a tender companion. Fugitive and cherished shadow! live here when Lycidas roves in the circling mountains!

She took up her sheephook, and affectionately tracing the shadow of her lover, its sharp iron graved it on the wall. Lycidas turned, and the lines remained unmoved.—He is for ever there! (exclaimed the enraptured Amaryllis.) Lycidas awoke.—Who is here? Amaryllis!—THYSELF, THYSELF! (she cried, in embracing him.) These eyes shall worship thee when thou art on the cliffs: whole suns from me, the light shall give me thy presence in the mimic wonder. Behold thy half-closed eye, thy half-opened lips, for ever smiling on that wall! Lycidas looked on the wall and on Amryllis, and they embraced. Such was the origin of DESIGN†!

Amaryllis, in the absence of Lycidas, passed many hours in contemplating this FIRST PORTRAIT of Love. But the familiarity of enjoyment discovered its imperfections.—Dismal shadow! (she cried) thou pleassest me, because thou resembles Lycidas; but Lycidas would not charm me, did he resemble thee! Where is the soft mutability of his cheek? Melancholy resemblance of a form of gaiety! Only when Lycidas is dead, will he resemble thee!

She held in her lap a treasury of flowers, which she was assorting to weave into a wreath for Lycidas. She took a rose, and continued:—This breathing rose is the hute of his cheek: O, Shade! I will place it on thy cheek! This white LILY is like the snow of his forehead:

* It is a pleasing idea of Apuleius, in his Capid and Psyche, that the LAMP was first invented by a LOVER, that he might, for a longer time, enjoy by NIGHT the object of his desire.

† It is singular that the origin of painting has ever been attributed to the often-repeated story of the Corinthian Maid sketching the shadow of her sleeping lover. But this is only the origin of design, and, in fact, is but a SILBOURNE. I have never been able to trace the origin of colouring to any recorded tradition.

that its splendid whiteness could for ever spread on thine; These blue violets are the purple of his veins; and she delicately laid them along the neck. And this dark eye of the TULIP is black as his brilliant eye: and she fixed it there!

Entranced, she gazed on the illusive shadow: for a moment it was her Lycidas! his beautiful colours lived to her eye. Such was the first essay of COLOURING! The tinted impressions which some of the flowers left behind, gave them afterwards a hint to express, from various plants and minerals, that variety of colours which gave birth to the more perfect parts of PAINTING*!—D'Israeli.

* After this was written, the notion was verified by two facts I discovered: the one, in the life of Carlo Maratti, who, when a child, for want of colours, made use of the juices of roots and flowers. The other, in the History of the Canary Islands, where the author writes, that "some of the Majorcans were good artificers; they built houses and painted them elegantly with the colours which they extracted from certain herbs and flowers upon the island." The Majorcans were then in the infancy of society.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE POLAR BEAR.

These animals inhabit only the coldest parts of the globe, where the savage and dreary landscapes will accord with their sullen disposition.

In the polar regions they are seen in prodigious numbers; not only at land, but often on ice-floats several leagues at sea. They are even sometimes transported in this manner to the shores of Iceland; and after the long abstinence they must necessarily have undergone in the voyage, they will attack every object indiscriminately; but it is said the natives easily elude their fury if they can throw in their way something to amuse them. 'A glove,' says Mr. Horrebow, 'is very proper for this purpose; for the bear will not stir till he has turned every finger inside out, and this consequently takes up sufficient time for the person to escape.'

It often happens, that when a Greenlander and his wife are paddling out at sea, by coming too near an ice-float, a white bear unexpectedly jumps into their boat; and, if he does not over-set it, sits calmly where he first alighted, and like a passenger suffers himself to be rowed along. The Greenlander is never very fond of his unwieldy guest; however, he makes a virtue of necessity, and hospitably rows him to shore.

The Polar bears are sometimes remarkably ferocious; and instances have occurred, in the Island of Nova Zembla, of their attacking seamen, seizing them in their mouths, carrying them off with the utmost ease, and devouring them even in the sight of their comrades.

When irritated or injured, they also exhibit the most obstinate perseverance in seeking revenge, as appears from the following anecdote:—Some years ago, the crew of a boat, belonging to a ship in the whale-fishery, shot at a bear at a little distance, and wounded it. The animal immediately uttered the most dreadful howl, and ran along the ice towards the boat. Before he reached it, a second shot was fired, which hit him. This, however, served but to increase his fury. He presently swam to the boat, and, in attempting to get on board, placed one of his fore feet upon the gunnel; but a sailor, having a hatchet in his hand, cut it off. The animal still continued to swim after them, till they arrived at the ship; and several shots were fired at him, which took effect: but, on reaching the ship, he immediately ascended the deck; and the crew having fled in the shrouds, he was pursuing them thither, when a shot laid him lifeless upon the deck.

The Polar bear brings forth two young at a time; and the affection subsisting between these and the parent is so ardent, that they will sooner die than desert each other in distress. The following anecdote will afford sufficient proof of the veracity of this assertion:—'While the Carcase frigate, which went some years ago to make discoveries towards the North Pole, was locked in the ice, early one morning the man at the mast-head gave notice that three bears were making their way over the Frozen Ocean, and were approaching very fast towards the ship. They had, no doubt, been invited by the scent of some blubber of a sea-horse that the crew had killed a few days before; which had been set on fire, and was burning on the ice at the time of their approach. They proved to be a she bear, and two cubs nearly as large as the dam. They ran eagerly to the fire, and drew out of the flames part of the flesh of the sea-horse, that remained unconsumed, and ate it voraciously. The crew from the ships threw great lumps of the flesh of the sea-horse, which they had still remaining, upon the ice. These the old bear fetched away singly, laid every lump before her cubs as she brought it, and, dividing it, gave to each a share, reserving but a small portion for herself. As she was fetching away the last piece, the sailors levelled their muskets at the cubs, and shot them both dead; and, in her retreat, they wounded the dam, but not mortally. It would have drawn tears of pity from any but unfeeling minds to have witnessed the affectionate concern expressed by this poor animal in the last moments of her expiring young. Though she was herself so dreadfully wounded that she could scarcely crawl to the place where they lay, she carried the lump of flesh she had fetched away, as she had done others before, tore it in pieces, and laid it before them; and when they did not eat, she laid her paws first upon one, and then upon the other, endeavouring to raise them up; uttering the most piteous moans. When she found she could not stir them, she went off; and when she had got to some distance, looked back and moaned; and that not availing to entice them away, she returned, and, smelling round them, began to lick their wounds. She went off a second time as before; and, having crawled a few paces, looked again behind her, and for some time stood moaning. But still her cubs not rising to follow her, she returned to them again; and, with signs of inexpressible tenderness, went round pawing them, and moaning. Finding, at last, that they were cold and lifeless, she raised her head towards the ship, and uttered a growl of despair, which the mariners returned with a volley of musket-balls. She then fell between her cubs, and expired in the act of licking their wounds.'—Weekly Magazine.

VARIETIES.

ANTIQUITIES.

Belzoni has presented to the Fitzwilliam Museum the lid of a Sarcophagus, found by him in one of the tombs of the Kings at Thebes in Upper Egypt. This interesting relic of antiquity arrived at Cambridge on Monday, and after considerable difficulty, (its weight being upwards of three tons) was placed in the court of the Museum. It was brought to England with the rest of the Egyptian monuments, which Mr. Salt, his Majesty's Consul at Cairo, was enabled to collect, principally through the zeal and ingenuity of Mr. Belzoni. The slab is composed of a single block of red granite; its length when entire, exceeds probably ten feet, its breadth is about five feet. The Sarcophagus itself, to which this lid belongs, is, we are informed, on its way from Egypt. On the surface of the granite lid, executed with uncommon spirit and in fine relief, reposes the effigy of the monarch, whose remains were placed in the Sarcophagus itself. The figure is perfect with the exception of the legs, which are mutilated. On either side of the image (within whose hands are the emblems which Osiris constantly carries) appears the profile of a female figure, whose hands touch the body. On a line with these figures, we can clearly trace the Egyptian snake, that invariable companion of all their mystic and sepulchral processions, as we behold them represented in the plates to Belzoni's volume; whilst a snake of uncommon size encircles nearly the whole of the slab.

INDIAN TRADITION.—'We continued our route, sometimes over barren prairies, hills, &c. and at others, through woods, till we arrived at the great Pacific Ocean. Here, the surprise and astonishment of our whole party was indissolubly great. The unheeded view of waters, the incessant and tremendous dashing of the waves along the shore, accompanied with a noise resembling the roar of loud and distant thunder, filled our minds with the most sublime and awful sensations, and fixed on them as immutable truths, the tradition we had received from our old men, that the great waters divide the residence of the Great Spirit, from the temporary abodes of his red children. We here contemplated in silent dread, the immense difficulties over which we should be obliged to triumph after death, before we could arrive at those delightful hunting grounds, which are unalterably destined for such only as do good, and love the Great Spirit. We looked in vain for the stranded and shattered canoes of those who had done wickedly. We could see none, and we were led to hope that they were few in number. We offered up our devotions, or I might rather say, our minds were serious, and our devotions continued, all the time we were in this country, for we had ever been taught to believe, that the Great Spirit resided on the western side of the Rocky Mountains, and this idea continued throughout the journey, notwithstanding the more pacific water boundary assigned to him by our traditional dogmas.'—Hunter.

A HINT TO MISSIONARIES.—'We remained among the Grand Oseges, till early in the next fall. During our stay, I saw a number of white people, who, from different motives, resorted to this nation, among them was a clergyman, who preached several times to the Indians through an interpreter. He was the first Christian preacher that I had ever heard or seen. The Indians treated him with great respect, and listened to his discourses with profound attention; but could not, as I heard them observe, comprehend the doctrines he wished to inculcate. It may be appropriately mentioned here, that the Indians are accustomed, in their own debates, never to speak but one at a time; while all others, constituting the audience, invariably listen with patience and attention till their turn to speak arrives. This respect is still more particularly observed towards strangers; and the slightest deviation from it would be regarded by them as rude, indecorous, and highly offensive. It is this trait in the Indian character which many of the missionaries mistake for a serious impression made on their minds; and which has led to many exaggerated accounts of their conversion to Christianity.'—Hunter.

CHARACTER OF WHITE PEOPLE.—'The accounts of the white people, which the Indians had been very particular in giving me, were no ways flattering to my colour; they were represented as an inferior order of beings, wicked, treacherous, cowardly, and only fit to transact the common drudgeries of life. I was at the same time assured, that my transposition from them to the Indians was for me a most fortunate occurrence; for now I might become an expert hunter, brave warrior, wise counsellor, and possibly a distinguished chief of their nation. All this I considered as true, till the arrival of the traders among us. They were particularly kind and attentive to me, and made me several trifling presents; in consequence of which I in general formed strong attachments for them. They gave me to understand, that what the Indians had told me was incorrect; they informed me, that the white people were numerous, powerful, brave, generous, and good; that they lived in large houses, some of which floated on the great waters; that their towns were very extensive, and filled with people as numerous as the sand; and that they fought with great guns, and could kill many at a single fire. They used various methods to induce me to visit them; but although these reports were in part believed, my curiosity much excited, and my mind filled with wonder and astonishment, at the existence of such extraordinary things; yet, I could not bring my feelings to consent to such a measure."—Hunter.

PHRENOLOGY.—The following is from a Scotch paper:—"On Thursday evening a cast of the head of Mrs. McKinnon (lately executed for murder) was laid before the Phrenological Society. It was contrasted with casts of the heads of a clergyman and of a female of virtuous dispositions, and the differences were striking! In the last two the larger portion of the brain was perceived to lie before the ear, (indicating an ample development of the intellectual organs,) and the coronal surface of the head (the seat of the organs of moral sentiments,) was also observed to be largely expanded!! In the cast of Mrs. McKinnon's head, on the other hand, the larger portion of the brain was visibly situated behind the ear, the forehead was low, and the coronal surface comparatively narrow, indicating a great preponderance of the animal organs over those of the moral sentiments and intellect."

BLUNDERS AND BULLS.—A Correspondent, pointing out the difference between blunders (such as our Gotham stories) and bulls, gives the following as an example of the latter:—"An Irish gentleman having a pair of new boots sent home to him, proceeded to try them on; but after a great deal of labour, and pulling, and straining, till, from the blisters on his hands, he could no longer continue the violent exertion, he desisted, declaring that he perceived very clearly he should never get these boots on till he had worn them a day or two."

GARRICK AND FOOTE.—The success of Garrick's "Stratford Jubilee," which ran ninety nights in one season, so much annoyed Foote, that he was going to burlesque it by a mock procession. A man dressed like Garrick was to be introduced as the principal character, and some one was to address him in his own Jubilee lines—

"A nation's taste depends on you, Perhaps a nation's virtue too."

To which he was to make answer only by clapping his arms like the wings of a cock, and crowing out,—

"Cock-a-doodle-doo!"

Garrick, hearing of this, was so much alarmed, that he got a Nobleman to persuade Foote to abandon his mirth-moving design.

A VIRTUOSO.—The celebrated Professor Blumenbach of Göttingen, has collected a most valuable cabinet of curiosities, which he highly prizes. One morning a friend came to him with a long face, to tell him a very unpleasant circumstance, that he had seen a man get by a ladder into a window of the Professor's house. 'Potztausend! (cried Blumenbach) into which window? I am sorry to say, replied his friend, it was your daughter's. 'O man,' said B. 'you almost frightened me! I thought it had been into my cabinet!'

Keller, the Irish Barrister, was once examining a roguish witness, who, it appeared in the course of examination, had at one time been at the point of death, and had received the last rite of the Romish Church—that of extreme-unction. "So, (says Keller) you were anointed by a priest." "Yes, Sir." "There was little need then, (returned K.) for you were slippery enough already."

During the period when the debates in the Irish Roman Catholic Board were carried on rather stormily, the government papers were continually accusing the leading speakers of disaffection, revolutionary designs, &c. "What can be more absurd," said one of them, Counsellor O'Gorman, to Jerry Keller, "than to bring such charges against me, who as you know have a great stake in the country." "Indeed I know you have, (replied K.) and a great pike-head at the end of it."

AFFINITY OF THE TURKISH AND SCOTTISH DIALECTS.—A Turk, several years ago, made his appearance in Edinburgh, in the costume of his country. Such a spectacle being a great novelty in the gude town, he was generally attended by a crowd of boys, who amused themselves by pestering him. With these he usually got in a passion, and turning fiercely would address them by the most opprobrious name in his vocabulary, "Giaour—G'aur," (Infidel.) While in one of those moods, an old Scotchman took pity on him, and joined, as he thought, in his exhortation—"Fie, lads, dinna fash the pair body sae—do as he een bids ye—do gie ower—gie ower."—(give over.)

FOOTE'S LAST JOKE.—When Foote was on his way to France for a change of air, he went into the kitchen of the inn at Dover to order a particular dish for dinner. The true English cooke, disposed perhaps to smoke the traveller, boasted that for her part she had never set her foot out of her own country. On this the invalid gravely observed, "Why, Cookey, that's very extraordinary, as they tell me above stairs that you have been several times all over Grease."—"They may say what they please above stairs or below stairs (replied the Cooke) but I was never ten miles from Dover in all my life."—"Nay, now, that must be a fib (said Foote) for I have myself seen you at Spit-head." The other servants by this time took the joke, and a roar of laughter followed.—The wag however never reached France. The very next morning he was seized with shivering fits; and he expired in the course of the day (Oct. 21, 1777,) in the 57th year of his age. His body was conveyed to London, and buried in Westminster Abbey by torch-light.

SONG.

Oh, sweet is the gale that blows over the sea
When the cinnamon groves are in bloom,
But the breeze that shall waft back my lover to me
Will be fraught with a richer perfume.
Oh, I'll fly to his heart—to his lips—
To be press'd in joy's exquisite swoon,
As the fond star Rohini, when past the eclipse,
Rejoiceth her well beloved moon.

Return then, my darling, and by the clear rills,
Where the blue lotos springs, let us rove:
Like a sandal-tree rent from its own native hills,
I languish, bereft of my love!
To you there are many like me—
But to me there are none like you—
As the moon many groves of sweet night-flowers may see,
But the night-flow'rs one moon only view.

A MONODY

On the Death of John Philip Kemble, written by a gentleman of this town, and spoken by Mr. SALTER, at the Theatre Royal, on Monday evening last.

Beneath thy green and verdant sod Lausanne!
Sleep the last relics of the exelling man;
Though low the tomb where rests his mortal frame,
A living lustre hovers o'er his name;
That name, an echo, which nor Death nor Time
Can quench, shall live—imperishable—sublime:
The glorious spirit to the skies hath fled,
But still breathes round the essences it shed:
For his shall be, a life renewed again,
A better being—in the Heart's of men;
A lasting monument—a tomb of praise—
A crown of splendour—an ethereal blaze—
To light the future, shall its glories last,
To charm the present, and to gild the past.
The mighty Actor, like a dream, hath gone,
And dead is He the Drama's greatest Son;
His ashes Genius hallows with a tear,
And taste broods sadly o'er his silent bier;
The mortal sire of an immortal name,
The British Roscius in the hall of fame,
Hath passed away in glory and in light—
A dying sun still beautiful and bright—
A dying sun whose beams have left behind
A golden radiance in the clouds enshrined!
His was the power to paint with hand of light,
The subtle workings of the soul aright;
The deep convulsions of the heart to show—
Wild passion's frenzy, and corroding woe—
The desolation of a heart o'erthrown—
The noble nature—sullied to his own—

The stately Roman proud, unbending, stern—
The warrior bursting from his marble urn—
The quenchless spirit—the fierce eye of fire—
The darkest vengeance, and the deepest ire,
To paint were his, and in such matchless wise,
The image would, like glowing life, arise
To each emotion, and to nature true,
He lost himself, and other beings grew;
And such perception o'er his models ran
The Actor sunk embodied in the Man.
Respected honour'd did THE KEMBLE fall,
His country's idol, and the boast of all,
And, in the hearts of those who knew him best,
His recollection shall for ever rest;
His social virtue, and his friendly love
A brighter laurel to his brows shall prove;
He lived in honour, and he died in fame,
And still shall glow—the splendour of his name;
His last proud triumph, that his lonely bier
Was fondly watered by a Nation's tear!

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

MR. PERKINS' STEAM-ENGINE.

We have no recollection of any invention connected with the useful arts having produced so great a sensation among scientific men, as the improved steam-engine of Mr. Perkins. It is not surprising that manufacturers, whose interests are entirely involved in the construction of engines on the low-pressure system, should look with some degree of scepticism and jealousy towards the bold invention of Mr. P.; nor that they should raise doubts in the public mind as to the imminent danger to be apprehended from the use of high-pressure engines generally. But in the present case, many scientific men, totally unconnected with manufactures, seemed disinclined; in the first instance, to admit the possibility of the improvements suggested by Mr. P. being reduced to practice.

Notwithstanding the superior economy and increase of power in high-pressure engines of the usual construction has been gradually introducing them in various manufactories, where the proprietors take the precaution of employing only men of intelligence to superintend their concerns; the enormous increase of power ascribed to the engine of this gentleman's invention seemed perfectly incredible, until he produced conviction by the actual test of experiment. As we have had an opportunity of witnessing the operation of this beautiful invention, we shall give our readers as good an outline of its construction as we are enabled without the aid of a plate for reference.

Mr. P.'s invention is founded on a most invaluable discovery—that water is capable of enduring an elevation of temperature even to a red heat, or perhaps an indefinite extent, by being subjected to a very high degree of pressure; which pressure, while it permits the expansion of the molecules of water as a fluid, prevents their farther expansion, or the liquid assuming the gaseous form of steam.

The profound science and resolution, requisite to manage experiments of this dangerous character, can only be appreciated by those who have devoted some attention to chemical subjects. This gentleman, however, has united to this discovery respecting the laws of expansion, the most simple and beautiful application of mechanical science, in the construction of his new steam-engine, which is briefly as follows:—Instead of the boiler of the ordinary engines, Mr. P. substitutes a cylinder, which he terms the generator. This cylinder is made of gun-metal (the most tenacious and least liable to oxydation) of about three inches in thickness, closed at both ends, with the exception of a valve in the top, opening outwards; which valve is loaded with weights equal to the state of the pressure from the expansion of the heated water within. The cylinder is placed vertically in a cylindrical furnace; consequently it becomes surrounded on all sides with the fire, and soon acquires a temperature of 400 to 450° Fahrenheit. The production of steam is effected by an injecting-pump throwing in water at one part of the generator, which displaces through the valve an equal volume of hot water from the generator. This water, at 420° passing into the induction or steam-pipe, instantly expands into steam, communicates with the working cylinder, and gives motion to its piston, which is placed in a horizontal direction, for the more convenient application of its power to machinery. The reciprocal action of the piston opens and shuts the apertures of the induction and eduction pipes, by means of rotatory valves, as usual in some other engines. But the operation of generating and condensing the steam is effected so instantaneously by this engine, that the piston performs about 200 strokes in a minute, when the engine is at full work. Indeed, considering the small extent of surface, the power of this engine is almost incredible, the generator containing only about eight gallons of water, and the working cylinder not exceeding two inches diameter, with a stroke of the piston about 12 inches in length. The piston rod gives motion to a crank and fly-wheel similar to other engines.

A most decided improvement is also made by Mr. P. in condensing the steam under a very great degree of pressure, and at a temperature of about 320°, and in this state returning it into the reservoir for the successive supply of the generator. In consequence of this economical arrangement, the space occupied by the engine with all its appurtenances, does not exceed an area of six feet by eight. The present model is calculated as equal to a 10-horse power: and Mr. P. considers the whole of the apparatus of sufficient size for a 30-horse engine, with the exception of the working cylinder and piston. The consumption of coal for this engine is within two bushels per day, when at full work!

All risk of accident is effectually provided against, by the following ingenious contrivance. It should be remembered, that owing to the small extent of surface exposed to the expansive force of the steam, and the latter being generated only in sufficient quantity for each succeeding stroke of the piston, there is much less liability to accident from this engine than in most other high-pressure engines. To prevent, however, the possibility of such an event, the induction pipe, in which the steam is produced, is calculated to withstand an internal force of 4000 pounds to the square inch, and it is also provided with a thin copper tube, which is calculated to burst at a pressure of 1000 pounds; while the pressure under which Mr. P. works the engine does not exceed 500 pounds on the square inch.

In order to demonstrate the perfect safety of the operation of this engine, notwithstanding this immense internal pressure, Mr. P. in his polite efforts to satisfy the scruples and fears of his numerous scientific friends, has, on several occasions urged the power of the steam till it bursts open the sides of the copper tube without occasioning the smallest risk, either to the spectator, or to any other part of the apparatus. This mode of allowing the escape of the steam by rending open the sides of the ball, (which is made of a determinate strength,) is probably superior in the certainty of its operation to any modification of safety valves.

It is also a very remarkable fact, that the steam which escapes in this case is not by any means of that elevated temperature which might have been expected from its prodigious expansive force. This fact seems to involve some points connected with the doctrine of latent heat, or the conversion of fluid into gaseous matter, and vice versa, with which we are, at present, but very imperfectly acquainted. We understand Mr. P. is further engaged on some very important enquiries on this most intricate branch of natural philosophy.

The improvements of Mr. P. in the steam-engine, we cannot help considering as one of the greatest triumphs of art, even in this highly inventive age. It will, in all probability, effect a greater revolution in operative manufactures, than even the first introduction of the steam-engine by Bolton and Watt.

We have not heard any comparative estimate of the price of Mr. P.'s engines, but we apprehend their original cost will be very considerably lower than that of others; while they can be worked with 1-10th part of the fuel, and occupy only a fifth part of the space required for those of the low-pressure construction. The latter point is one of the highest importance, in situations where manufacturers are limited for room, as in the metropolis and other great towns.

The very superior economy of these engines over all others, not only in the consumption of fuel and water, but in the weight of materials, must also render them peculiarly adapted for loco-motive engines; and we entertain little doubt that steam carriages will, ere another 20 years have elapsed, become as generally adopted among us as steam vessels are at the present. And when we take into consideration the immense saving in the consumption and tonnage of coals, we are of opinion that Mr. P.'s invention will infinitely extend the use of the steam-engine in navigation.—Museum.

THE PHILANTHROPIST.

MR. BARRON.—The following Paper, on Inhumanity to the Brute Creation, is extracted, with alterations, from an excellent Dissertation, on that subject, by the Rev. Dr. Primatt, and I hope its intrinsic merit will entitle it to an early notice.—Young persons cannot be taught too early the lessons of humanity. The arguments used by the learned Author of this Dissertation have both novelty and cogency to recommend them.

Yours, S. X.

ON INHUMANITY TO THE BRUTE CREATION.

Abridged from a Dissertation, by the Rev. Dr. Primatt, on the duty of Mercy, and the sin of Cruelty, to Brute Animals.

THE man of feeling, who is influenced by a sense of justice, will not put another man to unmerited pain; because, as a christian, he will not do that to another which he is unwilling should be done to himself. Superiority of strength, or of the accidents of fortune, rank, or station, may and do give ability to communicate happiness to others; but they give no right to inflict unnecessary or unmerited pain, or to wound the feelings of those who have been less fortunate in the possession of those advantages. A wise man would impeach his own wisdom, were he to infer that he had a right to despise or make game of a fool. The folly of a fool ought rather to excite his compassion; in some degree he is entitled to the wise man's care and attention, since he is unable to take care of himself.

By the appointment of a wise and benevolent Providence, some men are clothed with white skins, and others with skins of a darker hue; but as there is neither merit nor demerit in complexion, the white man can have no right, by virtue of his colour, to enslave and tyrannize over one whose skin is either tawney or black. Neither has a fair man any right to despise and insult a brown man; or a tall man, by virtue of his larger stature, to trample a dwarf under his foot.

Now, if amongst men the differences of their powers of mind, and of their complexion, stature, and accidents of fortune, do not give one man a right to abuse or insult any other man, on account of those differences; for the same reason, no man, no human being can have a natural right to abuse or torment a beast, merely because the latter has not the intellectual powers of a man. Such as the man is, he is but as God made him; and the very same is also true of the beast, or the reptile. Neither the man, nor the beast, nor the reptile can lay claim to any intrinsic merit, merely for being such as they respectively are; for before they were brought into existence, it was impossible that any of them could deserve a preference; and at their creation, their shapes, perfections, or apparent imperfections were invariably fixed, and their boundaries set which they cannot pass. There is, therefore, no more demerit in a beast's being a beast, a reptile a reptile, than there is merit in a man's being a man; that is, there is neither merit nor demerit in any of them.

A brute is an animal no less sensible of acute pain than a man. He has similar nerves and organs of sensation; his cries and his groans, in case of violent impressions made upon his body, are as strong, unequivocal intimations to us of his sensibility of pain, as the more articulate cries and groans of a human being, whose language we better understand. Now as pain is what we are all averse to, our own sensibility and dislike of pain should teach us to commiserate it in others, and to alleviate it if possible; but, at all events, never wantonly and needlessly to inflict it.

As the accidental differences amongst men are no impediments to their feelings, so neither does the difference of shape or figure of a brute from that of a man exempt the brute from feeling. And as the difference of complexion, or stature does not convey to one man a right to despise or abuse another, so neither does the difference of shape between a man and a brute give to the former any right to abuse or torment the latter. He who made man and man to differ, in complexion, or stature, made man and brute to differ in shape and figure. And in this case, likewise, as in the former statement, there is neither merit nor demerit; every creature, whether man or brute, bearing that shape and peculiar organization which the supreme Wisdom judged most expedient to answer the end for which each was ordained. And it is solely owing to the good pleasure of God, that We are created men, and that brutes are formed what they are, and each in their appropriate shape and figure; but Nature never intended these distinctions as foundations for right of tyranny and oppression. "Do as you would be done by," is a truly christian maxim, and ought not to be confined to the treatment which one man receives, or is willing to receive of another; on the contrary, it may with equal propriety be extended to the brute creation. Do you, that are a man, so treat your horse, (for example,) as you would be willing, were you a horse, to be treated by your master. There is no absurdity or false reasoning in this application of the divine precept, nor any ill consequences likely to result from it, however contrary it may be to the barbarity which too much prevails, it must be lamented, in the general treatment of the brute creation.

In actions of humanity, where injury has been done, satisfaction may sometimes be rendered. You can make amends, in various ways, to a man for wrongs he may have sustained. You know his wants, and may relieve him. You may be as feet to the lame, and as eyes to the blind. You may supply him with every comfort and convenience which he is capable of enjoying. But to the injured brute, no adequate recompence can be made. If by passion, or malice, or sportive cruelty, his limbs have been broken, his eye-sight greatly impaired, or his constitution fatally injured, who or what can make the poor animal amends? He is maimed, perhaps, or blinded for ever, and rendered incapable of gaining his future subsistence; his little temporary happiness (which was his all to him!) is completely marred; and he is either doomed to a violent and premature death, or he is left to drag on a miserable and painful existence, till Nature puts a final termination to all his sufferings by a lingering or an agonizing death.

SANCHO SENSITIVE'S ADVENTURE.

I had occasion to call upon an old woman who lived in a mean and obscure part of our town. The direction to her residence being very explicit and minute, and my knowledge of the town in general, precluded the necessity of a guide, and I therefore proceeded on the errand alone. It was on the Monday morning when I set out from my habitation, situated at the south entrance of Manchester. After an hour's perambulation, during which I had traversed a many back and cross streets, and made numberless enquiries, I found the street I was in search of; and in a few minutes more I was, as I supposed, at the house of the old woman. I, however, paused a moment to con over my card of direction, and on examination found I was right. The house stood in the same relative position to a small shop, the corner of a certain street, and public house, as the one described in my instructions. But I recollected she had been described as keeping a lodging house; I looked over the door but saw no sign-board. There was, however, a bill of some kind in the window, which, on examining with the help of my spectacles, I found to contain the following curious notification—

"Lodgings for a single man and his wife."

I was now quite assured that this was the place I had been in search of. I put up my glasses, and seized hold of the latch, which gave way to the pressure of my thumb, and the door opened. Just at that moment a child cradled by the fire side, awakened by the noise I had made, began to cry.

No one save the infant appeared to be in the house; I gave at first a gentle tap, and after waiting a proper time and receiving no answer, I knocked a little louder, but still nobody spoke. I then applied my clenched fist to the door pretty vigorously, but it was all in vain, for still nobody answered; and all the while the child was weeping most pitifully, which with my hallooing, knocking, and rattling the latch, formed a strange and most discordant uproar. I stood a few moments in this manner, holding the half opened door in my hand, without knowing how to proceed. Some one I was sure must have the infant in charge, and whoever it might be I thought they certainly were not far distant. Besides, a pan upon the fire, and some very fresh potatoe peelings on the table, plainly indicated that the inhabitants of the mansion could not have been long departed. I thought perhaps the old woman was above stairs taking a comfortable nap, but then it was forenoon, and she would have been awakened ere this by the noise that was made. Then it occurred to me that she might be gone to chat with some neighbour, also the probability of her being gone out upon some trifling errand forcibly presented itself to me; in either of which cases her return might naturally be expected very soon. Thus I endeavoured to sooth my impatience in the best manner I could.

The business on which I came was of little or no consequence; nor in fact was it that which made me so anxious and impatient for the arrival of some one. It was the extreme awkwardness of the circumstances in which I was placed. I ever had an imagination prone to magnify evils, and make a fool of me, and in the present instance I felt it in full action. I was irritated beyond measure, and would have given any thing to be released from my disagreeable situation.

I felt somehow as though by awakening, I had subjected myself to a responsibility for the safety of the child; and by opening the door, was identified with, and answerable for, the habitation; and I felt the trust press upon me with an oppressive and unbearable weight. I durst not withdraw. I seemed to be riveted to the spot by the power of destiny. A thousand times I wished that I had knocked at the door, for it was by opening it I conceived all these calamities had fallen upon me. Had I gone away at first I should have escaped this horrid dilemma.

In some situations, and at some seasons, it may be said we have scarcely right reason. We cannot judge properly, nor estimate correctly. The imagination is confused. We forget what relation and proportion things have with, and bear to, each other, and the more we struggle and the more we are entangled in our embarrassments.

Concluding that somebody would shortly appear, I remained where I was in the greatest impatience. The little infant still continued its wailing, and I began to feel a sort of compassion for it, but I knew not what to do. At length I bethought me that stirring the cradle might perhaps again lull it to sleep; so I ventured into the house to try the experiment. I took up the end of the cradle string and began to pull backwards and forwards, accompanying and aiding the soothing influence of the motion with my voice (I have a charming voice) to the tune of

Rocka be—Rock a by,
Be—bo—baby—O—&c.

Certes every body will say I was laudably and humanely employed, although I dare say I cut a rather strange figure in my novel employment. After rocking gently about five minutes my little charge ceased its cries. Determined, however, to make sure work, I kept on a little longer, when being, as I thought, perfectly safe, and congratulating myself on my success, I gave over, and with the utmost possible caution went on tip-toe across the floor, resolving to await the arrival of somebody without the door. But just as I was stepping out, and pulling the door after me very gently, the little urchin again began to squall out as loud as ever.

I must own I was now almost distracted. I was a perfect fury. "Must I never," cried I aloud, "must I never be released from these cursed embarrassments—from these difficulties—from this worse than African bondage! But my complaints were unattended to. Nobody came to relieve me, and I had no other alternative than to walk back again, and resume my former employment. Accordingly I went in, and again took up the rocking string; but previous to putting my machine in motion, I thought I would just have a peep at the being on whose account I was suffering such terrible agonies. I drew nigh the cradle, and bended over it to have a nearer survey. At my approach it ceased crying. The child was really a very pretty little creature; but being just then so much under the influence of ill-humour, I thought I had never seen such an ugly wretch before. "What a pair of eyes! and what a mouth. Hush! you little ill-looking noisy imp!" for on hearing me speak so gruffly it again began to moan. Then I commenced rocking, and after a little time all was silence, save the monotonous swinging jee-jow of the cradle.

While I stood performing my irksome task, my thoughts were busily engaged in forming plans of deliverance and schemes of emancipation. I could, however, fix upon nothing that was likely to answer; and I sometimes felt my face glow with vexation, and at others flush with shame, at being thus pinned down to so ludicrous an employment. Still nobody came, and my stock of forced patience was nearly exhausted. I had been standing upon tenter books for some time, and at length I broke forth and ran out of the house, resolving to leave the infant to its fate; thinking that if those connected with it had so little affection for it, it could not reasonably be expected that a stranger would have much. But still I durst not leave the premises, and I paraded before the door like a centinel.

After a little time had elapsed, the child I could hear was awake, by its cries, which became louder and louder every moment. I was, however, for some time invincible to all the attacks of pity: but at length an apprehension that, as I might have been seen coming out of the house, some one might think I had done something at the child, and my compassion, conquered my resolution, I entered the house again.

Before I had crossed the floor, a pan upon the fire began to boil over furiously. I instantly ran to lift it off, but while doing this, I happened to let the handle slip, and a splash of the liquid went into the fire, on which there arose such a sudden column of steam, that in order to save myself from being miserably scalded I was forced to quit my hold entirely, and the pan fell upon the hearth, and emptied its contents (half-boiled potatoes) in all directions over the floor.

On examination I found my fingers were flayed by the steam, and my clothes were covered all over with soot and ashes. I drew out my handkerchief, and gave my face a rub down; but perceiving my handkerchief to be rather sullied, I went to a small looking glass which hung against the wall, where I found my phiz to be in a most ridiculous plight. It had been covered with soot and ashes exalted by the steam, and I had lengthened each particle so, that I at first thought my face was covered with black and grey hairs.

I was now in a pretty mess; I could find no water in the house, and after all my rubbing I could bring my face to no better colour than that of a tinker's. My shirt and neckcloth were also tinged of a dusky hue, and added to these was the pain of my scalded hand. I thought if the old woman should come in now, she will find her house in a pretty state—the child shrieking—the fire out—and the dinner lying half cooked in all directions upon the floor.

This adventure, however, brought me some little to my senses, and all at once it occurred to me how easily I might have got one of the neighbours to have taken charge of the child. Hiding my dirty face with my handkerchief, and vexed I had not thought of the thing before, I ran out to the next door, but nobody was in—I went to the next, nobody in—to a third, nobody in; I then went to the fourth, and it was just the same, the door was fast. There were no more houses in the row, and on the opposite side of the street was a long dead wall, and the alleys before-mentioned. I did not like to apply there; besides, the landlady and a fine daughter had, I fancied, from the window of the tap-room, been watching me for some time, and with a malicious pleasure, enjoying my awkward situation. Well, I walked back very melancholy to the other end of the row, and as I passed the house could hear the little infant pouring forth its unceasing cries. There appeared, however, no other plan but of finding some one to take charge of it. Looking up a cross street, I saw at some little distance two houses, the doors of which were open. I went forward and perceived the first house to be full of women—all the gossips in the neighbourhood, as I supposed—talking in a loud and confused manner. Possibly, thought I, the very woman I want is here. I went up to the door, and all were silent—I enquired if Mary S— was there? "Here I am," said one advancing from out of the group. "Are you Mary S—?" "Yes, Sir." "Why how happens it that you could leave your child so long? it has almost shrieked itself to death," said I. "Eh, dear!" she exclaimed, with the greatest eagerness, "has it? I have not been gone above five minutes!" "Five hours, more likely," rejoined I. I have got it to sleep myself several times. I have been waiting for you three quarters of an hour by my watch, and have scolded myself with that cursed pan of your's.

We now both together proceeded to her house, and she seemed amazed at the state in which she found it. Mutual explanations, however, set all things to rights, and after disclosing my business, I left the house with feelings similar to those of a man just emancipated from slavery.

As I proceeded home, I summed up the events of the morning thus:—I have been transformed into a dry nurse, and an unfortunate cook! I have spoiled a suit of clothes, and my shirt will have to undergo the operation of the fulling mill, to restore it to its original colour.—My fingers have been scalded, and I have had my face tanned.—One lesson I have learned which will henceforth be of use—always to knock at the door! and I have likewise experienced that by perseverance, we may at length be extricated from the greatest difficulties.

While I was in my awkward predicament, I could not help frequently calling myself a fool for making such a fuss about nothing; but I do declare, I never was in all my life so embarrassed, so perplexed, so irritated, and so fooled by fancy, and the impression made upon my feelings will never be obliterated, though at the same time I can never think of that adventure without laughter.

EYAM BANKS.

BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

From the Story of Riley Grave Stones.

On Eyam Banks the grass is green;
In Eyam dell, how fair
The violets blow, and mirthsome birds
With wild song fill the air!
With wild song fill the summer air;
And streamlets, as they go,
Sing, glad to see the old men sit,
With whiter beads than snow.

So Time goes now—but o'er my youth
Time far more rudely swept;
Alike the green ear and the ripe
Were by his sickle reap'd:
From glowing morn till dewy eve,
'Twas nought but woe and wail
In gentle Eyam's fairy dell,
And gentle Eyam's vale.

As I came down by Eyam banks,
The harvest moon rode high;
I heard the virgins weeping loud,—
The mother's mournful cry:
The mother raised a mournful cry,
The father sobb'd his woe,
As from each door in Eyam vale
I saw the corpses go.

"O, did they die by slow disease?
Or died they in the flood?
Or did they when the battle-field
Flow'd ankle-deep in blood—
Flow'd ankle-deep in English blood?"
He heard, nor answer'd he,
But shook his head, all hoary white,
And sang on mournfully.

O, When I reach'd my true-love's door,
And knock'd with love-knocks three,
No milk-white hand and downcast eye
Came forth to welcome me;
For silent, silent was the hearth,
And empty was the chair—
Within my true-love's bower I look'd,
And saw that death was there.

One sister at her head sat mate,
Her brother at her feet—
A lovely babe lay in her arms,
And seem'd in slumber sweet.
I made her bed in Eyam dell,
Where first the primrose peeps,
And wild birds sing, and violets spring—
And there my true-love sleeps.

THE TARANTULA.

It has often been asserted that the bite of the Tarantula has been cured by music; the following copy of a letter on the subject, from a late eminent musician, may in some degree authenticate the report—

SIR,—According to your desire, I send you an account of the effect the bite of a Tarantula has on the human body. I shall only give a distinct detail of all the circumstances that I have seen, having once been instrumental at the cure of a poor ploughman that was bit by that insect. I do not undertake to give you any account of the Tarantula itself, being sure you are perfectly well acquainted with it; I shall only tell you what has happened in my country, at a small village called La Torre della Annunziata, about ten miles from Naples, where I was at the time.

It was in the month of October, a season of the year when all the students in Naples that have any relations in the country have leave to visit them. I was one of those that enjoyed the privilege of visiting the place of my nativity; and as I was then studying music in the College of Naples, generally, when I went into the country, brought my violin with me. It happened one day that a poor man was taken ill in the street, and it was soon known to be the effect of the Tarantula, because the country people have some undoubted signs to know it; and particularly, they say, that the Tarantula bites on the tip, or under lip of the ear, because the Tarantula bites one when sleeping on the ground, and the wounded part becomes black, which happens three days after the bite, exactly at the hour when the hart was received: and they further assert, that if no one was to undertake to cure the patient, he would feel the effect of it every day at the same hour, for the space of three or four hours, till it would throw him into such madness as to destroy him in about a month's time. Some, they say, have lived three months after they have been bit; but this I cannot believe, because it never happens that any man is suffered to die by such distemper, the priest of the parish being obliged to play on the fiddle in order to cure them; and it has not been known in the memory of man that any one died of it.

But to proceed.—A poor man was taken ill in the street, and, as the priest was out of the way, several gentlemen begged of me to play for the poor fellow. I could not help going, without offending a number of friends. When I arrived I saw a man stretched on the ground, who seemed as if he was just going to expire; the people, at sight of me, cried out, 'Play! Play! The Tarantella!' (which is a tune made use of on such occasions.) It happened that I had never heard that tune, consequently could not play it. I asked what sort of tune it was. They answered, that it was a kind of jig. I tried several jigs, but to no purpose, for the man was as motionless as before. The people still called out for the Tarantella. I told them I could not play it, but if any would sing it, I would learn it immediately. An old woman presented herself to me to do the good office, who sung it in such an unintelligible sound of voice, that I could not form an idea of it; but another woman came, and helped me to learn it, which I did in about ten minutes time, being a short one. But you must observe that while I was learning the tune, and happened to feel the strain of the first two bars, the man began to move accordingly, and got up as quick as lightning, and seemed as if he had been awakened by some frightful vision, and wildly stared about, still moving every joint of his body. As I had not yet learned the whole of the tune, I left off playing, not thinking it would have any effect on the man; but the instant I left off playing, the man fell down, and cried out very loud, and distorted his face, legs, arms, and every other part of his body, scorching the earth with his hands, and was in such contortions, that clearly indicated him to be in miserable agonies. I was frightened out of my wits, and made all the haste I could to learn the rest of the tune; which done, I played about four yards from him. The instant he heard me, he rose up as he did before, and danced as hard as any man could do; his dancing was very wild; he kept a perfect time in the dance, but had neither rule nor manner, only jumped and ran to and fro, and made very comical postures, something like the Chinese dances we have sometimes seen on the stage. He perspired all over; and then the people cried out, 'faster faster!' meaning that I should give a quicker motion to the tune; which I did so quick, that I could hardly keep up playing, and the man still danced in time. I was very much fatigued; and though I had several persons behind me, some drying the perspiration from my face, others blowing with a fan to keep me cool (for it was about two o'clock in the afternoon), others distancing the people that they might not throng about me, I suffered a long patience to keep up such long time; for I played above two hours, without the least interval.

When the man had danced about an hour, the people gave him a naked sword, which he applied with the point in the palms of his hands, and made the sword jump from one hand to the other; which sword he held in equilibrium, and still kept dancing. The people knew he wanted a sword, because he scratched his hands very hard, as if he would tear the flesh from them. When he had well pricked his hands, he got hold of the sword by the handle, and pricked also the upper part of his feet; and in about five minutes time his hands and feet bled in great abundance. He continued to use the sword for about a quarter of an hour, sometimes pricking his hands and sometimes his feet, with little or no intermission, and then he threw it away and kept on dancing. When he was quite spent with fatigue, his motions began to grow slower; but the people begged of me to keep up the same tune, and as he could not dance accordingly, he only moved his body and kept time. At last, after two hours dancing, he fell down quite motionless, and I gave over playing. The people took him up and carried him into a house, and put him into a large tub of tepid water, and a surgeon bled him in both his hands and feet, and took from him a great quantity of blood. They then put him into a bed, and gave him a cordial, which they forced down because he kept his teeth very close. About five minutes after, he perspired a great deal, and fell asleep for five or six hours. When he awoke he was perfectly well, only weak from the great loss of blood he had sustained, and four days after he was intirely recovered, for I saw him walk in the streets; and what is remarkable, that he hardly remembered any thing of what had happened to him. He never felt any other pains since, nor does any one, except they are bit again by the Tarantula.

STEPHEN STORACE.

THE PYRAMID OF DRINK.

(Condensed from the Museum.)

Most of our male readers have doubtless been drunk once at least in their lives. Let them not be offended with this supposition—if it be not true, so much the worse for themselves. Their sobriety is no virtue,—no more entitled to approbation than the sobriety of a horse; an animal proverbial for making a dry meal. But though they may have been drunk once or many times, it is not probable that they have philosophised so deeply as we have on this subject. In truth we have had glorious opportunities of trying various experiments, and, to do ourselves justice, we have always made the most of them. It is not easy to say whether our imagination are most benefited by getting drunk, or our judgment by getting sober.

The operation of drink in its various degrees we shall represent by a pyramid, as thus:—

Sobriety is a state, unfortunately, too well known to need description; suffice it to say that the sober moments which immediately succeed to dinner are the most miserable in existence. The languor, the sense of utter inefficiency mental and bodily are dreadful. After a few glasses you ascend the first step of the pyramid, and become comfortable. In this state you are not much disposed to talk. There is a tranquil luxury in your feelings, and a reverie comes on, which, if you drink no more, is likely to terminate in sleep. A philosopher seldom passes this point, except in company.

Drink on and you step up to the lively. Now you begin to talk, and your remarks are smart and pertinent. You have the reasoning power in high perfection, but aided withal by a happy fertility of illustration. This may be considered as a mental aurora announcing that the sun of fancy is about to rise from the 'purple wave.'

Fresh.—There is more fire and colour in your ideas now, for that sun has risen. You grow more eloquent and less logical. Your jokes are capital—in your own estimation. Your perceptions, however, are still tolerably clear, beyond yourself.

Very fresh.—Your conversation is more and more highly coloured. Your eloquence is impassioned, and you overwhelm your companions with a flood of talk. You begin to suit the action to the word. Ideas not quite coherent, but language still tolerably distinct and correct.

Tipsy.—Now on the top of the pyramid you begin to grow giddy. Gestures very vehement, and epithets much exaggerated. Argumentative, but not rational. Words considerably abridged, and ideas lamentably obscured.

Very tipsy.—You find out that you have a turn for vocal music, and regale your friends with a solo. Speechily in incoherent language, and evinces a most decided tendency to mischief and locomotion. Proud as a peacock, stout as a lion, and amorous as a dove.

Drunk.—Perversely quarrelsome, and stupidly god-natured. Dealing much in shake hands, and knock-downs. Tongue stammering, and feet unsteady.

Very drunk.—Abortive efforts to appear sober. See every thing double. Balance totally lost, you drift about like a ship in a hard gale. Vocabulary reduced to a few interjections.

Stupidly drunk.—Head and stomach topsy-turvy. Eyes fixed and glaring. Utter incapacity of speech and locomotion, accompanied with an indistinct yet horrid consciousness of your situation.

Dead drunk.—An apopleptic sleep, and confused dreams of the devil or your creditors.

THE CABINET.

THE CORPSE.

I went to L— immediately. He was in the room with the corpse; and was sitting beside it when I entered. The moment he beheld me, he fell upon my neck and wept—for the first time, as I was afterwards told, since the catastrophe had happened. He wept long, very long. At last he seemed relieved;—he raised himself—took me by the hand, and led me to the coffin.

I had never seen her during life—but even now she was surpassingly beautiful. Cold, marble-pale, and rigid, she looked like one of those beautiful sculptures which are placed upon old tombs, in effigy of those who sleep below. The delicate and extreme clearness of the skin was become sheet-white—partly, as I believe, from the common effect of death,—and partly from the nature of her particular malady. The face alone was uncovered—long grave clothes closely enveloped the whole frame to the neck—and a napkin was over her brow. So smooth and softly white was the flesh, that it could scarcely be distinguished where the one ended, and the other began. From beneath this, however, one long tress of hair escaped, which, passing across the cheek, rested upon the shroud. This struck me more than all, for this gave the contrast of life with the perfect deadliness of all else. So still in the stillness of peace,—so calm in the calmness of purity,—was this corpse of loveliness and virtue, that one scarce could think that the King of Terrors had claimed it for his own. It looked, as I have said, more like the figure on a pale sarcophagus—or perhaps, more like one in a deep, a very deep, sleep—than the soulless wreck of passed humanity. But this one tress of bright hair, shining on the white skin—like a fling of golden sunlight upon snow—recalled the terrible truth at once. The hair is the latest portion of the human frame to betray the consequence of death. While the eyes become glazed, and the nerves fixed, and the flesh grows colourless and icy cold,—the hair is the same that it was when it added so much beauty to beautiful life—when it waved in the wind, or gleamed in the sun, as the quick motion of youth might influence.

Yes, she was, indeed, lovely!—and what was this loveliness now?—almost already touched by that decay from which, though we know it to be inevitable, our nature causes us to shrink so sickeningly! Sad, indeed, is it to gaze upon a face we love, beaming in all the brightness of beautiful youth, and reflect that that flesh will moulder, and finally become dust,—that those eyes will cease to be,—and nought remain but an hideous and revolting bone, undistinguishable from that which formed the head of the coarsest or most brutal. What, then, must it be to look upon a countenance thus beautiful, and thus loved, when this terrible and disgusting process has nearly begun?—But this is a part of the subject too horrid to be dwelt upon.

There is, however, another idea, which has always risen within me, with a revolted feeling, when I have gazed on one thus about to be placed in the grave. I mean all the preparation (I might almost say decoration) which the senseless clay has undergone, to be laid to its fellow-earth. Why that lively of death—that uniform of the grave, in which all are equally wrapped? The Ruling Passion even of Narcissus is not strong after death;—we then, surely, need no adornment. The dress in which we chanced to be habited when the spirit passed, might, one would think, suffice to decorate the physical body which is left behind. But this coffin, into which I looked, was, besides all this, quilted throughout with satin, and a pillow of the same material supported the head,—as if the fair cheek could now taste its softness! Alas, alas, how paltry do these mockeries appear to us at such a moment!

I had ample time to gaze my fill, and to think of all these things, and many more;—for L— placed himself at the head of the coffin, and remained there, with his head bowed in his hands upon its edge. Low deep groans struggled from him at intervals—and the cold sweat was clammy on his brow. At length they came to fasten down the coffin. I wanted him to go with me from the room,—but the paroxysms of his despair were so terrible, when I strove to draw him towards the door, that I thought it better to desist.—He flung himself upon the body, and fastened his lips upon her's—now so damp and rigid.—There he lay, as if he would have lain for ever;—at last, I gently raised him up, and signed to the men to replace the lid.—They did so at once. L— gazed at them as if he were changed to stone;—but when he heard the grinding sound of the first screw, as it was driven down into the wood, he uttered a loud and terrible shriek, and fell senseless into my arms.—Aham.

O DARK, DARK IS THIS MIDNIGHT HOUR

BY BURNS.

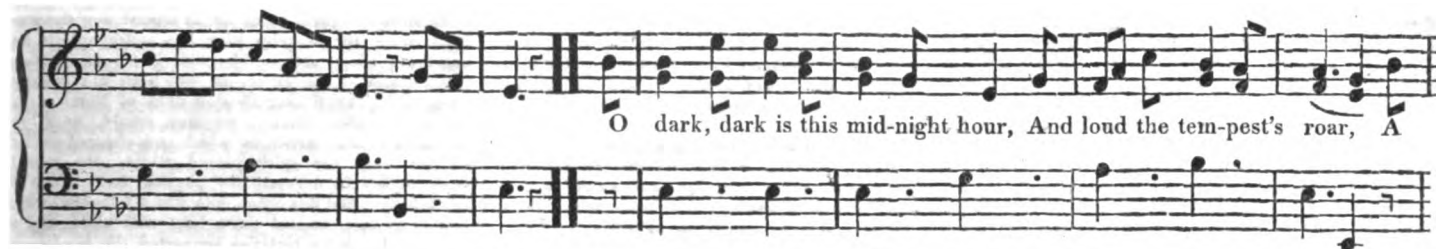

O dark, dark is this midnight hour,
And loud the tempest's roar;
A woeful wanderer seeks thy tower,
Lord Gregory ope thy door.
An exile from her father's hall,
And all for loving thee;
At least some pity on me show,
If love it may not be.—O dark, &c.
Lord Gregory, mind'st thou not the groans,
By bonny Irwine-side,
Where first I own'd that virgin-love
I long, long had desired.
How often didst thou pledge and vow,
Thou wouldst for aye be mine;
And my fond heart, itself so true,
It ne'er mistrusted thine.—O dark, &c.
Hard is thy heart, Lord Gregory,
And faint is thy breast:
Thou dart of heav'n that flashest by,
O wilt thou give me rest!
Ye mustering thunders from above
Your willing victim see!
But spare, and pardon my false love,
His wrongs to heaven and me!—O dark, &c.

O DARK, DARK IS THIS MIDNIGHT HOUR.

Composed expressly for the Manchester Iris.

LARGHETTO PIA

Bookseller, Stationer, Bookbinder, and Printer.—

DISEASE

made many small stops (,) in his career, and yet of DEATH

put a period to his early page of existence on ye 28th day of April, 1823.

His qualities were as various as his callings, and each had given a particular tone to his thoughts & actions.

As a BOOKSELLER—

though conversant in an eminent degree, wth literature, yet his knowledge of

"Divinity, Medicine, ye Arts and Sciences, Auctores Classici," &c. &c. was merely titular; but he had higher attainments in "Poetry, Plays, Works on ye Drama, Facetia, or books of Wit, Drollery, or Imagination."

THE CATALOGUE

of his virtues is not "extensive," but the few which he possessed were select, and on inspection would be found to be complete and perfect.

His vices were more numerous—but judge not harshly, "gentle reader," for whom is there that has not some inferior works in his collection?—However, he loved virtue, and it obtained from him a note of admiration (!) as much in the duodecimo as in the largest folio—in the peasant as in the lord.—

As a STATIONER and BOOKBINDER, his wots were of very different colours, sometimes dark and sometimes light; yet they all bore a peculiar glare and polish.—

Though never an agriculturist, yet he would occasionally put his hand to the plough; he could sow also.

He was never clasp'd in the bands of matrimony, consequently was unique, and denied the pleasure of folding one small copy of himself to his breast, of forwarding it in this world, or of finishing it for that which is to come.—Just, as well as affectionate, he would have beaten his own child, had he deserved it.—

HIS TALENTS

were worth more than a Foolscap, being of a Demy or Medium ratio.

THE JOURNAL OF HIS LIFE was never blotted by the entry of a mean action, nor was he ever a fool to any one. Poor fellow! Yet did he "not escape calumny," for he had many enemies, who frequently took him to pieces—these, he always regarded as light as a feather, and was wont to laugh and say, "they might go to Pot," convinced that they looked at his outside only. But his inside, or heart, was good and kind, nor was he cross-grained, for, before he died he forgave them, trusting they would forget their malice when he was (in the parenthesis of a coffin) under the cold marble.—It is supposed he did not travel much, though his favourite residence was in the West of England, as appears from many of his letters and papers being stamped "Bath."

His exterior was not handsome, not being ornamented with much gold or brass—his dress perfectly consistent with his calling, namely, half-calf and sheep.

As a PRINTER—

Here must be mentioned his descent from an Old English family.

In this capacity he was most known as a "man of letters," being well acquainted wth the Greek, ROMAN, ITALIAN, EGYPTIAN, and German characters.—His compositions in these languages are numerous, yet strange to say, he never was an AUTHOR.
There are many other things in his career, equally as paradoxical, for instance, though he was never in the Navy, yet was he a Press-man; and without the aid of magic did he "pull the devil by the tail."

He never cut a ——— for he was poor; therefore always content with a pocket addition; in his greatest riches he never was possessed of a Diamond or a Pearl.

STRANGER

such were the various qualities of the person who sleeps in the grave below—there let his remains rest until that great day when he shall come out in a new form, in the joyful hope of receiving a royal and imperial crown.—(Super-royal, because it fadeth not away.—

"Reader! as gazing on this letter'd stone,"

Thou see'st my fate—regard not less thine own;

If on my virtues thou should'st sometimes think,

Or on my vices (though as black as ink)

May one call forth a note of admiration!

The other to thy soul interrogation?

Remind thee for one moment at the most

Of that long sleep, to which thou soon must part.

Yes! thy reflections may be grave as Sturm's

For men like books are eaten here by worms!

Ay! to such reptiles I am serv'd for meat

Who spread for table-cloth my winding-sheet:

Each day on me they sumptuously dine,

Quaffing my blood (to them the richest wine!)—

Then should this sheet in future days be found

By some old Sexton, digging up this ground

The relic to a Stationer convey—

"Ths antiquarian" he will quickly say

And prize it for a brother chip long dead

Last of his alphabet the letter Z.

My years just like these lines are two and twenty,

Go passenger! ere this you've had quite plenty.

LITERATURE.

ENGLISH LYRICS.

The English Lyrics, by W. Smyth, Esq. Professor of Modern History, in the University of Cambridge, being so well known and universally admired, it is really matter of surprise that the Editor of the Sheffield Independent should now present his readers with a series of extracts from that work, and introduce them by the following original article:—

"In 1797, a small volume of Poems was published [anonymously] at Liverpool, under the above unassuming title. At the time it appeared, it was understood to be the production of an Irish gentleman—a supposition which some of the rhymes have a tendency to confirm.
[Notwithstanding this quizzical insinuation, our readers do not need to be informed, that the Author of English Lyrics is a native of England.] The different pieces, however, which compose this little volume, have, on the whole, great poetic beauty,— and it is our intention occasionally to select a flower from this charming bouquet."

The English Lyrics, in two Parts, with the Author's name, was afterwards printed in London, and has passed through two or three editions.
The work has also been reviewed in the Edinburgh Review, and in most of the English Literary Journals.

An original Poem, never before printed, by Professor Smyth, was inserted in a former number of our publication; and we should feel obliged to the correspondent who favoured us with a copy of that Poem, for any other original composition, by the same Author.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

WALKING DRESS.

Cloak or mantle of Levantine silk, of flamme de penche colour; at the bottom are four narrow satin rouleaus, and also round the hood, which is drawn with white satin ribbon; small square standing collar. The cloak is lined with white sarsnet, and for cool mornings and chilly evenings will be found appropriate and comfortable. The dress is of Englishtwilled sarsnet of pale primrose colour, made high; the body full, but drawn to fit the shape by several longitudinal rows, and fastens behind; the epaulette and cuff are full, and arranged en bouffants by the drawings, at the bottom of the skirt is a trimming of gauze, formed into bouffants by perpendicular satin stripes.

EVENING DRESS.

Dress of bright Spanish green tulle, trimmed with the same material and with satin, and worn over a satin slip of the same colour. The corsage is made plain, with a Farinet tucker of white tulle; the folds tastefully confined by six small rosettes of satin ribbon, equi-distant, one being placed in the centre of the bosom, another at the back, and the remainder at the front and back of the shoulders; the band is of satin, and the waist is rather short. The sleeve is moderately long, and very full, and has four satin rouleaus, ornamented half way with a circlet of French folds, where the fulness of the sleeve is collected.
At the bottom of the skirt is a very full trimming of tulle, in severed plaitings, set in a satin frame; to the band are attached satin spikes, which extend rather more than half way.

BALL DRESS.

Over a gossamer satin slip is worn a dress of Urling's patent lace, beautifully finished at the border with large puffings of net, confined in bias wavings by straps of white satin; above this, light and novel trimming, which forms a combination of richness and simplicity, is a full rouleau of white satin entwined with heading; and next the hem is a row of lace, with points a la Vandyke next the shoe. The corsage is of white satin, and is made in the Anglo-Greek style; the antique robbings on each side of the stomacher finished by net puffings, to correspond with the border of the petticoat: the bust finished by a falling tucker of Vandyke lace. The sleeves short, but not quite so full as they were worn last month; they are ornamented to answer the other parts of the dress,

MORNING DRESS.

A dress made partially low of figured gros de Naples of a lavender colour; next the hem at the border a full corkscrew rouleau of satin, of the same colour as the dress; above which a row of separate ornaments of rolled satin, in the Indostan style, each headed by an Indian lotos. The drapery that crosses over the breast is beautifully diversified by white satin; and an elegant schu a la Henriette is worn underneath, surmounted by a double frill of Vandyke lace.

WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM, UNDER A DRAWING
REPRESENTING A WEEPING FEMALE WATCH-ING A CHILD AT PRAYER.

That dewy eye, whose fringed lid
Just shades its beauteous orb of blue,—
That apter'd forehead, almost hid
By glossy locks of golden hue,—

Those rosy hands with fervour prest,
And stretch'd devoutly tow'rd the sky—
That quivering lip—that heaving breast,
Which throbs in holy ecstasy,—

Tell that the spotless innocent
Breathes a petition to his God,
While angels' wings are kindly lent
To bear it to their blest abode.

Sweet boy! pour forth thy guileless pray'r—
And let its incense mount to Heaven;
For sure to one so pure and fair
No harsh refusal can be given.

Oh, might his infant orison
Find grace before the Almighty throne,
Oh, might the virtues of my son
For all his mother's faults atone.

With hopes of heavenly bliss elate,
In welcome death I'd close my eyes,
Sure that we here should separate
Only to meet in Paradise.

BEAUTY—A PORTRAIT;

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS.

Every body thinks the pretty Mrs. D— agreeable, except her husband; and he, good man, to do him justice, and not to speak of beauty too lightly, resisted conviction with all becoming obstinacy and gallantry. Every charm of his wife's face and person supplied him in its turn with weapons, sword and shield, against every effort she made to disenchant herself. Her eyes served him for many a day as a sure artillery against all that she chose to say, or not to say. She had no tastes or feelings in common with him;—but then her complexion! It required almost six months to convince him, that this was not an excuse for her falling asleep when he was reading Guy Mannering to her. He took shelter behind her legs, for I know not how long, against an idle habit she had of never being serious, except when called upon to understand a joke. He found an answer to his wit in her ancles; her foot was a repartee for a month; and after heavy weeks of unmitigated dulness and empty trifling, he still looked upon her lips as eloquence. She drove him at length, however, from all his positions and defences, and he is now certified that his wife is a fool.

Now an ill-conditioned countenance, accompanied, as it always is of course, with shining abilities, and all the arts of pleasing, has this signal compensation; that it improves under observation, grows less and less objectionable the more you look into it and the better you know it; till it becomes almost agreeable on its own account—nay, really so—actually pretty: whereas beauty, we have seen, witless beauty, cannot resist the test of long acquaintance, but declines, as you gaze, while in the full pride of its perfection; “fades on the eye, and palls upon the sense,” with all its bloom about it. Talents bribe and bias the judgment in favour of ordinary features, in the same manner that it is sometimes bewitched by beauty in behalf of folly; with this distinction, that in the first case the error, once formed, knows no change; and in the other is but a passing dream—the mistake of a month—the fascination of a honey-moon.

I may illustrate this point, I hope, without the charge of irreverence, by some notice of our sentiments with regard to brute animals, who, whatever may be their own convictions, are, in our opinions, distinguished by great personal contrasts, many gradations of comeliness, and striking differences of feeling and intelligence. I went the other day to visit a collection of wild beasts, which had just arrived in a retired country town, where, being quite new to most of the people, they were received with eager curiosity. The first word uttered by every one on his entrance into the place of exhibition, was some expression of sudden and irresistible disgust at the elephant—that monster of matter, and miracle of mind, as Buffon calls it—an animal that nature seems to have only half made; the sketch, the rough-draught of a brute; a mass of deformity rendered hideous by a resemblance only to life—like the sculptor's statue just visible in the block; or some creature that a child might scrawl upon paper. Look at his clubbed, post-like legs! What a foot and ancle! And then his tail!—if ever a tail were ignominious, it is his: and mercy!—his carcase!—mean with all its magnitude,—his hogged back—sneaking haunches—and rugged, sooty, stony, hide!—a hay-stack set upon piles, or the wagon that incloses him, might as soon be mistaken for a living being. Loathsome! frightful! dreadful! such was the style of comment that escaped from the mouths of men and women, as they cast a hasty and scornful glance upon this wise brute of the east. They then crowded about the dens of the other beasts, and nothing was heard but exclamations of delight and admiration at the grand mane of the lion, the rich spotted skin of the tiger, and the dazzling stripes of the zebra. It was curious to observe how soon this feeling subsided, how soon the interest of mere colour and form was exhausted, and lost in satiety—indifference—disregard. In the mean time, a little group that have recovered from the hurry of their first impressions, and are in a state to receive the truth, assemble about the poor patient piece of overgrown awkwardness, whom we have just so much abused—the calumniated elephant. He begins to be found out—he has had time to unfold himself, and his party every moment increases: now a deserter from the lion, and now a turn-coat from the tiger, come over to his side, till at last the whole company, who had so lately combined to vilify him, are jostling and elbowing one another, to witness his sagacity and share his notice. No one talks of his unsightliness now; his intelligence, his gentle manners, and kind, communicative, eye, have won all hearts: he is the sole favourite—the pet of the show. The miracles of his trunk-exercise alone are worth all the lions in the world, and the zebras to boot. Observe with what mixed propriety, handiness, and grace, he turns, and curves, and curls, that wonderful instrument, which can knock down a house, or pick up a pin! See with what politeness and tenderness he gives his keeper the wall!—a horse would tread upon your toes and say nothing; but he knows his own weight and your worth better. Look at him! a lamb in every thing but littleness—like Eli's giantess, “he goeth mineiingly”—being nine thousand six hundred pounds weight. And is this a creature to be despised for his hide? No, no—the women now are patting his iron sides, and think him “really not so very ugly;” they coax him, and joke, and laugh with him, and pull out their halfpence ungrudgingly, to buy him cakes, and see him eat them. “Now, ma'am, observe,” says the keeper—and straight he pokes a biscuit into that droll little puckered mouth of his, like a letter into a letter-box—and that is all you have for your penny. And now a mother trusts her infant to his keeping; he cradles it in a bend of his trunk, and stands motionless, like a figure of patience and paternal love. The child screams, and he hears and understands; nay, fear not, he would not, his eye swears to you he would not, harm it, for his liberty. There is no standing this—bursts of applause—“noble brute!”—“generous animal!”—“tender soul!”—came quick from all tongues; nay, as a climax to his triumph, even “pretty creature,” is not spared, so true it is that, “handsome is, that handsome does.” To pursue the parallel to the utmost of its bearing on my subject, I may state that this affectionate admiration was not more lively than it will be durable. The good folks will soon forget the lion's mane and the zebra's stripes; but their interchange of kindly thoughts and kindly acts with the elephant, are matters of the head and heart, and are not to be forgotten.—Lond. Mag.

POOR RELATIONS.

A Poor Relation is—the most irrelevant thing in nature,—a piece of impertinent correspondence,—an odious approximation,—a haunting conscience—a preposterous shadow, lengthening in the noon-tide of your prosperity,—an unwelcome remembrancer,—a perpetually recurring mortification,—a drain on your purse,—a most intolerable dun upon your pride,—a drawback upon success,—a rebuke to your rising,—a stain in your blood,—a blot on your scutcheon,—a rent in your garment,—a death's head at your banquet,—Agathocles' pot,—a Mordecai in your gate,—a Lazarus at your door,—a lion in your path,—a frog in your chamber,—a fly in your ointment,—a mote in your eye,—a triumph to your enemy, an apology to your friends,—the one thing not needful,—the hail in harvest,—the ounce of sour in a pound of sweet,—the bore par excellence.

He is known by his knock. Your heart telleth you “That is Mr. —.” A rap, between familiarity and respect; that demands, and, at the same time, seems to despair of, entertainment. He entereth smiling, and—embarrassed. He holdeth out his hand to shake, and—draweth it back again. He casually looketh in about dinner time—when the table is full. He offereth to go away, seeing you have company—but is induced to stay. He filleteth a chair, and your visitor's two children are accommodated at a side table. He never cometh upon open days, when your wife says with some complacency, “My dear, perhaps Mr. — will drop in to-day.” He remembereth birth-days—and professeth he is fortunate to have stumbled upon one. He declareth against fish, the turbot being small—yet suffereth himself to be importuned into a slice against his first resolution. He sticketh by the port—yet will be prevailed upon to empty the remainder glass of claret,—if a stranger press it upon him. He is a puzzle to the servants, who are fearful of being too obsequious, or not civil enough, to him. The guests think “they have seen him before.” Every one speculateth upon his condition; and the most pert take him to be—a tide-waiter. He calleth you by your Christian name, to imply that his other is the same with your own. But for his familiarity, he might pass for a casual dependent; with more boldness, he would be in no danger of being taken for what he is. He is too humble for a friend, yet takes on him more state than befits a client. He is a worse guest than a country tenant, inasmuch as he bringeth up no rent—yet 'tis odds, from his garb and demeanour, that your other guests take him for one. He is asked to make one at the whist table; refuseth on the score of poverty, and—resents being left out. When the company break up, he proffereth to go for a coach—and lets the servant go. He recollects your grandfather; and will thrust in some mean, and quite unimportant anecdote of—the family. He knew it when it was not quite so flourishing as “he is blest in seeing it now.” He reviveth past situations, to institute what he calleth—favourable comparisons. With a reflecting sort of congratulation, he will inquire the price of your furniture; and insult you with a special commendation of your window-curtains. He is of opinion that the urn is the more elegant shape, but, after all, there was something more comfortable about the old tea-kettle—which you must remember. He dare say you must find a great convenience in having a carriage of your own, and appealeth to your lady if it is not so. Inquireth if you have had your arms done on vellum yet; and did not know till lately, that such-and-such had been the crest of the family. His memory is unseasonable; his compliments perverse; his talk a trouble; his stay pertinacious; and when he goeth away, you dismiss his chair into a corner, as precipitately as possibly, and feel fairly rid of two nuisances.

There is a worse evil under the sun, and that is—a female Poor Relation. You may do something with the other; you may pass him off tolerably well; but your indigent she-Relative is hopeless. "He is an old humourist," you may say, "and affects to go threadbare. His circumstances are better than folks would take them to be. You are fond of having a character at your table, and truly he is one." But in the indications of female poverty there can be no disguise. No woman dresses below herself from caprice. The truth must out without shuffling. "She is plainly related to the L—s; or what does she at their house." She is, in all probability, your wife's cousin. Nine times out of ten, at least, this is the case. Her garb is something between a gentlewoman and a beggar, yet the former evidently predominates. She is most provokingly humble, and ostentatiously sensible to her inferiority. He may require to be repressed sometimes—quando sufflaminandus erat—but there is no raising her. You send her soup at dinner, and she begs to be helped—after the gentlemen. Mr. — requests the honour of taking wine with her; she hesitates between Port and Madeira,—and chooses the former—because he does. She calls the servant Sir; and insists on not troubling him to hold her plate. The housekeeper patronizes her. The children's governess takes upon her to correct her, when she has mistaken the piano for a harpsichord.—Land. Mag.

STANZAS

WRITTEN BY A LADY.

What an eventful period of one's life
Is that in which we make our first debut;
How many quarrels, bickerings, and strife
Which colour suits us best—pink, green, or blue;
And then the thoughts we may become a wife,
And that to some rich handsome fellow too:
And then there's the anxiety to appear
As pretty as Miss — did last year.

And kind Mamma assists us with our dresses,
Points out the way in which they should be made,
Whether Eliza's to have one like Bessy's,
Or whether her complexion she's afraid
Would not agree well with her flowing tresses,
And so would think it better in a braid;
Another's gown is made too full behind,
And then the body's very badly lined.

All these and many other little things
Become important at this anxious season,
Such as shawls, ribbons, necklaces, and rings,
(The last you put as many as you please on)
And then there're fans that every body brings,
For which, no doubt, there's many an urgent reason.
Fie state them if I'd nothing else to do,
But as I have, I'll leave that task to you.*

I like a partner dangling at one's side,
To watch our looks—anticipate our wishes:
A fellow we can favour or deride,
Just as our fancy either hits or misses;
And then by all the ladies we are eyed Inquiring eagerly what creepers this is;
With various other learned interrogatories,
Touching her manner, character, and coquetties.

All girls we know are fond of admiration,
And like a little flattery now and then;
This I confess without the least evasion,
As conscious it is known of by the men:
Flattery will go much further than persuasion;
Then you may say with truth enough again,
That compliments are reliable by them all.
High, low, rich, poor, old, young, and great and small.

What a queer, antique, ancient-looking fellow,
Has that Miss — got by way of spouse;
If he were mine I'd clap him in the cellar,
Or never let him enter in the house—
I really would—if she says much I'll tell her,
And put her up to it; she has no sews,
Or else she would have done it long before;
An odd, dull husband, Gracious! what a bore!

* These four last rhymes are Byron's every line;
For his sake, reader, take them not for mine.

+ Young ladies are generally ycleped creepers until they have made their public entrance.

Alas! poor girl, I pity her indeed,
Ty'd to his tail to be a drudge through life;
How quickly after marriages succeed,
Honeymoons, quarrels, jealousies and strife:
And then it's always too late to recede
When you find out that you're become a wife.
Think well of this, ye ladies, ere you marry,
And take care lest you run off, or miscarry.

Who think you was the belle at the last ball?
Was it the lady in the pinkish gown?
She seem'd to be admired by them all;
I thought that her complexion was but brown;
Besides, for me, her figure was too tall,
And then she had an ugly sort of frown,
Which really spoilt the beauty of her face,
In spite of all her elegance and grace.

You will perhaps imagine I'm censorious
In speaking in this manner of a lady;
But reader, what I hold to be most glorious
Is, that having long since past my hey-day,
I never have run down the meritorious,
Nor ever, I am certain of it, said a Word, that might be construd'd as an affront,
Nor even in the least way rude or blunt.

There're many other matters I could mention,
But pass them over for the ladies' sake;
For really I should merit reprehension
(Considering that my character's at stake)
As well as probably create dissention,
If I should more of these disclosures make:
I'll drop them if you please then for this time;
And humbly wish you a good bye in rhyme.

Chester, April, 1823.

MISS STEPHENS; LISTON; AND MRS. DAVENPORT.

(Written on seeing Sharpe's Picture of the Covent Garden Company.

Immediately in front of the temple, at the head of the procession, stand Bartley and Miss Stephens as Henry the VIIIth and Anne Boleyn. "Miss Stephens!"—what a world of sweet sounds are conjured up by the very name! It is a synonyme for music—Music in its best, truest, most soul-felt sense. Miss Stephens's singing is, indeed, the poetry of music. When we listen to her, we forget that there are such things in the world as minims, crotchets, and double bass. Resin and catgut cease to exist—the orchestra vanishes from the view, and the tap of the leader on his tin candleshade is heard no more. Miss Stephens is in her worthy place in a Shakespearian picture—for I am sure that her singing is the music that Shakspeare loved so much, and has described so often. It is the breathing of the heart—the speaking of the soul. She does not display difficulty, that she may show how she can overcome it—she casts it entirely out of view, and gives to us only the delicious final effect. So completely, indeed, does she make us forget all the scientific means of attaining this delightful end, that we look on her, while she sings, less as an individual being, than as an embodying of the spirit of sweet sound. As the ghost, in the comedy of the Haunted House, appeared "in the shape of the sound of a drum," so is Miss Stephens, at such times, only the shape of the sound of all witching and irresistible music.

Before her is Liston, as Launce, kneeling with his hand on his dog. It is an admirable likeness;—the never-to-be-forgotten face of Liston lives and looks at you. What a face it is! Truly may Liston be said to be a realization of the milk-maid in the song—his "face is his fortune,"—and who would desire a better?—What expressive no-expression in the bullock eyes!—How eloquent are those abundant and drooping chaps without his speaking a word! Reader, have you not seen Liston fix some unfortunate in the pit, and lean over the foot-lamps with their full glare on his countenance, I was going to say—no, his face, (it is the only word) while he "mopped and mowed" as though he spoke, and spoke in mingled anger and complaint? Have you not seen this?—if you have not, go hang yourself, for you have seen nothing—or go and see it before you sleep, if he acts to-night. If you have seen it, then you have seen him in his picture also.—I laughed as I looked;—there he was in all his glory—his face round like a plum-pudding,—and bursting, like it, with all imaginable richness and good things. But with all this, Liston is no actor; he can act, at least, nothing but Liston—and it is scarcely to be wished he should do more. He cannot play Shaks-peare;—his Malvollio is bad; his Sir Andrew worse—and his Lancelot and his Launce are but middling. Even any stock parts are not fit for him. His Acres—his Tony Lumpkin—are but so-so;—but then his Liston! Truly that makes up, and more than makes up, for all. See him in Nicholas Twill—in Lubin Log—mere variations on the theme Liston—species of the genus Liston. See him in Lord Grizzle, which he, not Fielding, has made;—see him in these—his property—his creations;—see him in these, and you will acknowledge, with the rest of the world, that Dryden's line ceases to be paradox and fustian; in very truth, "none but himself can be his parallel."

A little farther back, and more to the right of the picture, is an exquisite portrait of Mrs. Davenport, as the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet. I have already wished that Shakspeare could rise from the dead to hear Miss Stephens sing—he ought to see Mrs. Davenport play the Nurse, also. It is no mean praise to say of any performance, that it embodies, in the most exact and perfect manner, a conception of Shakspeare. It shows a deep insight into the minutiae of his meaning, that argues no common order of mind in its possessor. And nothing can, by possibility, be more admirable, than the manner in which Mrs. Davenport plays this part;—nor this alone, but every part I ever saw her in;—but I cite this in particular, both from her being drawn in it, and from its being her great Shakespearian effort. Nothing is so easy as to play Mrs. Davenport's line of characters tolerably—nothing is so difficult as to play them finely. I am not sure whether the indescribable touch of genius is not more strongly shown by making that which is bearable when middling, exceedingly fine—than it is in higher and more ambitious matters. I do not use the word "genius" lightly—but I am not one of those exclusive persons who would confine it to one narrow and peculiar class of things. Comic genius is, I grant, of an inferior order to tragic genius, but it is genius still. What makes people so rarely think of applying the word to comedy, is, that exceedingly good comic acting and writing may be reached without any genius at all; while tragic writing and acting, without genius, is abominable. Nobody, I think, who can discern genius, will deny its strong display in Mrs. Davenport's Mrs. Malaprop—in her Mrs. Heidelberg—in short, in any part where the author gives room for it to work. All delight in her acting; but perhaps its very perfection makes her merit less loudly acknowledged than it should be, from herself being so totally kept out of view,—so completely sunken in the assumed character. I was delighted to hear, not long ago, a gentleman in the same box with me, exclaim on her going out, after having played a scene in the first style—"Egad, she's Garrick in petticoats!"—Album.

THE ROSES.

Translated from the Dutch of BHderdijk.

I saw them once blowing
Whilst morning was glowing,
But now are their wither'd leaves strew'd o'er the ground
For tempests to play on,
For cold worms to prey on,
The shame of the garden that triumphs around.

Their buds which then flourish'd
With dew-drops were nourish'd,
Which turn'd into pearls as they fell from on high;
Their hues are now banish'd,
Their fragrance all vanish'd,
Ere evening a shadow has cast from the sky.

I saw, too, whole races
Of glories and graces
Thus open and blossom, but quickly decay:
And smiling and gladness
In sorrow and sadness,
Ere life reach'd its twilight, fade dimly away.

Joy's light-hearted dances
And Melody's glances
Are rays of a moment—are dying when born:
And Pleasure's best dower
Is nought but a flower,
A vanishing dew-drop—a gem of the morn.

The bright eye is clouded,
Its brilliancy shrouded,
Our strength disappears—we are helpless and lone:
No reason avails us,
And intellect fails us,
Life's spirit is wasted, and darkness comes on.

VARIETIES.

WONDERS OF LITTLENES.—Mr. Beedell, residing at Ottery St. Mary, Devon, has been induced to produce another specimen of his extraordinary performance of penmanship. Having observed in the Percy Anecdotes that a gentleman at Liverpool had written Goldsmith's poem of the Traveller (488 lines) in a square $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches by $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches, Mr. B. commenced his arduous task, and wrote with the greatest facility Goldsmith's poem of the Traveller, Deserted Village, Retaliation, Stanzas on Woman, Stanzas on the Taking of Quebec, and a Sonnet, without any abbreviation whatever, in the same space, that is, in a square $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches by $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches, the whole comprising 1038 lines, and about 40,000 letters! It may be distinctly read with a magnifying glass, and by some without that help. Various productions of the kind have been produced by others, but this is considered the greatest piece of ingenuity that has ever been written. It will be placed in the British Museum.

EASTER RECKONINGS.—A Priest called upon one of his parishioners for what are called, in many places, Easter Reckonings. The person he called upon was a Quaker, and exercised the ancient profession of a barber. "Reckoning!" quoth the knight of the razor, "why, friend! I never had any dealings with thee, and therefore I can have no reckonings with thee." The priest replied it was a just claim, and if the perquier did not come to church, that was his own fault, as the doors were open. Upon this the amount of the demand was paid, and the priest departed. But soon afterwards the barber sent him an account for shaving and dressing, and when the clergyman came to require an explanation, saying that he had never been shaved or dressed by the barber, and consequently could not be in his debt; the Quaker replied, "No matter for that, friend! my doors were open, and thou mightest have come in and been shaved and dressed if thou hadst chosen, so pay me my demand."

GARRICK AND FOOTE.—Garrick was supping with Foote at a tavern, when the latter dropped a guinea, with which he was going to pay the waiter, and it rolled out of sight. "Where the deuce (said Foote) can it be gone to?"—"Gone to the devil, I suppose," cried Garrick.—"Well, well, David (observed Foote (you're what I said you were—ever contriving to make a guinea go farther than any other man."

THE LATE MR. NOLLEKINS.—The papers say that "Nollekins has left 50,000*l.* to his Majesty; 50,000*l.* to Dr. Kerriek, the public librarian at Cambridge; and 50,000*l.* to Francis Douce, Esq. who is also made residuary legatee, by which he will get 90,000*l.* in addition." The funded property exceeds 225,000*l.*; 20,000*l.* in the hands of the bankers, Chambers and Co.; besides many houses, his valuable works of art, &c.; the whole exceeding in value 300,000*l.* The whole amount of legacies not 90,000*l.*, leaving above 300,000*l.* to the residuary legatees, who were Mr. Douce, Dr. Kerriek, Mr. Russell, and another gentleman, who, after his appointment as executor, died. Mr. Nollekins wished that two other friends might be put in place of the deceased executor; and Mr. Smith of the Museum, and Sir W. Beechey, were requested to accept it, which they did; but Mr. Douce, who knew the contents of the will, inserted their names before they arrived at Mr. Nollekins' house, and sealed and sent away the will. Mr. Nollekins has neglected to provide for many who had absolute claims on his property. His old servant, grown grey, is now a candidate for a workhouse, having only nineteen guineas left to her. His old foreman, near 40 years in his service, is left a beggar; and young Bonomi, now at Rome, a student in sculpture, for whom Nollekins was sponsor, and who was always led by him to expect a proportionate remembrance in his will, has only a legacy of 100*l.*

Mr. N. was for years a successful dealer in works of art, as well as an excellent sculptor of busts, and his habits were all of the Elwes school, so that many years of accumulation must have heaped up no small sum. Such were his miserly courses, that he would, after due calculation, resolve on baking a shoulder of mutton, rather than have it roasted, on account of the difference in expense; and he has been heard to hold a parley with his maid-servant as to whether two or three potatoes would be sufficient for dinner. When a brace of pheasants has been sent him as a present, rather than give the porter a shilling, he has ordered him to take them back, if he insisted on having such a sum!

A COSTLY SUBJECT.—A surgeon and apothecary, not 100 miles from this city (Salisbury) desirous of having a subject for the benefit of his pupils, agreed with some of the all-night people to procure him one. At about half-past eleven at night, a subject was accordingly brought, and placed in the parlour. The surgeon retired to rest, and early on the following morning he went to the parlour for the purpose of removing his purchase to the dissecting room. The bag was there, but the subject had left, most unaccountably, taking with him plate to the amount of 40*l.*

FOOTE AND MOODY.—Foote, while walking with a friend in his grounds at North End, saw coming towards them, on the Fulham-road, two persons in one of those high phaetons then so much in vogue.—"Is not that Moody (said he) in that strange three-pair-of-stairs vehicle?" "Yes (said his friend) and Mr. Johnson the Stock-broker with him; and yet I wonder how he can leave his business, for I think this is no holiday."—"Why, no (said Foote) I think not, except they choose to call this Ascension Day."

SWIFT AND HIS PAD.—Riding out one morning near Dublin, Swift met one of his parishioners very well mounted, and began to compliment him on his horse. "This may be very true (said the gentleman) but still he is not equal to your's."—"To mine! (exclaimed the Dean) why this is but a mere pad."—"Aye; but notwithstanding that (replied the other) he carries the best head of any horse in Ireland."

PHENOMENON.—A gentleman found a small silver coin, (a Dutch piece, value two stivers,) adhering to the white of an egg. It was evidently interposed between the yoke and the albumen. The shell was discoloured in parts, and particularly in that part where the coin was situated. The egg was laid that morning, and the servant says there was no difference in the appearance of that and the others previous to their being boiled. It had not affected the flavour.

THE FLUTE.—An inhabitant of Dieppe, M. le Chevalier Rebsomen, a distinguished French officer who has had his left arm (as well as his right leg) amputated, has invented a piece of mechanism for the flute, which permits the execution, with a single hand, of passages that in general require both hands. It consists of two additional keys; so that the instrument has eleven keys instead of nine. The flute is of the same size as the common one. It is fixed to a table by means of a small wooden vice. The tone is very agreeable, and the notes are more firm and certain than those of a common flute. This discovery is considered to be very valuable, and the "Academie des beaux-arts" of Paris, have added their approbation of it to that of many celebrated musical amateurs.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Sancho Sensitive's Adventure exhibits an evil of frequent occurrence;—mothers and nurses leaving their tender offspring unprotected, or else under the care of children who are scarcely capable of minding themselves!—Many distressing catastrophes are unquestionably attributable to this inattention, not to say dereliction of maternal feeling, and obligation!

Just Published,

In One Volume, Demy 8vo. price 4s. 6d. boards, A CLEAR, Systematic View of the EVIDENCES of CHRISTIANITY. In addition to the important historic matter, and valuable dissertation, found in the most popular evidences, the present volume contains:—A Collateral Digest of Prophetic and Historical Evidence; a Scriptural View of the Godhead; and a Summary of Mahometanism: with INTRODUCTORY OBSERVATIONS on the PROBABILITIES CAUSES of INFIDELITY. By JOSEPH MACARDY.

"This is an excellent work, which requires only to be known to be duly valued. The work is divided into five books, and these again are subdivided into chapters. The first book infers the truth of Christianity from the nature and fulfilment of prophecy; the second founds its truth on the evidence furnished by profane authors; and the third reaches the same conclusion from sacred and early Christian writers. The fourth book is but remotely connected with the grand subject of the work. It contains three chapters, which treat of the Divinity of Christ, the Plurality of the Godhead, and the Unity of the Godhead. The fifth is chiefly employed in stating Mr. Leslie's argument in favour of Christianity, and in answering objections raised by infidels against the authenticity of the sacred volume. The whole concludes with a summary of Mahometanism, as it stands compared or contrasted with the Christian system"—Imperial Magazine.

"To those who have not the original works, this concise view of the Evidences of Christianity, is certainly valuable; and to those who possess them, it will prove a convenient compendium."—Evangelical Magazine.

ESSAY I.

ON POISONS IN GENERAL.

THE Mineral, Vegetable, and Animal kingdoms, abound with substances which are poisonous or deleterious to animal life. We may give the name of poison to all such substances as derange the healthy functions of the body. Some of them operate in a slow manner, that is to say, not immediately endangering life; but there are others which cannot be introduced into the body, without creating that disturbance in the vital functions, which soon shows itself in an alarming form.—To these we shall restrict our inquiries.

The blessings which the three kingdoms of nature afford are alloyed by the poisonous properties which some of them possess, but in saying this, we do not mean to call in doubt the wise disposal of terrestrial objects. Every thing in nature has its specific use; it is their abuse that we deplore and suffer for, and this is to be attributed to the presumption, ignorance, or carelessness of man. The most formidable poisons in the mineral and vegetable kingdoms are, when judiciously prescribed, the most efficient and powerful remedies. Antimony, arsenic, mercury, opium, hemlock, and a few other articles, are the sheet-anchor of the pathologist; explode them from practice, and you will weaken the strong arm of the healing art so much, that disease will often outvie the physician's attempt at cure.—It is then, the mal-appropriation of these means that begets danger—their appropriation is productive of the most salutary results. In addition to the power which they have of triumphing over the bodily afflictions of mankind, there can be no doubt they have a secret operation in nature, which nature's Author alone is privy to. The different poisons have different modes of action—some destroy by producing inflammation of the parts with which they come in contact; this is one of the operations of most of the mineral poisons. Almost all the preparations of antimony, some of those of arsenic, and all of those of mercury, may not only be given with impunity in small doses, but often with the greatest advantage. Care, however, is necessary not to exceed the proper dose; if we do they prove dangerous, causing injury from the degree of slight irritation to inflammation and corrosion of the coats of the stomach, and death.—An immoderate quantity of arsenic or corrosive sublimate will occasion very speedy dissolution—too speedy, one would conjecture, to justify a conclusion that inflammation and corrosion alone could cause it. The experiments of physiologists go far to prove that the suddenness of death in these cases, must be explained on some other principle. If six or eight grains of corrosive sublimate, or muriate of mercury be dissolved in about one ounce of water, and injected into the stomach of a rabbit, the animal will become convulsed, and die in about five minutes from the time of the injection. On examining the stomach after death, it will be found altered from its natural to a brownish gray colour, and instead of its usual firmness, may be lacerated with a very little force. We must infer from these facts, that the poison has, first a local operation, which operation consists in a disorganization of the stomach, but that the immediate cause of death is the sympathy of the brain and heart with the organ primarily affected.—In the term sympathy there is some obscurity—physiologists are in the habit of employing it for the sake of giving a name to the occult agent of certain phenomena occurring in animal bodies. We are often ignorant how distant parts of the body sympathize when we can trace no nervous communication between them, but the case in question is quite different, for there are no organs which so constantly sympathize with each other as the stomach, brain, and heart, and nervous connexion readily explains the fact. If we do not attribute the speedy dissolution to the influence of that obscure principle, sympathy, we must believe that the poison is absorbed, and by entering the mass of blood, acts in a direct manner on the heart and brain. We know well that we may soon destroy an animal by introducing poison into the blood vessels; therefore, should the sublimate be taken up by absorption, there can be no difficulty in solving the question, why death happens in so short a time, but seeing how soon the structure of the stomach is destroyed, and that the absorbents must share the fate of the other component parts of that organ, it is not easy to account for a continuance of their function.—We must conclude that corrosive sublimate, arsenic, and most of the mineral poisons, have a two-fold action, viz. directly on the stomach, and indirectly on the heart and brain by sympathy. The celebrated French physiologist Orfila, has placed the substance lead, in the class “astringent poisons,” but I see no reason, in a practical point of view, for any such distinction. The preparations of lead in substance, when taken into the stomach produce inflammation, and, like corrosive sublimate, and other mineral poisons, they derange the nervous system, but in a more marked degree. A dog will survive a considerable dose of the sugar of lead some hours, during the whole of which time the animal will experience much pain, and ultimately grow convulsed. After death marks of inflammation will be detected in the stomach and bowels. A small dose not sufficient to excite inflammation, may, if not rejected, be absorbed, and if absorbed the nervous system will suffer—when lead is received into the body in the form of emanation the same system is disordered, hence the convulsions, palsy, &c. which characterize the injurious operation of this metallic poison. The Vegetable Kingdom includes many more poisonous materials than the mineral. Some of them kill by producing inflammation which terminates in mortification; the white and black hellebore, the sea onion, the meadow ranunculus and others, belong to this class. Others act on the stomach and brain, causing inflammation, lethargy, stupor, &c.—the resinous narcotic vegetables are in this class. And others affect the nervous system only, giving rise to stupefaction, apoplexy, and death—the deadly night shade is in this class. As these essays are intended for practical instruction, and not for speculative inquiry, I shall waive the questions whether the brain is in these cases sympathetically disordered, or whether the poison is absorbed, and conveyed to the brain through the medium of circulation.

In the Animal Kingdom there exist evils, some of which, from giving rise to temporary inconvenience, may be called annoyances; but others put life in imminent danger. From these, however, luckily our happy clime almost exempts us. There are certain insects, as the bee, wasp, hornet, scorpion, &c. whose sting is very acute, and instances have been related of serious accidents in consequence, but in a general way we have not much to apprehend from it. There are some venomous reptiles in this country which inspire the husbandman with terror, but if the injury which they inflict be properly treated, we have not much to fear; this, however, is not the case in hot climates; the hotter the clime the more noxious and venomous are they, and the same obtains with regard to insects. The house spider is considered for the most part as an innoxious little creature, and so it is to man; but it has a venom malignant enough to destroy the insects on which it preys.—The tarantula is a species of spider, an insect as much more venomous in its bite in comparison with the common house spider, as the venom of an African serpent surpasses in virulence that of a serpent of this country. What has drawn my attention to the tarantula at this time, is a letter which appeared in your last number on the cure of the bite of this insect by music. Many extraordinary stories have been told by naturalists and physicians on this subject, but we are not bound implicitly to believe them all; they have been written under the influence of prejudice and superstition. Experiments have overthrown the opinion that the bite of the tarantula is mortal, as some have maintained, and as to the agency of music in luring its effects, a serious attempt to refute it cannot be necessary. It is believed by some, that the venom of this insect produces a slow fever, which will only yield to the ridiculous ceremony thus mentioned by Orfila.—“Unfortunate wretches have been seen all decorated with flowers and ribbands like victims, traversing the public places in the hottest part of the day, dancing bare-headed with their faces turned towards the sun, until the total exhaustion of their strength plunges them into a state of profound lethargy, then their relations carry them off on a couch, and the music is continued a long time after they have ceased to hear it.” How great must be the credulity of those who put faith in such mummery!!!

All kinds of serpents are not venomous; some are quite harmless.—In the anatomy of the mouth, we have the means of determining whether the species is poisonous or not. In the upper jaw of venomous serpents, we find two tusks which are perforated, and connected with the bladders in which the venom is contained. The venom is secreted by two small glands, and conveyed by a duct proceeding from each gland to the bladder and reservoir situated at the root of each tusk.—The tusks lie concealed in the jaw, but the animal has the power of protruding them at will. The innoxious serpents are not provided with these instruments—in the poisonous species the upper jaw is moveable, so that the mouth can be very widely opened, and it is this anatomical arrangement that enables them to take in animals even larger than themselves. The process of poisoning consists in this:—On seizing its prey the serpent bites with the fangs before alluded to, the bladders in connexion with them are by this means pressed on, and a small quantity of their contents passing into the cavity of each tusk, is introduced into the wounded part of the victim. The poisonous fluid is said by those who have examined it to be of a yellow colour, and soon proves fatal on being injected into the blood.

The venomous properties with which certain insects and serpents are endowed, are quite natural, and bestowed on them as the means of defence and preservation; but there is a malignant animal poison of a morbid kind, I mean that poison communicated by the bite of a rabid animal—of its nature we are ignorant; with its effects we are too well acquainted; and with proofs of its fatality the annals of medicine bear awful testimony. Hydrophobia is the dread of mankind, and acknowledged by physicians to be the opprobrium of the healing art.

In the treatment of poisons, from whatever sources they are derived, the following are the general indications:—First, to rid the body of the poison by the means adapted to the case.—Secondly, to change the injurious properties of it by chemical or other means, if the nature of the poison admits of a strictly speaking antidotal remedy—and thirdly, to remove or alleviate its effects.—These general views will be particularized in the essays which are to follow.

REVIEW.

Ringan Gilhaize; or, the Covenanters. By the Author of 'ANNALS OF THE PARISH,' &c. 3 vols. Whittakers. London, 1823.

This romance is from the fertile pen of Mr. Galt, the author of 'The Entail,' and many other works of more than common popularity.

Ringan commences his tale with a brief history of his grandfather; who, being well chastised for insulting the monks in one of their sacred processions, deserts his father's home with some other godly-minded spirits, and enters into the service of the protesting Earl of Glencairn. By this nobleman he is employed as a spy on the Catholics, with directions to get into the secrets of the Archbishop of St. Andrews by appearing to enlist himself amongst the Catholic partisans. Gilhaize accordingly flings himself into the way of Sir David Hamilton, wins his favour, and by him is introduced to the service of the Archbishop, whom he finds drinking and feasting with his leman, Mrs. Kilspinnie, the adulterous wife of a poor tradesman. Here he stays long enough to see Master Mill brought to the stake for recusancy, to get acquainted with the Bailie of Crail, the unfortunate husband of Mrs. Kilspinnie, and to inspire that very amorous lady with a passion for himself. By her he is invited to a midnight visit, which invitation he communicates to the poor Bailie, but without letting him know the name of the fair wanton. His intention is to cure him of his regret for a faithless wife, and accordingly they set out together:—

My grandfather observed the wicket open in the gate, and guessing therefrom that it was one spying to forewarn somebody within who wanted to come out unremarked, he made a sign to his companion, and they both threw themselves flat on the ground, and hirsled down the rocks to conceal themselves. Presently the gate was opened, and then out came the fat friar, and looked east and west, holding the door in his hand; and anon out came his Grace the Antichrist, birpling with a staff in his hand, for he was lame with that monkish malady called the gout. The friar then drew the yett too, and walked on towards the castle, with his Grace leaning on his arm. In the mean time the poor man of Crail was grinding the teeth of his rage at the sight of the cause of his sorrow, and my grandfather had a sore struggle to keep him down, and prevent him from running wud and furious at the two sacerdotal reprobates, for no lightlier could they be called.

Thus, without any disclosure on my grandfather's part, did Master Kilspinnie come to jealousy that the leman who had trusted him was no other than his own faithless wife, and he smote his forehead and wept bitterly, to think how she was become so dreadful in sin. But he vowed to put her to shame; so it was covenanted between them, that in the dusk of the evening the afflicted husband should post himself near to where they then stood, and that when my grandfather was admitted by the other entrance to the house, he should devise some reason for walking forth into the garden, and while there admit Master Kilspinnie.

Accordingly, betimes my grandfather was ready, and the stripling, as had been bargained, came for him to the vintner's, and conducted him to the house, where, after giving the signals before enumerated, the damsel came to the door and gave him admittance, leading him straight to the inner chamber before described, where her mistress was sitting in a languishing posture, with the table spread for a banquet.

She embraced my grandfather with many fond protestations, and filled him a cup of hot malvesie, while her handmaid brought in divers savoury dishes; but he, though a valiant young man, was not at his ease, and he thought of the poor husband and the five babies that the adulteress had left for the foul love of the papist high-priest, and it was a chaste spell and a restraining grace. Still he partook a little of the rich repast which had been prepared, and feigned so long a false pleasure, that he almost became pleased in reality. The dame, however, was herself at times fearful, and seemed to listen if there was any knocking at the door, telling my grandfather that his Grace was to be back after he had supped at the castle. 'I thought,' said she, 'to have had you here when he was at the burning of the heretic, but my gilly could not find you among the troopers till it was owre late; for when he brought you, my Lord had come to solace himself after the execution. But I was so nettled to be so balked, that I acted myself into an anger till I got him away, not, however, without a threat of being troubled with him again at night.'

Scarcely had Madam said this, when my grandfather started up and feigned to be in great terror, begging her to let him hide himself in the garden till his Grace was come and gone. To this, with all her blandishments, the guilty woman made many obstacles; but he was fortified of the Lord with the thoughts of her injured children, and would not be entreated, but insisted on scogging himself in the garden till the Archbishop was sent away, the hour of his coming being then near at hand. Seeing him thus peremptory, Madam Kilspinnie was obligated to conform; so he was permitted to go into the garden, and no sooner was he there than he went to the Sallyport and admitted her husband;—and well it was that he had been so steadfast in his purpose; for scarcely were they moved from the yett into a honeysuckle tower hard by, when they heard it again open, and in came his Grace with his corpulent parkers, who took his seat on the bench before spoken of, to watch, while his master went into the house.

The good Bailie of Crail breathed thickly, and he took my grandfather by the hand, his whole frame trembling with a passion of grief and rage. In the lapse of some four or five minutes, the giglet damsel came out of the house, and by the glimpse of a light from a window as she passed, they saw she had a tankard of smoking dring in her hand, with which she went to the friar; and my grandfather and his companion taking advantage of this, slipped out of their hiding-place and stole softly into the house, and reached the outer chamber, that was parted from Madam's banquet bower by the arras partition. There they stopped to listen, and heard her complaining in a most dolorous manner of great heart-sickness, ever and anon begging the deluded prelate Hamilton to taste the feast she had prepared for him, in the hope of being able to share it with him and the carresses of his sweet love. To which his Grace as often replied, with great condolence and sympathy, how very grieved he was to find her in that sad and sore estate, with many other fond cajoleries, most odious to my grandfather to hear from a man so far advanced in years, and who, by reason of the reverence of his office, ought to have had his tongue schooled to terms of piety and temperance.

The poor husband meanwhile said nothing, but my grandfather heard his heart panting audibly, and three or four times he was obligated to brush away his hand, for, having no arms himself, the Bailie clutched at the hilt of his sword, and would have drawn it from the scabbard.

The Antichrist seeing his leman in such great misery as she so well feigned, he at last, to her very earnest supplications, consented to leave her that night, and kissed her as he came away; but her husband broke in upon them with the rage of a hungry lion, and seising his Grace by the cuff of the neck, swung him away from her with such vehemence, that he fell into the corner of the room like a sack of duds. As for Madam, she uttered a wild cry, and threw herself back on the couch where she was sitting, and seemed as if she had swooned, having no other device so ready to avoid the upbraidings and just reproaches of her spouse. But she was soon roused from that fraudulent dww by my grandfather, who, seizing a flaggon of wine, dashed it on her face.

From this adventure Gilhaize is fortunate enough to escape, and, returning to Edinburgh, proceeds straight towards the lodging of the Earl of Glencairn. In his way he is met by a man, who gives himself out for one of the Earl's retainers, and endeavours to worm out of him the secrets of his journey, but he is fortunate enough to suspect his purpose: and, on telling the story to his master, he learns that the spy is a discarded servant, by name Winterton.

From this time, Gilhaize rises in the Earl's favour, and is employed in many affairs that required talent and fidelity; but we cannot follow him through all his adventures, and still less can we afford space for the history of Queen Mary and the reformers. His tale winds up in the second volume with the repentance of Mrs. Kilspinnie, and after living to the age of 91 years, seven months, and four days,—we love to be particular—he is, 'as it were, carried, in the downy arms of sleep, to the portal door of death, where all the pains and terrors that guard the same were hushed, and stood mute around, as he was softly received in.'

The next five chapters are devoted to Ringan's father; but the 16th introduces us to the bridal of Ringan, and he commences hero of a novel with a ceremony, that with all other heroes has been the conclusion. This was soon after the execution of Charles I. of England. From that time all passes on quietly to the Restoration, which soon brought with it a persecution of the Covenanters, and its natural consequences, a civil war. The battle of Pentland Hills breaks the forces of the rebels, and Ringan flies in company with the godly Mr. Witherspoon, as fast and as far as their feet can carry them, and after many hazards, in one cold stormy night they find shelter in a deserted cottage:—

Every thing seemed as if it had been suddenly abandoned; but by the help of a pistol, which I had taken in the raid from one of Turner's disarmed troopers, and putting our trust in the protection we had so far enjoyed, I struck a light and kindled the fire, over which there was still hanging, on the wall, a nail-pot, wherein the family at the time of their flight had been preparing their dinner; and we judged by this token, and by the visible desolation, that we were in the house of some of God's people who had been suddenly scattered. Accordingly we scrupled not to help ourselves from the auric, knowing how readily they would pardon the freedom of need in a gospel minister, and a covenanted brother dejected with want and much suffering.

Having finished our supper, instead of sitting by the fire, as we at first proposed to do, we thought it would be safer to take the blankets from the beds and make our lair in the barn; so we accordingly retired thither, and lay down among some unthreshed corn that was lying ready on the floor for the sail.

But we were not well down when we heard the breathings of two persons near us. As there was no light, and Mr. Witherspoon guessing by what we had seen, and by this concealment, that they must be some of the family, he began to pray aloud, thereby, without letting wot they were discovered, making them to understand what sort of guests we were. At the conclusion an old woman spoke to us, telling us dreadful things which a gang of soldiers had committed that afternoon; and her sad story was often interrupted by the moans of her daughter, the farmer's wife, who had suffered from the soldiers an unspeakable wrong.

'But what has become of our men, or where the bairns has fled, we know not,—we were baith demented by the outrage, and hid ourself here after it was ower late,' said that aged person, in a voice of settled grief, that was more sorrowful to hear than any lamentation could have been; and all the sacred exhortations that Mr. Witherspoon could employ softened not the obduracy of her inward sorrowing over her daughter, the dishonoured wife. He, however, persuaded them to return with us to the house; for the enemy having been there, we thought it not likely he would that night come again. As for me, during the dismal recital, I could not speak. The eye of my spirit was fixt on the treasure I had left at home. Every word I heard was like the sting of an adder. My horrors and fears rose to such a pitch, that I could no longer master them. I started up and rushed to the door, as if it had been possible to arrest the imagined guilt of the persecutors in my own unprotected dwelling.

Mr. Witherspoon followed me, thinking I had gone by myself, and caught me by the arm and entreated me to be composed, and to return with him into the house. But while he was thus kindly remonstrating with me, something took his foot, and he stumbled and fell to the ground. The accident served to check the frenzy of my thoughts for a moment, and I stooped down to help him up; but in the same instant he uttered a wild howl that made me start from him; and he then added, awfully—

'In the name of Heaven, what is this?'

'What is it?' said I, filled with unutterable dread.

'Hush, hush,' he replied as he rose, 'lest the poor woman hear us; and he lifted in his arms the body of a child of some four or five years old. I could endure no more; I thought the voices of my own innocents cried to me for help, and in the frenzy of the moment I left the godly man, and fled like a demoniac, not knowing which way I went.

Adventure now follows rapidly on adventure, so rapidly, indeed, that we cannot pretend to follow them. At last the violent counsellors of Charles are displaced, and the country endures a temporary quiet, till the return of Lauderdale to power, and the renewal of coercive measures, which led to the battle of Bothwell-brig. What injury this had wrought to the family of Gilhaize, may be judged from his answers when placed upon trial before Lord Kelburne:—

'Ringan Gilhaize, you were at the battle of Bothwell-brigg.'

'I was not,' said I.

'You do not mean to say so, surely?'

'I have said it,' was my answer.

Whereupon one of the clerks whispered to him that there were three of the name in the list.

'O!' cried he, 'I crave your pardon, Ringan, there are several persons of your name; and though you were not at Bothwell yourself, may he ye ken those of your name who were there,—Do you?'

'I did know two,' was my calm answer; 'one was my brother, and the other my son.'

All present remained very silent as I made this answer; and the Lord Kelburne bending forward, leant his cheek on his hand as he rested his elbow on the table, and looked very earnestly at me. Murray resumed—

'And pray now, Ringan, tell us what has become of the two rebels?'

'They were covenanted Christians,' said I; 'my son lies buried with those that were slain on that sore occasion.'

'But your brother; he was of course younger than you.'

'No; he was older.'

'Well, well, no matter as to that; but where is he?'

'I believe he is with his Maker; but his body lies among the rocks at the bottom of the Orkney seas.'

The steadiness of the Lord Kelburne's countenance saddened into the look of compassion, and he said to Murray—

'There is no use in asking him any more questions about them, proceed with the ordinary interrogatories.'

There was a murmur of satisfaction towards his Lordship at this; and Murray said—

'And so you say that those in the late rebellion at Bothwell were not rebels?'

'I said, Sir, that my son and my brother were covenanted Christians.'

'Well then,' resumed the advocate, 'what can you say to the barbarous murder of Archbishop Sharp?—You will not contend that murder is not contrary to the law of God?'

'I ne'er contended,' said I, 'that any sin was permitted by the law of God—far less murder, which is expressly forbidden in the Ten Commands.'

'Then ye acknowledge the murder of the Archbishop to have been murder?'

'That's between those that did it and God.'

'Hooley, hooley friend!' cried Murray; 'that, Ringan, winna do; was it or was it not murder?'

'Can I tell who was not there?'

'Then, to satisfy your conscience on that score, Ringan, I would ask you, if a gang of ruffians slay a defenceless man, do or do they not commit murder?'

'I can easily answer that.'

Lord Kelburne again bent eagerly forward, and rested his cheek again on his hand, placing his elbow on the table, while I continued—

'A gang of ruffians coming in wantonness, or for plunder, upon a defenceless man, and putting him to death, there can be no doubt is murder! but it has not yet been called murder to kill an enemy in battle; and therefore, if the captain of a host go to war without arms, and thereby be defenceless, it cannot be said, that those of the adverse party, who may happen to slay him, do any murder.'

'Do you mean to justify the manner of the death of the Archbishop?' exclaimed the advocate, starting back, and spreading out his arms in wonderment.

'Deed no, Sir,' replied I, a little nettled at the construction he would put on what I said; 'but I will say, even here, what Sir David Lindsay o' the Mount said on the similar event o' Cardinal Beaton's death,—

'As for this Cardinal, I grant
He was the man who might well want;
God will forgive it soon:
But of a truth, the sooth to say,
Although the loon be well away,
The fact was foully done.'

There was a rustle of gratification among all in the court as I said the rhyme, and Lord Kelburne smiled; but Murray, somewhat out of humour, said—

'I fancy, my Lord, we must consider this as an admission that the killing of the Archbishop was murder?'

Notwithstanding the sagacity of his defence, Ringan is fined, and imprisoned till he can provide security. This he does by the following day; but in that short time strange changes have taken place:—

My heart beat high with gladness. My son bounded forward to tell his mother and sisters of my coming. On gaining the brow of the hill he leapt from the ground with a frantic cry and clasped his hands. I ran towards him—but I remember no more,—though at times something crosses my mind, and I have wild visions of roofless walls, and a crowd of weeping women and silent men digging among ashes, and a beautiful body, all dropping wet, brought on a deal from the mill-dam, and of men, as it was carried by, seizing me by the arms and tying my hands,—and then I fancy myself in a house fastened to a chair;—and sometimes I think I was lifted out and placed to bask in the sun and to taste the fresh air. But what these things import I dare only guess, for no one has ever told me what became of my benign Sarah Loochrig and our too blooming daughters;—all is phantasma that I recollect of the day of my return home. I said my soul was iros, and my heart converted into stone. O that they were indeed so! But sorrowing is a vain thing, and my task must not stand still.

When I left Ayr the leaves were green, and the fields gay and the waters glad; and when the yellow leaf rustled on the ground, and the waters were drumly, and the river roaring, I was somehow, I know not by what means, in the kirk-yard, and a film fell from the eyes of my reason, and I looked around, and my little boy had hold of me by the hand, and I said to him, 'Joseph, what's your face big and green in our lair?' and he gazed in my face, and the tears came into his eyes, and he replied—

'Father, they are a' in the same grave.' I took my hand out of his;—I walked slowly to the green tomb;—I knelt down, and I caused my son to kneel beside me, and I vowed equity for ever against Charles Stuart and all of his line; and I prayed, in the words of the Psalmist, that when he was judged he might be condemned. Then we rose; but my son said to me—

'Father, I canna wish his condemnation; but I'll fight by your side till we have harlt him down from his bloody throne.'

And I felt that I had forgotten I was a Christian, and I again knelt down and prayed, but it was for the sin I had done in the vengeance of the latter clause. 'Nevertheless, Lord,' I then cried, 'as thou thyself didst take the sceptre from Saul, and gave the crown to David, make me an instrument to work out the purposes of thy dreadful justice, which in time will come to be.'

Then I rose again, and went towards the place where my home had been; but when I saw the ruins I ran back to the kirk-yard, and threw myself on the grave, and cried to the earth to open and receive me.

But the Lord had heard my prayer, and while I lay there he sent down his consoling angel, and the whirlwind of my spirit was calmed, and I remembered the promise of my son to fight by my side, and I rose to prepare myself for the warfare.

Ringan again joins the covenanters, and as usual to his own loss; his son is killed, and himself taken prisoner, but he is fortunate enough to escape, and fortunate enough to kill the great Dundee; who, as the scourge of the Scottish dissenters, is the peculiar object of his hatred. With this achievement the romance closes.—Museum.

ST. MARY'S SPIRE.

The engraving with which we here present the public, is a neat and correct representation of the Spire, and Cross and Ball, of St Mary's Church, in this town. The Cross and Ball were blown into the horizontal situation in December last, and so continued until Tuesday the 6th instant; when their removal was effected by the ingenuity and courage of an individual—FRANCIS WOOTTON of Nottingham.

Mr. Wootton (assisted by his son and another person) commenced his operations on the 1st or 2nd instant, by placing a ladder on the roof of the church; having ascended, and firmly cramped its upper extremity to the wall, he fastened a block and pulley to its top, by which was raised a second ladder; after securing the bottom of this to the top of the first, he then ascended the second ladder, and cramped it in the manner of the former; six others were raised in a similar way, when this dexterous, enterprising man gained the summit—an elevation of more than 230 feet, where he stood cheering and waving his hat, with the utmost confidence and composure.

The next operation was the fastening of a block for the suspension and lowering of the Cross and Ball, when separated from the Spire; a noose was then, by means of a staff, passed over an arm of the cross, and properly secured: after this he attempted the division of the bar by sawing; but the vibrations of the cross, occasioned by the wind, rendered it impracticable.

Tuesday morning, being calm, he again mounted and suspended a rope from the cross to the roof of the church; his son then undertook the operation of sawing, but not succeeding to his wish he descended; when, on pulling the rope, for the purpose of opening the division for the action of the saw, the bar unexpectedly snapped, and the cross and ball became suspended from the block and pulley, and were gradually lowered.

Mr. Wootton intended to have separated and lowered the cross first, and had been accordingly cutting between the cross and the ball. On inspection, it proved that the iron bar snapped within the ball, where, owing to a flaw, it had only about a quarter of an inch for the support of the whole. The ball and cross are of sheet copper, the former two feet diameter, and 60lbs. weight; and the latter six feet by five feet eight inches, and about 160lbs. weight. The portion of the bar between the cross and the ball is from two to three yards in length. This intrepid individual has also undertaken to repair the Spire towards the top, which he will effect by the use of suspended ladders; he will substitute a rane for the ornament just removed.

We extract the following particulars from "Mr. Aston's Picture of Manchester"—"This elegant Church, situated between Deansgate and the river Irwell, is of the Doric order; has a spire steeple 186 feet high, universally and deservedly admired for its elegance and fine proportions, though in point of architectural regularity, it is faulty, being of no particular or acknowledged order. The Architect has been accused of not being learned in his profession, but if it is deficient in regularity, like the Dramas of the immortal Shakespeare, it rises superior to rule, and will be admired as long as a taste for the really beautiful is inherent in those who observe it. The lantern is particularly striking. It is composed of eight Ionic pillars, which support the spire (the highest in the town) surmounted by a large globe, upon which, instead of a wind vane, is placed a massy cross, which, as well as the globe, is gilt."

PRODUCTIONS AND INHABITANTS OF THE SEAS.

From Travels through Sweden, Norway, and Finmark, to the North Cape, in the Summer of 1820. By A. de C. Brooke, A. M.

"Nothing can be more surprising and beautiful than the singular clearness of the water of the northern seas. As we passed slowly over the surface, the bottom, which here was in general a white sand, was clearly visible, with its minutest objects, where the depth was from twenty to twenty-five fathom. During the whole course of the tour I made, nothing appeared to me so extraordinary as the inmost recesses of the deep thus unveiled to the eye. The surface of the ocean was unruined by the slightest breeze, and the gentle splashing of the oars scarcely disturbed it. Hanging over the gunwale of the boat, with wonder and delight I gazed on the slowly moving scene below. Where the bottom was sandy, the different kinds of asterie, echini, and even the smallest shells, appeared at that great depth conspicuous to the eye; and the water seemed in some measure to have the effect of a magnifier, by enlarging the objects like a telescope, and bringing them seemingly nearer. Now creeping along, we saw, far beneath, the rugged sides of a mountain rising towards our boat, the base of which, perhaps, was hidden some miles in the great deep below. Though moving on a level surface, it seemed almost as if we were ascending the height under us; and when we passed over its summit, which rose in appearance to within a few feet of our boat, and came again to the descent, which on this side was suddenly perpendicular, and overlooking a watery gulf, as we pushed gently over the last point of it, it seemed almost as if we had thrown ourselves down this precipice; the illusion, from the crystal clearness of the deep, actually producing a sudden start. Now we came again to a plain; and passed slowly over the submarine forests and meadows, which appeared in the expanse below; inhabited, doubtless, by thousands of animals, to which they afford both food and shelter, animals unknown to man: and I could sometimes observe large fishes of singular shape, gliding softly through the watery thickets, unconscious of what was moving above them. As we proceeded, the bottom became no longer visible; its fairy scenes gradually faded to the view, and were lost in the dark green depths of the ocean."

BONAPARTE ON CRANIOLOGY.—"I contributed very much to the discredit of the theory of Gall. Corvisart was his principal follower. He, and all who resemble him, had a great attachment to materialism, which was calculated to strengthen their theory and influence. But nature is not so barren. Were she so clumsy as to make herself known by external forms, we should go to work more promptly and acquire a greater degree of knowledge. Her secrets are more subtle, more delicate, more evanescent, and have hitherto escaped the most minute researches. We find a great genius is a little hunchback, and a man, with a fine commanding person, turns out to be a stupid fellow. A big head, with a larger brain, is sometime destitute of a single idea, while a small brain is found to possess a vast understanding. And observe the imbecility of Gall. He attributes to certain protuberances, propensities, and crimes, which are not inherent in nature, which arise solely from society and the compact of mankind. What becomes of the protuberance, denoting thievery, where there is no property to steal;—of that indicating drunkenness, where there are no fermented liquors, and of that characterising ambition, where there is no social establishment?"

"The same remarks apply to that egregious charlatan, Lavater, with his physical and moral relations. Our credulity lies in the defect of our nature. It is inherent in us to wish for the acquisition of positive ideas, when we ought, on the contrary, to be carefully on our guard against them. We scarcely look at a man's features before we undertake to ascertain his character. We should be wise enough to repel the idea and to neutralize those deceitful appearances. I was robbed by a person who had grey eyes, and from that moment am I never to look at grey eyes without the idea of the fear of being robbed? It was a weapon that wounded me, and of that I am apprehensive wherever I see it, but was it the grey eyes that robbed me? Reason and experience, and I have been enabled to derive great benefit from both, prove, that all those external signs are so many lies; that we cannot be too strictly on our guard against them, and that the only true way of appreciating and gaining a thorough knowledge of mankind is by trying and associating with them. After all, we meet with countenances so hideous, it must be allowed, that the most powerful understanding is confounded, and condemns them in spite of itself."—Las Cases.

NATURAL PHENOMENON.—A gentleman at Harwich, alluding to the account of the piece of money found in an egg, states the following as fact:—

"In July 1822, the wife of the man who superintends the decaying ponds in the parish of Great Oakley, near this town, took an Egg from a hen's nest, in which was a remarkable discoloration: she kept it about a week, and, upon breaking it, observed something within alive, which so alarmed her that she let it fall, and ran for her husband, who was close by, and immediately came and found lying on the ground, surrounded with the contents of the Egg, an animal of the Lizard species alive, but incapable, from weakness, of getting away. The contents of the egg were fetid, it contained a very small portion of yolk, with the albumen, not more than sufficient to half fill the shell. Hearing of this strange incident, I sent for the man, who fully corroborated the above, and produced the animal, which proved to be a common Land Swift, speckled belly, about four inches in length, nothing remarkable in its form, except its hind legs being longer than usual: it died shortly after being out of the egg. The man has it dried, for the inspection of the curious, and will with his wife, who are honest creditable people, make oath of the above."

LUDICROUS MISTAKE.—"Our title of General was once very strangely mistaken, and by no less a personage than the celebrated King of Prussia, Frederic II. It happened thus:

"A great intimacy and friendship, private as well as political, subsisted between the late Lord Ash—n (Mr. D—g) and Colonel Barré. They travelled to the continent together, and chanced to arrive at Berlin or Potsdam (I forget which) exactly at the time of a grand review. Being particularly desirous of seeing it, they found means to be presented to the King on the very ground; as two Englishmen of distinction, and members of the British Parliament. Colonel Barré as Colonel Barré, and D—g as the King's Solicitor General. Frederic knew enough of Colonels and Generals, to be caught by the sound of such titles, never dreaming that in this particular instance they were not equally military. War-horses, richly caparisoned, were immediately offered to the English Colonel and General, and of necessity accepted. The Colonel rode like a Colonel, but the General no better than any other Solicitor-General, and very unlike what the Prussian troops and Frederic himself had been accustomed to see in the field. The horse besides on which he rode, being under the same mistake as his royal master, was not sparing of his military movements, to the no small embarrassment of his law-full rider, who being quite unused to such actions, had a hard difficulty to keep his seat, and in going through the various manœuvres, which he had no means of controlling, afforded considerable amusement to the company at large."—It matters not who.

TITLES.—"All distinctions by attributes, whether in the concrete or abstract, are hazardous, and likely to run into incongruities. Of the Ducal Archiepiscopal Title of 'Grace,' for instance, which is of this nature, what shall we say? I know what it betokens; Gratia, decor, Veneratus, &c.: but how strange it would appear to say to a Duke or an Archbishop, will your 'comeliness,' 'beauty,' or 'fine mien,' do me the honor of dining with me? I shall be proud to wait upon your 'Felicity,' or 'Becomingness.'

"If the Title imply that the high personages themselves are really 'Graces,' we fall into greater difficulties; for, mythologically speaking, what Duke or Archbishop could wish to be taken for Aglais, Thalia, or Euphrosyne, the daughters of Bacchus and Venus?"

LINES TO —

Oh! who could gaze upon that eye
Without emotions of delight;
Oh! who could tell what bliss was nigh
When evening usher'd in the night.

'Twas better felt by far than told;
For what are words!—but empty sounds—
And sounds indeed are much too cold,
When passion reigns and love abounds!

For there's a language in the eye
That speaks directly to the heart;
That deeper in the breast will pry,
Than all the eloquence of art.

'Tis nature there herself express'd,
'Tis nature unconstrain'd and free;
No look abash'd, or thought suppress'd,
She shines in native liberty.
Oh, breathe not his name!

LINES,

Addressed to W. Smyth, Esq., Author of English Lyrics.

BY A LADY.

"They tell me, Muse, (O! words of fear,)
"Tis ruin thus thy Lyre to hear,
"That thou hast smiles that but deceive me;
"That idly while thy power inspires,
"My mind consumes, my life retires—
"They tell me, Muse, that I must leave thee."
English Lyrics, Part II.

Shall the Bard, whom the charms of Maria inspire,
Bid adieu to his Muse, and abandon his Lyre?
Shall he who the hopes and enchantments of youth,
Can sing with such grace, with such sweetness, and truth;
And from Ball-rooms and Bowers, with such delicate art,
Can extract the pure moral that sinks to the heart;—

Or pensively turn to the sea-beaten shore,
Or the crags of the heath-purpled mountain explore;
And still, whether mournful or festive the scene,
Draw reflection sublime, or the precept serene;
With elegance trifle, with plety glow,
And always in numbers harmoniously flow;—

Shall he let his Harp lie neglected, unstrung?
Shall its versatile melody never be sung
On the charm'd ear again? must we calmly resign
New strains like the former, and yet not relapse?
Shall we sigh o'er the Poet, and yet not wish to view
His feverish fancies, his visions anew?

Or to Wisdom attuning, in votive acclaim,
Sweep the chords to her whispers of undying fame,
Yet listen no more to the sound of her praise,
No longer the theme of her glory raise?
Forbid it, ye Muses, nor suffer the Bard
To break the enchantments your witcheries guard;

Hem your fugitive round with a magical spell,
Send the sprites of the mountain, the river, the dell;
Let them flit through the breeze, and descend in the shower,
Let them guard every stream, every bud, every flower;
That each with new beauties his heart may inspire,
And string to new rapture the chords of his Lyre.

Yet soft—why this terror? away with such pains!
—Leave him free as the winds,—unloose all his chains!
The friend may remonstrate, the Bard may resolve,
(Such vows any one of the Nine would absolve)
Yet driv'n by his fancy, he still will be found
In bands of fresh flow'rets entangled and bound—

And "Pity," "Benevolence," "Laura," "The Bee,"
In his heart all by turns renew the soft plea;
Our sweet Bard again shall awaken the Lyre,
Nor e'er let his natural breathings expire:
While virtue and innocence hang on the strings,
And the heart is refined by each strain that He sings.

THE ANSWER.

Strain of delight, how sweetly breathed!
Fair Muse, to thy soft smile I bow;
And place the bays thy hand has wreathed,
In triumph, on my honoured brow.

My towering pride that heedless turns,
Nor asks a laurel from the throg,—
Waked by thy praise, delighted burns,
And thrills, and trembles at the song.

O! thine be still each varied joy
Of fancy gay, and thought refined;
No ruder, colder cares destroy
Thine airy taste, thy feeling mind!

Each pure delight the virtuous know,
On Thee be poured by favouring heaven;
And thine the bosom's generous glow,
That feels the bliss itself has given.

ON ACCUMULATION.

There is scarcely any one effect of accumulation by which a man can benefit himself,—or at least attain to that prospect of pleasure which a hasty and premature view holds out. All men seem perfectly to understand the nature of accumulation, and suppose that the bare heaping together of the objects of certain wants and desires is the true end of comfort; and this they risk without coming to know the consequences which such occupations might produce.—As men's dispositions and occupations vary, so do their wants. The miser seeks only after the accumulation of riches—the soldier after that of his trophies and badges of honor—and the Squire's highest ambition is in collecting together a greater number of houses than his neighbour. All these pursuits are widely different, yet each fancies himself on the high road to happiness;—and if one can count his gain—another tell his campaigns—and a third shout halloo, surrounded with his dogs in full chase,—he will never think his hours too tedious, nor his journey too long. And so it is with every man: each labours only to increase one certain train of objects which lay nearest his heart, and without which he would be miserable. It is the spring of his happiness to be ever on the pursuit. But no sooner is this pursuit rendered unnecessary by the full attainment of its object, than the bright chimera of his expectations only discovers itself to him as an ignis fatuus, that deluded his imagination and blasted his hopes. No accumulation of any kind can ensure happiness, but on the contrary it empisons the sap of contentment, and frequently proves too burthensome for life to bear.

Evils of this magnitude are daily under our observation,—but like most other forewarnings, prove only fulsome and unavailable, and from which we turn away with disgust. The accumulation of riches, when done through avaricious motives, is assuredly fraught with the weightiest evils, as it invariably proves an abettor to farther and more earnest desires, without satisfying the parsimonious and niggardly spirit which prompts such research. It behoves every one to avoid contracting penurious habits, or to endeavour to direct his views to objects where the effects of his accumulation may be beneficially felt.

Contentment is the most powerful remedy against the invasion of such a spirit—but even this, when contrasted with the enjoyments of the latter, presents but a bleak and unhappy prospect. To a miserly disposition, whose every joy dances on his profits and receipts, no persuasion could induce habits of contentment. If men would but weigh the different states of riches and poverty, carefully and openly calculating on the good and evil arising from each, it may safely be conjectured that individuals would see the destructiveness of the miser; and that such a character would be looked upon rather as a prodigy than as one of a numerous sect. It requires no argument to convince men that every condition of life brings with it a train of peculiar pleasures and distresses. That this was equal in all, would not be so easily comprehended by them,—for riches, which can procure any pleasure and almost as easily dispense with any misfortune, will certainly put a man in a more opportune and convenient means for supplying his wants. Human nature shrinks from poverty, and scorns her aspect.

But who can affirm that a beggar finds less pleasure in the accumulation of his daily pittance, than a lord whose revenue far exceeds his wants?—The one is at constant pains to amass together as much as will just support life—the other whose fortune is already made can be no longer gratified with the object of accumulation, but his riches open a thousand doors to mortification and distress—while poverty smiles with satisfaction on the humble means of realizing a subsistence, unaccompanied either by solicitude or remorse. I am not attempting to prove that poverty is preferable to high preferences, or that the latter are inseparable from a state of disquietude and care; but most men will think with me that, inasmuch as regards the accumulation of possessions, those are most enjoyed which are least easily attained, and when most needed, and on this consideration the enjoyments of an indigent state can seldom be surpassed by those of a rich one.

It is better to be poor in riches, than rich in bad principles. Habit, example, and fortitude concur in supporting us under the former—but the latter forms an insuperable barrier to our happiness, and deprives us of the purest enjoyment of reflection, viz. the certainty of possessing a good conscience.

Avarice is one of the most detestable of vices; and the accumulation of riches under such motives is productive of much greater disquietude than the most abject poverty. Here is every good principle of character sacrificed for a mere perishable idol of gold—consequently every source of happiness is impeded.

— Quid non mortalia pectora cogis
Auri sacra fames? Vico.

There are other objects of accumulation equally sought after by men of different casts of mind. Such are the pursuits of a class of virtuosi, a set of people harmless enough to the world at large, but who not unfrequently turn out rank enemies to themselves. There is a degree of selfishness very observable amongst them; their passion for accumulation obliterates every other study from their minds that might be more agreeable to their own interests. Consequently their own business is neglected, and their duty as members of society is altogether disregarded. The antiquary, who is one of this class, is a perfect accumulator—no matter how important his researches might prove by a chronological or historical application; provided he can muster together a multiplicity of antique non-descripts his object is fairly gained, and he feels himself the possessor of an invaluable prize. The different stratagems which men of opposite pursuits make use of to satisfy this monopolizing spirit are no less ludicrous than criminal; but I shall avoid commenting on any, as to do justice to one, all should be considered, and it would be too voluminous a task to condense in the limits of an essay. I shall conclude then by briefly observing, that an unrestrained indulgence of this spirit undermines a generous and noble disposition: lays barren a mind that promises a fruitful cultivation, and ultimately robs the heart of such emotions as are best adapted for creating permanent and untainted happiness.

MANCHESTER, ONE O'CLOCK, NOON.

PARODY.

The old Church tolls the knell of pudding time,
The dight truss'd Dandy trips along with glee,
The Porter homeward wends his way to dine,
And leaves each warehouse to the vermin free.

Now knives and forks are clattering on the board,
And many a frying-pan delighted sings,
Save that where poverty no means afford,
Or black phiz'd penny bath spread his wings.—

Save that in yonder solitary pile,
The specious salesman (to himself) complains,
Of such as keep him, rudely keep him, while
His beef-steak cooling waits at house in vain!

Beneath yon roof the sav'ry stridin smokes,
Where costly sideboards deck the splendid room,
Each bearing port, inspirer king of Jokes,
And sparkling burgundy that foe to gloom.

The ring of glasses hobbling, nobbling round,
The toast aye echo'd from a dozen throats,
The crack of liberts and the mingled sound,
Of pensions, profits, politics, and votes.—

Such are the rich man's joys, but, ah, the poor,
At once with fortune and with fate at strife,
Just keep the wolf from eating at the door,
And eke with meagre fare the wants of life.—

For them no cooks the viands choice prepare,
Nor busy Butler draws the racy wine,
No footmen wait attentive at their chair,
Nor bow obsequious at ambition's shrine:

Oh does the shuttle through their fingers stream,
The treddles oft their nimble foot demands,
How jocund do they drive the ponderous beam,
How grows the web beneath their plastic hands!

“Let not ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys and destiny obscure;
Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile,
The short and simple annals of the poor.”—

The grace of beauty, and the gauds of dress,
And all the trappings which the great assume,
Await alike, let human pride confess,
The varied workings of the lowly loom!

Nor you, ye rich, consider these unmoot,
If fashion o'er their limbs no vesture throws,
Where fragrant perfumes scatter round their sweets,
The pride of Dandies, and the boast of Beaus!—

Can yellow dross or all Potosi's mine,
Bestow the meed to worth and virtue due?
Can greatness bring the bosom's joy divine?
Which godlike Howard, Cheetham, Reynolds, knew!

Perhaps in yonder garret high, is mew'd,
Some head which Genius proudly calls his own;
Hands that the staff of office might induce,
And grace, with honor meet, the civic throne.—

But Fortune to their eyes her ample store,
Rich with the spoils of Ind did ne'er unfold,
Chill wait alone stood sentry at the door,
And barr'd the way to Plutus and his gold.

Full many a face of manly beauty bright,
The dark and narrow lanes and courts contain;
Full many a charm of feature's hid from sight,
Till soap and water wash away each stain.

Some darling • • that with dauntless heart,
The firm unshrinking friend of freedom stood;
Some • • here unnotic'd acts his part,
Some • • zealous for his country's good.—

The rending shouts of wondering mobs to draw,
The name of patriot liberal to prize;
To give to Britons liberty's full law,
And be an Alfred in the nation's eyes,

Their lot forbad, nor circumscrib'd alone
Their future greatness, but their steps confin'd,
Condemn'd to walk unknowing and unknown,
And bless with industry their fellow kind.

The biting pangs of poverty to hide,
To quench the wishes for a better fate;
And take with meekness what their toil supplied,
With unpal'd appetite unknown to state.

Far from the splendour of the rich and gay,
In lowly cellar or in attic high,
They kept the humble tenor of their way,
And cut the pile or made the shuttle fly.

Yet even these have failings like the best,
Some darling weaknesses, but all are frail,
With Whiskey's potent juice they break their rest,
And drown their senses oft in foaming ale.

Their long drawn score trac'd by wretched head,
The place of figures and of books supply,
Where many strokes in high terror stand,
Which tells of noggins and of gills gone by.

For who in Dog-days unto thirst a prey,
The tankard's cooling liquor e'er resign'd,
Left the snug kitchen or the bar room gay,
Nor cast one longing, lingering look, behind?

On some full pot the parting eye is fix'd,
Another drop the thirsty soul requires!
E'en the tobacco box bath joys amply'd,
E'en can the fragrant tube create desire!

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

Sir,—A perusal of your "Review of Macarty's Evidences of Christianity,"* led me to purchase that work in January last; and an advertisement with two commendatory extracts having appeared in the Iris of last Saturday, I am induced to trouble you with a few corroboratory remarks.

The Author's reason for undertaking the work is explicit,—“That a work of this nature is much wanted, no friend to Christianity will deny. The illustrious Bonnet complained that Christian advocates were too prone to dissertation; and to which I add—their candour is in reality, little short of indifference—To it, I attribute much of our present formality, coldness, scepticism. The infidel chooses a bold, nervous style;—the advocate, temperate, supposititious replication. What is the consequence? The latter obtains a few nice, considerate, logical converts; whilst the former gains a host in every rank and class of society.”

The justness of these observations will be immediately acknowledged by every man who has, with a view of founding his belief on an immovable basis, investigated our popular evidences. And, I must here confess, that Macarty's was the first conclusive, satisfactory treatise I ever met with.—His proofs are striking, comprehensive, and well arranged; and the whole work is admirably calculated to remove the doubts of the intelligent inquirer, and to confirm him in an unequivocal belief of the Gospel Dispensation.

The style is worthy of the subject, and the original matter is, throughout, marked with just discernment, and manly eloquence. Indeed, the plan and execution of the work are alike meritorious—they are equally characteristic of the talent and powers of the writer.

I am, &c.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Whilst seated the other night, as usual, before my blazing fire, with the plentiful supper board on the table, and the life of Lorenzo d' Medici, which I had been perusing, on my left hand side, I fell into a sort of dreaming reverie, and found myself wandering on the classic shores of Italy, with the whole paraphernalia of statues, books, manuscripts, and medals, floating, as it were in panoramic procession, before my delighted eyes. At the very moment I fancied myself on the entrance to the palace of Lorenzo, I was arrested by a warbling which seemed to fill the vast space where I stood, and to rivet my guide to the spot; the notes were sweet, but the tune melancholy; and, when I would have approached to discover the source of this melody, I started from my seat, and awoke!—Judge of my disappointment when, instead of my intelligent guide, I discovered my old housemaid, standing in an attitude, which conveyed to me well the state of her mind. She, with a low courtesy begged to know my commands, and hoped that I was not seriously indisposed. “It was all a dream,” said I, “but no, what sweet notes are those, and who is the divine creature that can warble so charmingly?” “Only a friend,” replied she, “who has called upon me.” I then begged that the door should be left open, and that her companion might not be disturbed, but rather urged to continue her musical recreation.

As she sang on, I endeavoured to take down the words, and found it no very difficult task, so sweetly yet so distinctly every syllable flowed from her lips.

The first appears to be a new version of the beautiful song “Flow, Flow, Cubana,” and so pathetic was her manner, that I seemed rivetted to the spot—it ran as follows:—

Strike, strike once more that melancholy strain,
No more thy harp with merry song shall sound;
For its lost master lies amid the slain,
And ne'er shall hear its tuneful notes again;
No more with it shall Cambria's halls resound!

Sound, sound, once more, that long and plaintive lay,
And tune it to the night bird's doleful mourn:—
For is thy master's music; and the day,
When I have listened—and his martial play;
Ah, all, alas! I am now for ever down!

The other was set to the tune of the old, but no less beautiful song—“Over the mountains.”

Far o'er yon mountains deep cover'd with snow,
Have you not heard of the poor orphan child?
Deeried and famish'd my sister is dying,
My poor little brother seeks food in yon wild.

Far o'er the ravines midst storms and dread tempests
Have I sought out this retreat from the rain;
Give me one morsel of bread now I pray you do,
Then will I seek my poor sister again.

Longing she looks for my coming to shelter her,
Give but one morsel, 'twill ease all my pain;
Give me some clothing to cover her starving limbs,
Then my good friends I'll ne'er trouble again.

Such were the two pieces that she sang, and, as the hall door closed upon her, I heard a promise that she would return in a few evenings, and take tea with them. How I longed to see the creature who had afforded me so much delight, I painted her as the most—but hold, I shall mayhap see her, and that ere long; then you shall hear my report, and, should I be able to copy any more songs, you shall have them from

IGNOTO.

BIOGRAPHY.

ANECDOTES OF SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

Sir Isaac Newton was the only child of Mr. John Newton, who had a small paternal estate near the little village of Woolthorpe, about half a mile west from Coltersworth, on the great north road between Stamford and Grantham, by the daughter of a gentleman whose name was Ayscough, who also lived in Woolthorpe, and was Lord of the Manor. Sir Isaac was born in the year 1642, and when a boy he was sometimes employed in very servile offices. He often watched the sheep; and it is reported that a gentleman once found him reading a book on practical geometry; and that upon asking him some questions, he discovered such tokens of uncommon genius that he applied to his mother, and strongly urged her to take the boy from the field, and give him a good education; offering to assist in his maintenance, if there should be occasion. It is not probable however, that if such an offer was made, it was ever accepted, for in the rolls, or records, which are sometimes read at the court-leets in Grantham, mention is made of Mr. Ayscough, Isaac's maternal grandfather, as guardian or trustee of Isaac Newton, under age. It is therefore reasonable to believe that Isaac had a provision under his mother's marriage settlement, and that his grandfather took care of his education. But, however this be, he was sent to the grammar school; and, as is well known, he afterwards pursued his academic studies in Trinity College, Cambridge.

His father died while he was yet a lad; and his mother married a second husband, whose name was Smith, then rector of North-Witham, a parish adjoining Coltersworth, by whom she had a son and some daughters, who afterwards intermarried with persons of property and character, of the names of Barton and Conduit.

The manor of Woolthorpe, with some other property, descended to Sir Isaac upon the death of his grandfather Ayscough; and he made some purchases himself; but the whole was inconsiderable, for his estate in that neighbourhood, at his death, amounted only to £105 per annum.

He went to College in the year 1660; and in 1664 took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In 1667 he was chosen Fellow, and took the degree of Master of Arts. In November, 1669, Dr. Isaac Barrow resigned the mathematical chair to Sir Isaac; and in 1671 he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1686 the privileges of the University being attacked by King James the Second, Sir Isaac appeared among the most hearty defenders, and was, on that occasion, appointed one of the delegates to the High-Commission Courts. In 1688 he was chosen one of the Members for the Convention Parliament, in which he sat till it was dissolved. His merit was now so well known to Charles Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, that when he undertook the great work of reconquering the money, he fixed upon Sir Isaac as his assistant, and in 1696 appointed him Warden of the Mint, in which employment he did very signal service to the nation. Three years afterwards he was promoted to the Mastership of that office, a place worth £1500 per annum. Upon this promotion he appointed Mr. Whiston his deputy in the Mathematical Professorship in Cambridge, giving him the full profits of the place, which too he procured for him in 1703. The same year he was chosen President of the Royal Society, in which chair he sat twenty-five years, till the day of his death.

Sir Isaac's principal residence in town was in a house at the corner of Long's Court, in Saint James's Street, Leicester Fields; upon the roof of which he built a small observatory. He died in Pitt's Buildings, Kensington, March 20, 1727, in the 85th year of his age; and was interred near the entrance into the choir of Westminster Abbey, where a stately monument is erected to his memory, with an inscription upon it, drawn up with consummate elegance.

This account, however brief and imperfect, may confute some errors which those who have written the life of Sir Isaac have fallen into. One author represents Sir Isaac's father as the eldest son of a baronet; but if this had been true, Sir Isaac, who was the only child of his father, would have had an hereditary title; whereas it is notorious, that the honour of knighthood was not conferred on him till 1705. Neither is it true that the family were opulent. The son of his father's brother was a carpenter, whose name was John Newton: he was afterwards game-keeper to Sir Isaac, and died at the age of sixty, in 1725. To Robert, the son of this John, Sir Isaac's estates in Woolthorpe descended, as his heir at law; and Sir Isaac's personal estate, which was very considerable, was shared among the children of his mother by her second marriage, and their descendants.

THE ALPS.

From Italy, a Poem, by S. Rogers.

Who first beholds those everlasting clouds,
Seed-time and harvest, morning, noon and night,
Still where they were, steadfast, immovable;
Who first beholds the Alps—that mighty chain
Of Mountains, stretching on from east to west,
So massive, yet so shadowy, so ethereal,
As to belong rather to Heaven than Earth—
But instantly receives into his soul
A sense, a feeling that he loses not,
A something that informs him 'tis a moment
Whence he may date henceforward and for ever!

To me they seemed the barriers of a World,
Saying, Thus far, no farther! and as o'er
The level plain I travelled silently,
Nearing them more and more, day after day,
My wandering thoughts my only company,
And they before me still, oft as I looked,
A strange delight, mingled with fear, came o'er me,
A wonder as at things I had not heard of!
Oft as I looked, I felt as though it were
For the first time!

Great was the tumult there,
Deafening the din, when in barbaric pomp
The Carthaginian on his march to Rome
Entered their fastnesses. Trampling the snows,
The war-horse reared; and the towered elephant
Upturned his trunk into the murky sky,
Then tumbled headlong, swallowed up and lost,
He and his rider.

Now the scene is changed;
And o'er Mount Cenis, o'er the Simplon winds
A path of pleasure. Like a silver zone
Flung about carelessly, it shines afar,
Catching the eye in many a broken link,
In many a turn and traverse as it glides;
And oft above and oft below appears,
Seen o'er the wall by him who journeys up,
As though it were another, not the same,
Leading along he knows not whence or whither.
Yet thro' its fairy-course, go where it will,
The torrent stops it not, the rugged rock
Opens and lets it in; and on it runs,
Winning its easy way from climate to climate
Through glens locked up before.

Not such my path!
Mine but for those, who, like Jean Jacques, delight
In dizziness, gazing and shuddering on Till fascination comes and the brain turns!
Mine, though I judge but from my age—stills
Over the Drance, just where the Abbot fell,
The same as Hannibal's.

But now 'tis past,
That turbulent Chaos: and the promised land
Lies at my feet in all its loveliness!
To him who starts up from a terrible dream,
And lo, the sun is shining, and the lark
Singing aloud for joy, to him is not Such sudden raptures as now I feel
At the first glimpses of fair Italy.

VARIETIES.

COGGESHALL FACETIE.—In perusing your 1, 2, 3 to 11 Coggeshall facetie, most of which I well remember being played off many years ago by the cooknies against those wise men of the East the Coggeshallians. I was much disappointed at your omitting two which for native ingenuity, are surely, though now they appear the last, not the least conspicuous.

On some general public rejoicing, it was rumoured through the town, that Colchester on the appointed Evening would be brilliantly illuminated. Many of the haut ton wishing much to have a view of this rarely occurring spectacle, set their wits to work how it could be managed that the loyalty of their ancient town should not be impeached, and, at the same time, the inhabitants not disappointed of this jaunt to Colchester. It was at last resolved in Solemn Conclave, that to enable the good people to enjoy themselves at Colchester during the night, Coggeshall should be illuminated during the day-time.

13. When the mania of Volunteering was at its height, the valorous Youth of this town not to be behindhand in patriotic spirit with their neighbours, agreed to form themselves into a Corps of Cavalry but wishing their military to interfere as little with their civil occupations as possible made the following prudential—Sine qua non.—That they never should be ordered to march beyond 8 miles of the town, nor within 3 miles of the enemy.

CIVIS.

NICE DISTINCTION.—An old gentleman of the name of Gould having married a very young wife, wrote a poetical epistle to a friend, to inform him of it, and concluded it thus :

"So you see, my dear Sir, though I'm eighty years old,
A Girl of Eighteen is in love with old Gould."

To which his friend replied.

"A Girl of Eighteen may love Gould, it is true,
But believe me, dear Sir, it is Gold without U!"

POLITICAL DISTICH.—On Lord Rockingham's becoming Minister during our disputes with America, a declaratory Bill being brought into the House of Commons, which was judged to be too tame by the adverse party, the following distich appeared in the papers—You had better declare, which you may without shocking 'em, That the Nation's asleep, and the Minister Rocking 'em.

A SOVEREIGN.—"Though not perhaps to be reckoned amongst puns, yet the names of things as well as persons, are liable to very odd perversions. I do not like the name of our gold coin the Sovereign on this account. We need be careful of not incurring the charge of High Treason, by our common expressions concerning it. How strangely the following must sound to any loyal ear :

"I have got a dreadfully bad Sovereign.

"I wish I could change my Sovereign.

"I am sure the Sovereign I have got is not worth twenty shillings.

"I have but half a Sovereign.

"And how many of His Majesty's most devoted subjects, if they were to speak their minds freely, must cordially and daily wish, to have more Sovereigns than one.

"To console however the friends of Monarchy, we may be just as certain that every person in His Majesty's dominions would rather have one, than none."

LONDON GAS-LIGHTS.—The length of streets already lighted with gas in London is 215 miles; and three principal companies light 39,504 public lamps, and consume annually about 33,158 chaldrons of coal.

STRANGE APPROPRIATION.—A magpie built her nest, in 1821, in a tree sixteen feet high, and brought forth five young ones; in 1822 a hawk brought forth four young ones in the same nest, which were taken by Mr. Grant, game-keeper to H. Peirse, Esq.; and this year, 1823, a wild-duck has taken up her residence in the same nest, and deposited ten eggs.

METEOR.—On Friday night, the 2nd instant, exactly at eleven o'clock, a fiery meteor of considerable magnitude, resembling in shape a large kite, was observed (says the Carlisle Patriot) in the heavens, travelling with great velocity in the direction from south to north.

In its progress it emitted a vast number of sparks from its tail, and so brilliant and vivid was the reflection caused thereby, that the streets of this city and the surrounding country were illuminated in a very extraordinary degree. It finally separated into distinct masses, without any explosion.

WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.—"A subject in itself didactic and critical, admits neither the charms of the beautiful, the corruscations of the surprising, nor the emportement of the sublime."—A less circumscribed course of reading would have taught the author otherwise!

CRITICISM.—"When the reader has investigated, balanced, viewed, and reviewed every particular, his opinion may be candid and impartial."! It may indeed!—And he will have afforded ample proof that he is a patient investigator, balancer, viewer, and reviewer!!

TECHNICALS.—"If the character of a Poet be concentrated within a single line, it has been the result of painful analysis. It is hoped that no precipitate judgment will be formed with respect to the decision that is made." These technicals, with the effervescences and efflorescences so frequently met with, prove that the writer or his TUTOR must be a chemist—at least a dabbler in theoretical chemistry!

DEIFICATION.—"The apotheosis of a character is the work of a century; and even the estimate of genius should pass seven times through the furnace of criticism, before it can appear without dross and alloy."! This is profound and unassuming!!

SCIOLOGISTS.—"Peculiar predilections for some particular author, and a circumscribed acquaintance with the Poets, will necessarily induce a warmth of partiality, which, more general perusals would at once moderate and cool. He who has read 'Thomson's Seasons,' often speaks with as invincible dogmatism and supercilious animadversion as if he had read Chaucer and Spenser; or rather, I may more justly observe, as if he had never seen them"! See Eustace St. Clare's Beauties of English Poetry—Manchester Iris for 1823, page 3!!

WAVERLEY.—The unknown author of Waverley is elected member of the Roxburgh Club, and we believe it is understood, that, in case this mysterious person should be found wanting, when called upon, his chair is to be occupied by Sir Walter Scott.

ANECDOTE OF LORD BYRON.—In front of Newstead Abbey, (ten miles from Nottingham,) the seat of the Byron family, is an elegant monument, erected by Lord Byron, the Poet, to the memory of a favourite Dog.—Near it were formed three vanitas, which were also prepared by his Lordship.—In one of them are deposited the remains of his favourite Dog, and in the other two, his Lordship intended his own remains and those of a favourite servant to be also interred, when the hand of death closed their earthly career.

The following Inscription was placed on the Monument.

"Near this Spot

Are deposited the Remains of one

Who possessed Beauty without Vanity,

Strength, without Insolence,

Courage, without Ferocity,

And all the Virtues of Man, without his Vices.

This Praise.

Which would be unmeaning Flattery, if inscribed

Who was born in Newfoundland, May, 1803, and died at

Newstead, Nov. 18,

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Humphrey Plausible appears to be a shrewd impertinent fellow.—But, on consideration, we are inclined to receive his communication as a pure irony; in which case, we shall only dub him a pleasant, ingenious trifler.—Why, Mr. H. P. should we pirate from an unpublished Novel!—Are our readers as impatient for its plot, as the Cornhill tribe are said to be for a first intimation of the decision of a long-pending battle!—Or, is the mere plot at all interesting or necessary! The admirers of Sir Walter will peruse Quentin Durward for themselves, however copious our extracts; and readers who have no taste for the original, will hardly deign to dip into even a pirated chapter!—This, Mr. H. P. was, and is, our opinion; and it induced us to pass over the extracts alluded to with a smile of pity and contempt, and a passing remark, as to the disappointment that would arise to these garbling forestallers, should the great unknown interpose, and block up their illicit medium.—And that this, Mr. H. P. has really turned out to be the case, is to us a source of great self-gratification; inasmuch as it shows the correctness of our judgment, disappoints the host of continuers, and chastises their unreflecting edrontery.

L. B.'s favours are received.—Our quizzical and very loving friend is somewhat too severe.—Having despatched the work in question with unqualified censure, would not a further similar notice of it be highly indecorous and illiberal!—We are satisfied with our legitimate province, and having discharged the duties incumbent upon us, unless they are grateful and entertaining, a recurrence is avoided.—We heard of the preposterous puff so pointedly animadverted upon; but think its weakness and fallacy too gross for reprobation.—See our commented "varieties."

Barythmia is unavoidably deferred till next week, owing to our engraving of St. Mary's Spire.

REVIEW.

[On reference to the advertisement in our last page, it will be seen that Quentin Durward is published; and we lose not a moment in presenting our readers with an analysis and specimens of the work, as given in the Literary Gazette of Saturday last.—We at the same time notice with peculiar satisfaction how spiritedly this respectable periodical animadverts upon the flimsy puff, and disingenuous conduct of some contemporary Journals.—See our address to "Hampshire Plausible," in "NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS" last week.—Ed.]

Quentin Durward. By the Author of Waverley, &c. 3 vols. London, Hurst Robinson and Co.

THE first volume of this work, dishonourably obtained (as we are assured,) has furnished some Journals with long articles, and a prolific cause for bragging of their priority of intelligence and immense circulation. Such priority far be it from us to contest—such circulation may it never be our lot to know; for we cannot steal, and to beg we should be ashamed. The homely adage of "the more haste the worse speed," has been completely verified in this instance; and though disgusted with the quackery which has made a moonshine mountain of a partial knowledge most equivocally obtained and discredibly used, we should evince a poor sense of the established character of our work with its extensive influence and consequent power, and a strong suspicion of stupidity in the public, were we to employ more breath in blowing away these bubbles.

An admirable Introduction, in the Author's very best manner, brings us to this novelty from his pen,—a picture of foreign manners towards the end of the fifteenth century. And well is it contrasted with this introductory outline of those of the beginning of the nineteenth, in which the interesting portrait of a restored Emigrant of the old Court is one of the happiest ever drawn even by the master of Waverley. The nature and humour of this outwork would detain us, had we not ample occasion to adduce similar qualities in the main fortress; suffice it to say, that in the ruined Chateau of Hautlieu the history of Quentin Durward is said to have been found.

The hero, a young Scotsman of the shire of Angus (or Hanguisse, as the Marquis persists in calling it,) and the only surviving branch of a gentle family, whom the Ogilvies had harried and exterminated in a feud, arrives in France in quest of happier fortunes; but previously to entering on his adventures, we have a finely written view of the state of that country, and of the characters of Louis XI. and Charles Duke of Burgundy. It is the hap of Quentin to encounter the former near Plessis-lez-Tours, and to ingratiate himself into his favour, as far as an ingenuous youth could be prized by a tortuous politician. At first Louis suffers the adventurer to be nearly drowned, and then succours him as Maitre Pierre, a substantial citizen; while his attendant (Tristan, his provost marshal) passes for a still lower character. He is carried to an inn, and kindly entertained by the king, who discovers that he is in search of service, and looks forward to a maternal uncle, one of his Majesty's bravest Scottish archers, and named Ludovic Leslie, or le Balafré, from a scar on his face. At this inn Quentin is blessed with a sight of Isabelle, Countess of Croye, a vassal of the Duke of Burgundy's, but who, with her aunt Hameline, had fled to Louis, to avoid being forced into a hated marriage by that hot and peremptory Lord.

The next character who appears on the stage is his uncle Ludovic; and a portion of the author's description of the interview between the relations is well worth citing as an example of the work:—

The cavalier who awaited Quentin Durward's descent into the apartment where he had breakfasted, was one of those of whom Louis XI. had long since said, that they held in their hands the fortune of France, as to them were entrusted the direct custody and protection of the royal person.

. Each of them ranked as gentlemen in place and honour; and their near approach to the king's person gave them dignity in their own eyes, as well as in those of the nation of France. They were sumptuously armed, equipped, and mounted; and each was entitled to allowance for a squire, a valet, a page, and two yeomen, one of whom was termed couteilier, from the large knife which he wore to dispatch those whom in the metz his master had thrown to the ground. With these followers, and a corresponding equipage, an Archer of the Scottish Guard was a person of quality and importance; and vacancies being generally filled up by those who had been trained in the service as pages or valets, the cadets of the best Scottish families were often sent to serve under some friend and relation in those capacities, until a chance of preferment should occur.

The couteilier and his companion, not being noble or capable of this promotion, were recruited from persons of inferior quality; but as their pay and appointments were excellent, their masters were easily able to select from among their wandering countrymen the strongest and most courageous to wait upon them in that capacity.

Ludovic Leslie, or, as we shall more frequently call him, Le Balafré, by which name he was generally known in France, was upwards of six feet high, robust, strongly compacted in person, and hard-favoured in countenance, which latter attribute was much increased by a large and ghastly scar, which, beginning on his forehead, and narrowly missing his right eye, had laid bare the cheek-bone, and descended from thence almost to the tip of his ear, exhibiting a deep seam, which was sometimes scarlet, sometimes purple, sometimes blue, and sometimes approaching to black; but always hideous, because at variance with the complexion of the face in whatever state it chanced to be, whether agitated or still, flushed with unusual passion, or in its ordinary state of weather-beaten and sun-burnt swarthiness.

His dress and arms were splendid. He wore his national bonnet, crested with a tuft of feathers, and with a Virgin Mary of massive silver for a brooch. These had been presented to the Scottish Guard, in consequence of the King, in one of his fits of superstitious piety, having devoted the swords of his guard to the service of the Holy Virgin, and, as some say, carried the matter so far as to draw out a commission to Our Lady as the Captain General. The Archer's gorget, arm-piece, and gauntlets, were of the finest steel, curiously inlaid with silver, and his hauberk, or shirt of mail, was as clear and bright as the frost-work of a winter morning upon fern or brier. He wore a loose surcoat, or cassock, of rich blue velvet, open at the sides like that of a herald, with a large white cross of embroidered silver bisecting it both before and behind—his knees and legs were protected by hose of mail and shoes of steel—a broad strong poniard (called the Mercy of God) hung by his right side—the bauldrick for his two handed sword, richly embroidered, hung upon his left shoulder; but, for convenience, he at present carried in his hand that unwieldy weapon, which the rules of his service forbade him to lay aside.

Quentin Durward, though, like the Scottish youth of the period, he had been early taught to look upon arms and war, thought he had never seen a more martial-looking, or more completely equipped and accomplished man-at-arms, than now saluted him in the person of his mother's brother, called Ludovic with the Scar, or Le Balafré; yet he could not but shrink a little from the grim expression of his countenance, while, with its rough moustachios, he brushed first the one and then the other cheek of his kinsman, welcomed his fair nephew to France, and, in the same breath, asked what news from Scotland.

'Little good, dear uncle,' replied young Durward; 'but I am glad that you know me so readily.'

'I would have known thee, boy, in the landes of Bourdeaux, had I met thee marching there like a crane on a pair of stilts. But sit thee down—sit thee down—if there is sorrow to hear of, we will have wine to make us bear it.—Ho! old Pinch-Measure, our good host, bring us of thy best, and that in an instant.'

The well-known sound of the Scottish French was as familiar in the taverns near Plessis, as that of the Swiss-French in the modern ginguettes of Paris; and promptly—ay, with the promptitude of fear and precipitation, was it heard and obeyed. A flaggon of champagne soon stood before them, of which the elder took a draught, while the nephew helped himself only to a moderate sip, to acknowledge his uncle's courtesy, saying, in excuse, that he had already drank wine that morning.

'That had been a rare apology in the mouth of thy sister, fair nephew,' said Le Balafré; 'you must fear the wine-pot less, if you would wear beard on your face, and write yourself soldier. But, come—come—unbuckle your Scottish mail-bag—give us the news of Glen-houlakin—how doth my sister?'

'Dead, fair uncle,' answered Quentin, sorrowfully.

'Dead!' echoed his uncle, with a tone rather marked by wonder than sympathy—'why, she was five years younger than I, and I was never better in my life. Dead! the thing is impossible. I have never had so much as a headache, unless after revelling out my two or three days' furlow with the brethren of the joyous science—and my poor sister is dead!—And your father, fair nephew, hath he married again?'

And, ere the youth could reply, he read the answer in his surprise at the question, and said, 'What, no?—I would have sworn that Allan Durward was no man to live without a wife. He loved to have his house in order—loved to look on a pretty woman too; and was somewhat strict in life withal—matrimony did all this for him. Now, I care little about these comforts; and I can look on a pretty woman without thinking on the sacrament of wedlock—I am scarce holy enough for that.'

'Alas! dear uncle, my mother was left a widow a year since, when Glen-houlakin was harried by the Ogilvies. My father, and my two uncles, and my two elder brothers, and seven of my kinsmen, and the harper, and the tasker, and some six more of our people, were killed in defending the castle; and there is not a burning hearth or a standing stone in all Glen-houlakin.'

'Cross of Saint Andrew!' said Le Balafre; 'that is what I call an onslaught. Ay, these Ogilvies were ever but sorry neighbours to Glen-houlakin—an evil chance it was; but fate of war—fate of war.—When did this mishap befall, fair nephew?' With that he took a deep draught of wine in lieu, and shook his head with much solemnity, when his kinsman replied, that his family had been destroyed upon the festival of Saint Jude last bye-past.

'Look ye there,' said the soldier; 'I said it was all chance—on that very day I and twenty of my comrades carried the Castle of Roche-noir by storm, from Amaury Bras-de-fer, a captain of free lances, whom you must have heard of. I killed him on his own threshold, and gained as much gold as made this fair chain, which was once twice as long as it now is—and that minds me to send part of it on an holy errand.—Here, Andrew—Andrew!'

Andrew, his yeoman, entered, dressed like the Archer himself in the general equipment, but without the armour for the limbs,—that of the body more coarsely manufactured—his cap without a plume, and his cassock made of serge, or coarse cloth, instead of rich velvet. Untwining his gold chain from his neck, Balafre twisted off, with his firm and strong-set teeth, about four inches from the one end of it, and said to his attendant, 'Here, Andrew, carry this to my gossip, jolly Father Boniface, the monk of Saint Martin's—greet him well from me, by the same token that he could not say God save ye when we last parted at midnight.—Tell my gossip that my brother and sister, and some others of my house, are all dead and gone, and I pray him to say masses for their souls as far as the value of these links will carry him, and to do on trust what else may be necessary to free them from Purgatory. And hark ye, as they were just-living people, and free from all heresy, it may be that they are well nigh out of limbo already, so that a little matter may have them free of the fetlocks; and in that case, look ye, ye will say I desire to take out the gold in curses upon a generation called the Ogilvies, in what way soever the church may best come at them. You understand all this, Andrew?'

The countier nodded.

'Then look that none of the links find their way to the wine-house ere the Monk touches them; for if it so chance, thou shalt taste of saddle-girth and stirrup-leather, till thou art as raw as St. Bartholomew.—Yet hold, I see thy eye has fixed on the wine-measure, and thou shalt not go without tasting.'

So saying, he filled him a brimful cup, which the countier drank off, and retired to do his patrons commission.

'And now, fair nephew, let us hear what was your own fortune in this unhappy matter.'

'I fought it out among those that were older and stouter than I was, till we were all brought down,' said Durward, 'and I received a cruel wound.'

'Not a worse slash than I received ten years since myself,' said Le Balafre.—'Look at this now, my fair nephew,' tracing the dark crimson gash which was imprinted on his face.—'An Ogilvy's sword never ploughed so deep a furrow.'

'They ploughed deeply enough,' answered Quentin, sadly; 'but they were tired at last, and my mother's entreaties procured mercy for me, when I was found to retain some spark of life; but although a learned monk of the Aberbrothock, who chanced to be our guest at the fatal time, and narrowly escaped being killed in the fray, was permitted to bind my wounds, and finally to remove me to a place of safety, it was only on promise, given both by my mother and him, that I should become a monk.'

For this vocation, however, he was unfit; and after being taught the rare accomplishments of reading and writing, set forth, as shown, to push his fortunes. These prosper, for he acts bravely and prudently; saves the King at a Boar-hunt, is enrolled among the Scots archers of his guard, and employed on matters of the utmost pith and moment. In the end of the first volume, Crevecoeur, a brave Burgundian ambassador, delivers a hostile message from his master the Duke; but Louis temporizes, and to avoid one part of the ground of quarrel, entrusts Quentin with a charge of the ladies, Hameline and Isabelle, to convey them to the Bishop of Liege for protection, while in reality he plans their being seized by William de la Marck, a lawless warrior, called the Boar of the Ardennes, and disposed of by that savage.

The characters introduced in this volume are finely delineated. Louis, and his ministers or adherents, Cardinal Balue, Oliver le Dain (his barber), Tristan (his executioner), and his satellite hangmen, Trois-Eschelles and Petit-André, are not only strikingly identified, but the Duke of Orleans, the brave Dunois, Joan, the King's daughter, Crawford, the Captain of the Guard, Isabelle of Croye, and certain Bohemian vagabonds who perform no unimportant parts in the drama, are all most characteristically woven into the web of this history so unlike a fiction.

The second volume is nearly occupied with the journey of Quentin and his beloved charge to Leige, after the superstitious King has consulted his astrologer Galleotti on the probable issue of that step. Our hero avoids the snare laid for them on the route, and overmatches his treacherous guide, one of the Bohemians whom we have mentioned. A short bit of colloquy on the way may serve as a characteristic sketch of those rude times. Isabelle says—'God knows, I never wished—to occasion war betwixt France and my native Burgundy, or that lives should be lost for such as me. I only implored permission to retire to the Convent of Marmonthier, or to any other holy sanctuary.'

'You spoke then like a fool, my cousin,' answered the elder lady, 'and not like a daughter of my noble brother. It is well there is still one alive, who hath some of the spirit of the noble house of Croye. How should a high-born lady be known from a sun-burnt milk-maid, save that spears are broken for the one, and only hamel-poles for the other? I tell you, maiden, that while I was in the very earliest bloom, scarcely older than yourself, the famous Passage of Arms at Hastinghem was held in my honour; the challengers were four, the assailants so many as twelve. It lasted three days; and cost the lives of two adventurous knights, the fracture of one back-bone, one collar-bone, three legs and two arms, besides flesh-wounds and bruises beyond the heralds' counting; and thus have the ladies of our house ever been honoured. Ah, had you but half the heart of your noble ancestry, you would find means at some court, where ladies' love and fame in arms are still prized, to maintain a tournament, at which your hand should be the prize, as was that of your great-grandmother of blessed memory, at the spear-running of Strasbourg; and thus should you gain the best lance in Europe, to maintain the rights of the House of Croye, both against the oppression of Burgundy and the policy of France.'

'But, fair kinswoman,' answered the younger Countess, 'I have been told by old nurse, that although the Rhingrave was the best lance at the great tournament at Strasbourg, and so won the hand of my respected grandmother, yet the match was no happy one, as he used often to scold, and sometimes to beat, my great-grandmother of blessed memory.'

'And wherefore not?' said the elder Countess, in her romantic enthusiasm for the profession of chivalry; 'why should those victorious arms, accustomed to blows abroad, be bound to restrain their energies at home? A thousand times rather would I be beaten twice a-day, by a husband whose arm was as much feared by others as by me, than be the wife of a coward, who dared neither to lift hand to his wife, nor to any one else!'

'I should wish you joy of such a restless mate, fair aunt,' replied Isabelle, 'without envying you; for if broken bones be lovely in tourneys, there is nothing less amiable in ladies' bower.'

'Nay, but the beating is no necessary consequence of wedding with a knight of fame in arms; though it is true that our ancestor of blessed memory, the Rhingrave Gottfried, was something rough-tempered, and addicted to the use of Rhein-wein.—The very perfect knight is a lamb among ladies, and a lion among lances. There was Thibault of Montigui—God be with him!—he was the kindest soul alive, and not only was he never so discomfited as to lift hand against his lady, but, by our good dame, he who beat all enemies without doors, found a fair foe could belabour him within.—Well, 'twas his own fault—he was one of the challengers at the Passage of Hastinghem, and so well bestirred himself, that, if it had pleased Heaven, and your grandfather, there might have been a lady of Montigui, who had used his gentle nature more gently.'

The Countess Isabelle, who had some reason to dread this Passage of Hastinghem, it being a topic upon which her aunt was at all times very diffuse, suffered the conversation to drop; and Quentin, with the natural politeness of one who had been gently nurtured, dreading lest his presence might be a restraint on their conversation, rode forward to join the guide, as if to ask him some questions concerning their route.

A graver theme soon occupied them. Orleans, who could not love the match provided for him by the King, could love Isabelle, and follows her escort. Quentin, however, unhorses him, and sustains a noble combat with his companion the renowned Dunois; till a body of the archers ride up to his relief. The assailants are carried off prisoners, and our victorious Scot pursues his dangerous way, under uncertain guidance, as the following extract will show:

While he hesitated whether it would be better to send back one of his followers, he heard the blast of a horn, and looking in the direction from which the sound came, beheld a horseman riding very fast towards them. The low size, and wild, shaggy, untrained state of the animal, reminded Quentin of the mountain breed of horses in his own country; but this was much more finely limbed, and, with the same appearance of hardness, was more rapid in its movements. The head particularly, which, in the Scottish poney, is often lumpy and heavy, was small and well placed in the neck of this animal, with thin jaws, full sparkling eyes, and expanded nostrils.

The rider was even more singular in his appearance than the horse which he rode, though that was extremely unlike the horses of France. Although he managed his palfrey with great dexterity, he sat with his feet in broad stirrups, something resembling a shovel, so short, that his knees were well nigh as high as the pommel of his saddle. His dress was a red turban of small size, in which he wore a sullied plume, secured by a clasp of silver; his tunic, which was shaped like those of the Estradiots, a sort of troops whom the Venetians at that time levied in the provinces, on the eastern side of their gulf, was green in colour, and tawdriely laced with gold; he wore very wide drawers or trowsers of white, though none of the cleanest, which gathered beneath the knee, and his swarthy legs were quite bare, unless for the complicated laces which bound a pair of sandals on his feet; he had no spurs, the edge of his large stirrups being so sharp as to serve to goad the horse in a very severe manner. In a crimson sash this singular horseman wore a dagger on the right side, and on the left a short crooked Moorish sword, and by a tarnished baldrick over the shoulder hung the horn which announced his approach. He had a swarthy and sun-burnt visage, with a thin beard, and piercing dark eyes, a well-formed mouth and nose, and other features which might have been pronounced handsome, but for the black elf-locks which hung around his face, and the air of wildness and emaciation, which rather seemed to indicate a savage than a civilized man.

Quentin rode up to the Bohemian, and said to him, as he suddenly assumed his proper position on the horse, 'Metinks, friend, you will prove but a blind guide, if you look at the tail of your horse rather than his ears.'

'And if I were actually blind,' answered the Bohemian, 'I could guide through any country in this realm of France, or in those adjoining to it.'

'Yet you are no Frenchman born,' said the Scot.

'I am not,' answered the guide.

'What countryman, then, are you?' demanded Quentin.

'I am of no country,' answered the guide.

'How! of no country?' repeated the Scot.

'No,' answered the Bohemian, 'of none. I am a Zingaro, a Bohemian, an Egyptian, or whatever the Europeans, in their different languages, may chuse to call our people; but I have no country.'

'Are you a Christian?' asked the Scotchman.

The Bohemian shook his head.

'Dog,' said Quentin, (for there was little toleration in the spirit of Catholicism in those days,) 'dost thou worship Mahon?'

'No,' was the indifferent and concise answer of the guide, who neither seemed offended nor surprised at the young man's violence of manner.

'Are you a Pagan then, or what are you?'

'I have no religion,' answered the Bohemian.

Durward started back; for, though he had heard of Saracens and Idolaters, it had never entered into his ideas or belief, that any body of men could exist who practised no mode of worship whatsoever. He recovered from his astonishment, to ask where his guide usually dwelt.

'Wherever I chance to be for the time,' replied the Bohemian. 'I have no home.'

'How do you guard your property?'

'Excepting the clothes which I wear, and the horse I ride on, I have no property.'

'Yet you dress gaily, and ride gallantly,' said Durward. 'What are your means of subsistence?'

'I eat when I am hungry, drink when I am thirsty, and have no other means of subsistence than chance throws in my way,' replied the vagabond.

'Under whose laws do you live?'

'I acknowledge obedience to none, but as it suits my pleasure,' said the Bohemian.

'Who is your leader, and commands you?'

'The father of our tribe—if I chuse to obey him,' said the guide—'otherwise I have no commander.'

'You are then,' said the wandering querist, 'destitute of all that other men are combined by—you have no law, no leader, no settled means of subsistence, no house, or home. You have, may Heaven compassionate you, no country—and, may Heaven enlighten and forgive you, you have no God! What is it that remains to you, deprived of government, domestic happiness and religion?'

'I have liberty,' said the Bohemian—'I crouch to no one—obey no one—respect no one—I go where I will—live as I can—and die when my day comes.'

'But you are subject to instant execution, at the pleasure of the Judge.'

'Be it so,' returned the Bohemian; 'I can but die so much the sooner.'

'And to imprisonment also,' said the Scot; 'and where, then, is your boasted freedom?'

'In my thoughts,' said the Bohemian, 'which no chains can bind; while yours, even when your limbs are free, remain fettered by your laws and your superstitions, your dreams of local attachment, and your fantastic visions of civil policy. Such as I am free in spirit when our limbs are chained.—You are imprisoned in mind, even when your limbs are most at freedom.'

'Yet the freedom of your thoughts,' said the Scot, 'relieves not the pressure of the gyves on your limbs.'

'For a brief time that may be endured; and if without that period I cannot extricate myself, and fail of relief from my comrades, I can always die, and death is the most perfect freedom of all.'

There was a deep pause of some duration which Quentin at length broke by resuming his queries.

'Yours is a wandering race, unknown to the nations of Europe—Whence do they derive their origin?'

'I may not tell you,' answered the Bohemian.

'When will they relieve this kingdom from their presence, and return to the land from whence they came?' said the Scot.

'When the day of their pilgrimage shall be accomplished,' replied his vagrant guide.

'Are you not sprung from those tribes of Israel which were carried into captivity beyond the great river Euphrates?' said Quentin, who had not forgotten the lore which had been taught him at Aberbrothock.

'Had we been so,' answered the Bohemian, 'we had followed their faith, and practised their rites.'

'What is thine own name?' said Durward.

'My proper name is only known to my brethren—The men beyond our tents call me Hayraddin Maugrabzin, that is, Hayraddin the African Moor.'

Thou speakest too well for one who hath lived always in the filthy horde,' said the Scot.

'I have learned some of the knowledge of this land,' said Hayraddin.—'When I was a little boy, our tribe was chased by the hunters after human flesh. An arrow went through my mother's head, and she died. I was entangled in the blanket on her shoulders, and was taken by the pursuers. A priest begged me from the Provost's archers, and trained me up in Frankish learning for two or three years.'

'How came you to part with him?' demanded Durward.

'I stole money from him—even the God which he worshipped,' answered Hayraddin, with perfect composure; 'he detected me, and beat me—I stabbed him with my knife, fled to the woods, and was again united to my people.'

'Wretch!' said Durward, 'did you murder your benefactor?'

'What had he to do to burden me with his benefits?—The Zingaro boy was no house-bred cur to dog the heels of his master and crouch beneath his blows, for scraps of food—He was the imprisoned wolf-whelp, which at the first opportunity broke his chain, rended his master, and returned to his wilderness.'

There was another pause, when the young Scot, with a view of still farther investigating the character and purpose of this suspicious guide, asked Hayraddin, 'Whether it was not true that his people, amid their ignorance, pretended to a knowledge of futurity, which was not given to the sages, philosophers, and divines, of more polished society?'

'We pretend to it,' said Hayraddin, 'and it is with justice.'

'How can it be that so high a gift is bestowed on so abject a race?' said Quentin.

'Can I tell you?' answered Hayraddin.—'Yes, I may indeed; but it is when you shall explain to me why the dog can trace the footsteps of man, while man, the nobler animal, hath no power to trace those of the dog. These powers, which seem to you so wonderful, are instinctive in our race. From the lines on the face and on the hand, we can tell the future fate of those who consult us, even as surely as you know from the blossom of the tree in spring, what fruit it will bear in the harvest.'

The man who besets their way, in correspondence with this strange being is still more hateful:

'His name is William de la Marck.'

'Called William with the beard,' said the young Scotchman, 'or the Wild Boar of Ardennes?'

'And rightly so called, my son,' said the Prior; 'because he is as the wild boar of the forest, which treadeth down with his hoofs and rendeth with his tusks. And he hath formed to himself a band of more than a thousand men, all, like himself, contempters of civil and ecclesiastical authority, and holds himself independent of the Duke of Burgundy, and maintains himself and his followers by rapine and wrong, wrought without distinction, upon churchmen and laymen.'

The loves of Quentin and Isabelle grow on this uneasy journey; but greater peril awaits them after they are safely lodged with the Bishop of Liege, whose castle is attacked in the dead of night by the Boar of Ardennes and the Liegeois, and its master barbarously murdered. Quentin, by courage, skill, and good luck, succeeds in rescuing Isabelle. In the midst of the carnage he penetrates to her oratory—

—Where a female figure, which had been kneeling in agonising supplication before the holy image, now sunk at length on the floor, under the new terrors implied in this approaching tumult. He hastily raised her from the ground, and, joy of joys! it was she whom he sought to save—the Countess Isabelle. He pressed her to his bosom—he conjured her to awake—entreated her to be of good cheer—for that she was now under the protection of one who had heart and hand enough to defend her against armies.

'Durward,' she said, as she at length collected herself, 'is it indeed you?—then there is some hope left. I thought all living and mortal friends had left me to my fate—Do not again abandon me.'

'Never—never,' said Durward. 'Whatever shall happen—whatever danger shall approach, may I forfeit the benefits purchased by yonder blessed sign, if I be not the sharer of your fate until it is again a happy one?'

Through fortuitous circumstances, too long for detail, Quentin finds allies in Pavillon and his party; but they cannot quit the castle without permission from De la Marck, before whom they go:

At the head of the table sat, in the Bishop's throne and state, which had been hastily brought thither from his great council chamber, the redoubted Boar of Ardennes himself, well deserving that dreaded name, in which he affected to delight, and which he did as much as he could think of to deserve. His head was unhelmeted, but he wore the rest of his ponderous and bright armour, which, indeed, he rarely laid aside. Over his shoulders hung a strong sarcoat, made of the dressed skin of a huge wild boar, the hoofs being of solid silver, and the tusks of the same. The skin of the head was so arranged, that, drawn over the casque, when the Baron was armed, or over his bare head, in the fashion of a hood, as he often affected when the helmet was laid aside, and as he now wore it, the effect was that of a grinning, ghastly monster; and yet the countenance which it overshadowed scarce required such horrors to improve those which were natural to its ordinary expression.

The upper part of De la Marck's face, as Nature had formed it, almost gave the lie to his character; for though his hair, when uncovered, resembled the rude and wild bristles of the hood he had drawn over it, yet an open, high, and manly forehead, broad ruddy cheeks, large, sparkling, light-coloured eyes, and a nose hooked like the beak of the eagle, promised something valiant and generous; yet the effect of these more favourable traits was entirely overpowered by his habits of violence and insolence, which, joined to debauchery and intemperance, had stamped upon the features a character inconsistent with the rough gallantry which they would otherwise have exhibited. The former had, from habitual indulgence, swollen the muscles of the cheeks, and those around the eyes, in particular the latter; evil practices and habits had dimmed the eyes themselves, reddened the part of them that should have been white, and given the whole face a hideous resemblance of the monster which it was the terrible Baron's pleasure to resemble. But, from an odd sort of contradiction, De la Marck, while he assumed in other respects the appearance of the Wild Boar, and even seemed pleased with the name, yet endeavoured, by the length and growth of his beard, to conceal the circumstance that had originally procured him that denomination. This was an unusual thickness and projection of the mouth and upper jaw, which, with the huge projecting side-teeth, gave that resemblance to the bestial creation, which, joined to the delight that De la Marck had in haunting the forest so called, originally procured for him the name of the Boar of Ardennes. The beard, broad, grisly, and uncombed, neither concealed the natural horrors of the countenance, nor dignified its brutal expression.

The soldiers and officers sat around the table, intermixed with the men of Liege, some of them of the very lowest description; among whom Nikkel Blok the butcher, placed near De la Marck himself, was distinguished by his tucked up sleeves, which displayed arms smeared to the elbows with blood, as was the cleaver which lay on the table before him. The soldiers wore, most of them, their beards long and grisly, in imitation of their leader: had their hair plaited and turned upwards, in the manner that might best improve the natural ferocity of their appearance; and intoxicated, as many of them seemed to be, partly with the sense of triumph, and partly with the long libations of wine which they had been quaffing, presented a spectacle at once hideous and disgusting. The language which they held, and the songs which they sung, without even pretending to pay each other the compliment of listening, were so full of license and blasphemy, that Quentin blessed God that the extremity of the noise prevented them from being intelligible to his companion.

The preparations for the feast had been as disorderly as the quality of the company. The whole of the Bishop's plate—nay, even that belonging to the Church, for the Boar of Ardennes regarded not the imputation of sacrilege—were mingled with black jacks, or huge tankards made of leather, and drinking-horns of the most ordinary description.

One circumstance of horror remains to be added and accounted for: and we willingly leave the rest of the scene to the imagination of the reader. Amidst the wild license assumed by the soldiers of De la Marck, one who was excluded from the table, (a Lansknecht, remarkable for his courage and for his daring behaviour during the storm of the evening,) had impudently snatched up a large silver goblet, and carried it off, declaring it should atone for his loss of the share of the feast. The leader laughed till his sides shook at a jest so congenial to the character of the company; but when another, less renowned, it would seem, for audacity in battle, ventured on using the same freedom, De la Marck instantly put a check to a jocular practice, which would soon have cleared his table of all the more valuable decorations.—'Ho! by the spirit of the thunder!' he exclaimed, 'those who dare not be men when they face the enemy, must not pretend to be thieves among their friends. What! thou frontless dastard thou—thou who didst wait for opened gate and lowered bridge, when Conrade Horst forced his way over moat and wall, must thou be malapert?—Knit him up to the stanchions of the hall-window!—He shall beat time with his feet, while we drink a cup to his safe passage to the devil.'

The doom was scarce sooner pronounced than accomplished; and in a moment the wretch wrestled out his last agonies, suspended from the iron bars. His body still hang there when Quentin and the others entered the hall, and, intercepting the pale moonbeam, threw on the Castle-floor an uncertain shadow, which, dubiously, yet fearfully, intimated the nature of the substance that produced it.

When the Syndic Pavillon was announced from mouth to mouth in this tumultuous meeting, he endeavoured to assume, in right of his authority and influence, an air of importance and equality, which a glance at the fearful object at the window, and at the wild scene around him, rendered it very difficult for him to sustain, notwithstanding the exhortations of Peter, who whispered in his ear, with some perturbation, 'Up heart, master, or we are but gone men!'

The Syndic maintained his dignity, however, as well as he could, in a short address, in which he complimented the company upon the great victory gained by the soldiers of De la Marck and the good citizens of Liege.

'Ay,' answered De la Marck, sarcastically, 'we have brought down the game at last, quoth my lady's brach to the wolf-hound. But ho! Sir Burgomaster, you come like Mars, with Beauty by your side. Who is this fair one?—Unveil, unveil—no woman calls her beauty her own to night.'

'It is my daughter, noble leader,' answered Pavillon; 'and I am to pray your forgiveness for her wearing a veil. She has a vow for that effect to the Three Blessed Kings.'

'I will absolve her of it presently,' said De la Marck; for here, with one stroke of a cleaver, will I consecrate myself Bishop of Liege; and I trust one living bishop is worth three dead kings.'

There was a shuddering among the guests; for the community of Liege, and even some of the rude soldiers, revered the Kings of Cologne, as they were commonly called, though they respected nothing else.

'Nay, I mean no treason against their defunct majesties,' said De la Marck; 'only bishop I am determined to be. A prince both secular and ecclesiastical, having power to bind and loose, will best suit a band of reprobates such as you, to whom no one else would give absolution.—But come hither, noble Burgomaster—sit beside me, when you shall see me make a vacancy for my own preferment.—Bring in our predecessor in the holy seat.'

A bustle took place in the hall, while Pavillon, ex-cusing himself from the proffered seat of honour, placed himself near the bottom of the table, his followers keeping close behind him, not unlike a flock of sheep which may be sometimes seen to assemble in the rear of an old bell-weather, who is, from office and authority, judged by them to have rather more courage than themselves. Near the spot sat a very handsome lad, a natural son, as was said, of the ferocious De la Marek, and concerning whom he sometimes shewed affection, and even tenderness. The mother of the boy, a beautiful concubine, had perished by a blow dealt her by the forcious leader in a fit of drunkenness or jealousy; and her fate had caused her tyrant as much remorse as he was capable of feeling. His attachment to the surviving orphan might be partly owing to these circumstances. Quentin, who had learned this point of the leader's character from the old priest, planted himself as close as he could to the youth in question; determined to make, in some way or other, either a hostage or a protector, should other means of safety fail them.

.....The Bishop of Liège, Louis of Bourbon, was dragged into the hall of his own palace by the brutal soldiery. The dishevelled state of his hair, beard, and attire, bore witness to the ill-treatment he had already received; and some of his sacerdotal robes hastily flung over him, appeared to have been put on in scorn and ridicule of his quality and character. By good fortune, as Quentin was compelled to think it, the Countess Isabelle, whose feelings at seeing her protector in such an extremity might have betrayed her own secret and compromised her safety, was so situated as neither to hear nor see what was about to take place; and Durward sedulously interposed his own person before her, so as to keep her from observing alike, and from observation.

The scene which followed was short and fearful. When the unhappy Prelate was brought before the footstool of the savage leader, although in former life only remarkable for his easy and good-natured temper, he shewed in this extremity a sense of his dignity and noble blood, well becoming the high race from which he was descended. His look was composed and undimmed: his gesture, when the rude hands which dragged him forward were unloosed, was noble, and at the same time resigned, somewhat between the bearing of a feudal noble and of a Christian martyr; and so much was even De la Marck himself staggered by the firm demeanour of his prisoner, and recollection of the early benefits he had received from him, that he seemed irresolute, cast down his eyes, and it was not until he had emptied a large goblet of wine, that, resuming his haughty insolence of look and manner, he thus addressed his unfortunate captive:—'Louis of Bourbon,' said the truculent soldier, drawing hard his breath, setting his teeth, and using the other mechanical actions to rouse up and sustain his native ferocity of temper—'I sought your friendship, and you rejected mine. What would you now give that it had been otherwise?—Nikkel, be ready.'

The butcher rose, seized his weapon, and stealing round behind De la Marck's chair, stood with it uplifted in his bare and sinewy arm.

'Look at that man, Louis of Bourbon,' said De la Marck again—'What terms wilt thou now offer, to escape this dangerous hour?'

The Bishop cast a melancholy but undaunted look upon the grisly satellite, who seemed prepared to execute the will of the tyrant, and then he said with firmness, 'Hear me, William De la Marck; and good men all, if there be any here who deserve that name, hear the only terms I can offer to this ruffian.—William de la Marck, thou hast stirred up to sedition an imperial city—hast assaulted and taken the palace of a Prince of the Holy German Empire—slain his people—plundered his goods—maltreated his person—for this thou art liable to the Ban of the Empire—hast deserved to be declared outlawed and fugitive, landless and rightless. Thou hast done more than all this. More than mere human laws hast thou broken—more than mere human vengeance hast thou deserved. Thou hast broken into the sanctuary of the Lord—laid violent hands upon a Father of the Church—defiled the house of God with blood and rapine, like a sacrilegious robber—'

'Hast thou yet done?' said De la Marck, fiercely interrupting him, and stamping his foot.

'No,' answered the Prelate, 'for I have not yet told thee the terms which you demanded to hear from me.'

'Go on,' said De la Marck; 'and let the terms please me better than the preface, or woe to thy grey head!' And flinging himself back in his seat, he grinded his teeth, till the foam flew from his lips, as from the tusks of the savage animals whose name and spoils he wore.

'Such are thy crimes,' resumed the Bishop, with calm determination; 'now hear the terms, which, as a merciful Prince and a Christian Prelate, setting aside all personal offence, forgiving each peculiar injury, I condescend to offer. Fling down thy leading-staff—renounce thy command—unbind thy prisoners—restore thy spoil—distribute what else thou hast of goods, to relieve those whom thou hast made orphans and widows—array thyself in sackcloth and ashes—take a palmer's staff in thy hand, and go on pilgrimage to Rome, and we will ourselves be intercessors for thee with the Imperial Chamber at Ratisbon for thy life, with our Holy Father the Pope for thy miserable end.'

While Louis of Bourbon proposed these terms, in a tone as decided as if he still occupied his episcopal throne, and as if the usurper kneeled a suppliant at his feet, the tyrant slowly raised himself in his chair; the amazement with which he was at first filled giving way gradually to rage, until, as the Bishop ceased, he looked to Nikkel Blok, and raised his finger, without speaking a word. The ruffian struck, as if he had been doing his office in the common shambles, and the murdered Bishop sank, without a groan, at the foot of his own episcopal throne. The Liegeois, who were not prepared for so horrible a catastrophe, and who had expected to hear the conference end in some terms of accommodation, started up unanimously with cries of execration, mingled with shouts of vengeance.

A parley ensues, and our hero's party are extricated, with the close of volume II. Before proceeding to the third, we may observe, that the beautiful style and masterly touches of the author are so conspicuous in this volume as to render the story a secondary consideration. These are the true signs of the genius which causes the works of the author of Waverley to be so universally prized; and yet they are such as do not admit of our particularizing them.

Flying from Liege, Quentin and Isabelle are taken prisoners by Crevecoeur, who is on an incursion into Brabant. The lady is left at Charleroi, and her knight carried prisoner to Peronne, where, at the court of Charles the Bold, he most unexpectedly finds Louis XI. a voluntary visitor. Here matters had gone on as smoothly as could be expected between the politic King and his audacious vassal; but the news of the murder of the Bishop of Liege throws all into flame. This act of his quondam friends is imputed to Louis, and his headstrong rival imprisons his guest—they are at an entertainment when the tidings arrive. Louis is sent to a gothic keep, where Charles the Simple was "done to death," and in his agony here puts up a curious prayer.

A reconciliation between Louis and Charles is ultimately brought about; and many incidental adventures vary these pages. The Bohemian comes as a Herald from the Wild Boar, and is first hunted, then hanged; confiding the secret of his employer's plans to Quentin, which in the end enable him to win the heiress of Croye. Liege is taken by the French and Burgundians in concert; and William de la Marck slain, in a desperate sally, by Balafre, after being wounded almost to death by our hero. His reward for the head of the boar is the hand of Isabelle, for which all the chivalry contended; and among others, Le Glorieux, the Duke of Burgundy's jester, who figures pleasantly enough in this history—

'No one thinks of me,' said Le Glorieux, 'who am sure to carry off the prize from all of you.'

'Right, my sapient friend,' said Louis; 'when a woman is in the case, the greatest fool is ever the first in favour.'

Of course the author had a right to give the triumph to whom he pleased; but we confess we should have liked it better if Quentin had won it solely, than as a participator of his uncle's victory. The latter owes this laurel to the author's affection for the superstitious and preternatural; for it seems only to fulfil an old prophecy, that he robs his hero of so much honour. On the whole, however, for character and the general development of human nature; for dramatic involution, for description, and for the finer touches of a shrewd and acute spirit, the tale of Quentin Durward, on a foreign soil, appears to us equal almost the happiest efforts of the author on his native soil.

THE CLUB.

No. XXXIII.—FRIDAY, MAY 16, 1823.

"The love of praise, how'er concealed by art,
Reigns, more or less, and glows in ev'ry heart:
The proud, to gain it, toils on toils endure;
The modest shun it, but to make it sure.
O'er globes and sceptres, now on thrones it swells,
Now tries the midnight lamp in college cells:
It aids the dancer's heel, the writer's head;
And heaps the plain with mountains of the dead;
Nor ends with life, but nods in sable plumes,
Adorns our hearse, and flatters on our tombs."

YOUNG.

To the Members of the Club at the Green Dragon.

GENTLEMEN,—I have long been a regular reader of your papers, which I always peruse with interest, and often with pleasure. I shall not praise your lucubrations as much as I think they deserve, lest I should either give pain to persons of your modesty, or raise an unfounded suspicion of my own sincerity.

I write this letter to give you advice, and to offer you assistance.—In the first place I think you often take a wrong view of persons and things; inasmuch as you have occasionally opposed your sentiments to popular opinion. What a just clamour, for example, was raised against you for questioning the talent of a young author of much popularity; and how ready were you, on the contrary, to praise another person, who, if I mistake not, is placed in very different circumstances. You have been suspected, too, of satirizing very worthy females in some of your descriptions, and of paying unmerited compliments to others.

Now, gentlemen, it appears to me, that in this proceeding you are neglecting your own interest. If you will let me advise you, you will lay it down as a maxim, to be invariably followed, never to hold an unpopular opinion; but, on all occasions, to praise what the world praises, and believe that every man is precisely what he describes himself to be, or what his friends say of him; in which prudent course you have an excellent example in my sagacious friend Mr. Butterworth, who, in his very amusing work on the history of Manchester, very naturally concludes that — and other similar personages, are really men of extraordinary skill and attainments, because he sees them so represented in their own advertisements. You will always find people civil when you applaud them, and angry when you venture to scrutinize their claims to praise.

Let me, therefore, gentlemen of the Green Dragon, persuade you not only to be cautious, but to be wise; that is to say, not only to abstain from censure, because no one likes it; but to be liberal of your praise, for that will always please somebody, if it only please those on whom it is bestowed.

The second object which I had in writing this letter, was, as I before stated, to offer you occasional assistance in the carrying on of your publication. You must however, expect, if you accede to my proposal, that I shall frequently controvert your opinions; for though I think highly of your talents, I think still more of my own circumspection: and, therefore, I am determined, for the reasons which I have just assigned, to support every man who happens to be admired, and to praise every thing that happens to be in fashion.

Allow me also to add, that it will afford me high gratification to have my name associated with that of Mr. Medium, whose abilities, displayed in his eloquent reports of the proceedings at the Green Dragon, have been too long and too generally admired, not to excite feelings of genuine esteem in the breast of, Gentlemen,
Your faithful and obedient Servant,
ANTHONY PRUDENT.

The letter of Mr. Anthony Prudent was duly forwarded to us by Mr. Smith, and read by the Secretary at the last meeting.

The delicacy which the writer shewed in respect to our feelings at the commencement of his letter, seemed to have been forgotten when he arrived at its conclusion. We found ourselves considerably relieved, however, from the weight of our Correspondents' praise, by the explanations which he gave us on the subject. We may here allude to a point in which we are obliged to differ from our worthy adviser. Almost every thing in the present world seems to depend upon contrast; we enjoy prosperity because we can compare the superior advantages of the present situation with the inferiority of some former. Of this principle every reader can furnish himself with abundant illustrations. Praise is greatly enhanced when it comes from the persons who occasionally censure.

We cannot, therefore, concur with our kind adviser in thinking that we mistake our own interest because we do not merely scatter unmeasured applause.

We should be very sorry if there were any just grounds for the supposition, that in our references to the ladies, we directed any expression of disapprobation to particular individuals. No set of persons entertain more respectful sentiments with regard to the ladies than the Members of the Club at the Green Dragon. Of all the expressions of praise which we have at different times heard applied to our essays, we have been most highly flattered by those which have fallen from some of our fair readers. If, with the best intentions, we sometimes allude to their foibles, we hope we make atonement by our admiration of their many excellencies.

The letter of our correspondent does not appear to us to require any further commentary.

We shall have much pleasure in receiving the proffered assistance of Mr. Prudent, of whose abilities his letter has impressed us with a favourable opinion. The President, who is one of the most acute critics in the meeting, paid much attention to the above letter. We mention his closing remark for the information of our correspondent. "I think the author of this letter would write a good style were he under my care for a short time. But the amazing length of some of his sentences places us in the same predicament as his letter placed him, that of forgetting at the end what was said at the beginning."

THE CABINET.

The following Poem or "Sonnet to Fancy," was written about 30 years ago, by a boy, a native of, and then residing at, York, when only 14 years of age; and though one of the most beautiful in our language, it has rarely met the eye of the public, and has escaped the notice, as far as I have observed, of the Editor of every collection of English Poetry. The writer's name was Edmond Gill, an apprentice to a shoemaker, a youth of great promise, and particularly noticed by that amiable writer, the Rev. Wm. Mason, author of the "English Garden." About the same period the European Magazine received from the pen of Gill a continued series of beautiful Sonnets.

TO FANCY.

My scenes are uncommon and wild,
No words can express what I paint;
I skim the bright meadows, so mild,
And I raise the sweet flow'rets that faint.
When Phillis reclines in the grove,
Carnations their blossoms unfold;
I hasten to fetch her true love,
And I tinge every grove with gold.
I fall with the foaming cascades,
I fly with the breezes that blow,
I rest in the green laurel'd bower,
Or I sink in the mansions below.
To thousands of shores I am driven,
To find meadows where no one has trod;
I pierce the fair regions of heaven,
And climb the bright throne of my God.

LETTER FROM AN IRISH BARONET, A. D. 1798.

My dear Sir,—Enjoying now a little peace and quietness, I sit down to inform you of the dreadful bustle and confusion we are in from those blood thirsty rebels, most of whom are, thank God, either killed or dispersed. We are in a pretty mess, can get nothing to eat, nor any wine to drink, except whiskey. When we sit down to dinner, we are obliged to keep both hands armed; and whilst I write this letter, I hold a sword in one hand, and a pistol in the other. I concluded from the beginning this wd be the end of it, and I see I was right, for it is not half over yet, at present there are such goings on that every thing is at a stand. I should have answered your letter a fortnight ago, but I only rec'd it this morning. Indeed, hardly a mail arrives safe without being robbed. No longer ago than yesterday the coach with the mail from Dublin was robbed near this town, the bags had been judiciously left behind for fear of accidents, and by good luck there was nobody in the coach but two outside passengers, and they had nothing for the thieves to take. Last Thursday notice was given that a gang of rebels were advancing under French standard, but they had no Colors, nor any drums except bagpipes.—Immediately every man in the place, including women and boys, ran out to meet them. We soon found our force much too little, and they were far too many for us to think of retreating. Death was in every face, but to it we went, and by the time half our little party was killed we began to be all alive. Fortunately the rebels had no guns, but pistols, cutlasses, and pikes; and as we had plenty of muskets and ammunition, we put them all to the sword—not a soul of them all escaped, except some that were drowned in an adjoining bog. Their uniforms were all different colors, but mostly green. After the action we went to rummage a sort of camp they had left behind them. All we found was a few pikes without heads, and a parcel of empty bottles full of water, and a number of blank French commissions filled up with fishermen's names. Troops are now placed every where round the country, which exactly squares with my ideas. I have only time to add that I am, in haste,
Yours truly,

P. S. If you do not receive this in course, it must have miscarried; therefore I beg you will write immediately to let me know.

FALCON.—There was lately found on the estate of Ingleson, the property of John Heron, Esq. in the parish of Kelton, Scotland, a falcon, with two brass bells attached to its neck, and a silver ring to each foot, with the inscription "— Sinclair, Esq. Belfast." It was discovered dead near the rookery, having fallen, as is supposed, a sacrifice to the resentment of the crows, as it had been seen a short time before engaged with a number of the dark feathered tribe, on one of which it made a truly falcon-like descent, and its antagonist instantaneously dropt down dead. It measured over the wing, when extended, three feet and a half, was of a bluish colour on the back, and of a bluish gray on the belly.

FIGHTING REMINISCENCES.

(BY A LOVER OF THE FINE ARTS.)

If fighting is not one of the Fine Arts, it is as good a thing—as deservedly dear to all lovers of real refinement in manners and real purity in morals—as essential to the march of national prosperity, and as ornamental to the fabric of national greatness; and that its progress runs in a parallel line with all these,—stopping when they stop, and turning aside or retrograding when they do so,—will not for a moment be doubted by those who have duly considered its nature, origin, tendency, and effects!

I shall, in the preliminary remarks that I have to make on the immediate subject of this paper, content myself with using assertions merely,—leaving the proofs of such assertions to suggest themselves (as they naturally and necessarily must) to all my readers. And I desire it may be expressly understood, that I adopt this course purely out of respect to the judgment and knowledge of the said readers:—for it will immediately occur to every one, how greatly I should facilitate my task (of writing an article), if I were to make an assertion of one line, and follow it by an argumentation of fifty. But I greatly suspect that this plan would not lead to either the amusement or the emolument of any one but myself. I shall, therefore, without further preface, take it for granted, that others are as capable of appreciating the truth of things as I am, and shall proceed to lay that truth before them accordingly—no better dressed than in its own bare simplicity and beauty.

Perhaps I should add, before I throw myself for good into the arms of my subject, that I am qualified to treat of Fighting simply as a spectator. I love it from what I see of it, not from what I feel. I admire it at a distance—as I do the stars. I am a mere reader of it, as I am of poetry; not a creator: for if I do now and then put on the gloves, and was once reckoned a pretty hand at a rally, it was merely in the character of a sparrer—whom I take to stand in the same relation to a fighter, that a mere versifier does to a poet.

There is one other point, too, in which I venture to differ from all other lovers of fighting. I would divorce this noble art from that hideous and incomprehensible jargon, or slang, which has, of late years, been introduced into its language, as if for the express purpose of mystifying, rather than ornamenting or illuminating. Why should the expressions which appertain to fighting be so round-about and metaphorical, when the thing itself is so very plain and straight-forward? Why should the words, which describe a blow and its effects, be so very recondite and far-fetched as to be scarcely cognizable even to the learned, when the blow itself is intelligible to the meanest capacity? In fact, in humble imitation of Mr. Wordsworth in the matter of written poetry, I would instantly banish from the acted poetry of fighting all modes of expression that do not strictly belong to the language of common life. We happily possess “a well of English undefiled,” that is deep and clear enough to supply all the wants even of the historians of “Sporting Intelligence,” however “extraordinary;” and should scorn to see an English fight described in any other than plain English.

I would not be thought importunate on this point; and yet, as it is one nearest my heart, I must be allowed to press it a little farther. Is an English fighter, who can feel his blood flow from him in the field unmoved, afraid to see it in print—that it must be called “Claret?” Is his head no better than that of a knave of spades—that it is to be denominated his nub? Shall the seat of his “wind” (the very breath of his fighting existence) be demeaned into a mere receptacle for kitchen-stuff, and called his “bread-basket?” Shall getting an adversary’s head under your arm, and giving him digs in the mouth till you can’t hold him up any longer (which I take to be as unequivocal and truth-telling a proceeding as need be)—be styled “fibbing?” Does a man’s starting up on his legs like a hero, half a minute after you’ve knocked him down like an ox, deserve no better description than the scurvy one of “coming to the scratch?” Is it sufferable, that being hit off one’s legs upon the beautiful green turf, “with his face to the sky, and his feet to the foe,” should be designated by the ignoble phrase of “flooring?” Above all, shall getting a sound beating, so that a man’s own mother wouldn’t know him (which is the delight and glory of a real good ‘un),—be transgressed into the lying phrase of being “well punished,”—as if we were speaking of a naughty school-boy?

That jugglers and pickpockets should seek the “darkness” of a disguised language, is natural enough—because “their deeds are evil;” but that honest English fighters should wish to express themselves in any other than honest English words,—that men whose deeds are as plain as their faces, and who have nothing close about them but their fists, should wish their actions to be recorded in a hidden language,—in short, that sons, who have such signal reason not to be ashamed of their mothers, should be ashamed of their mother tongue—is no less unaccountable than it is lamentable. But, perhaps, this is one of those evils which only require pointing out to be remedied; and accordingly, I do not despair of seeing spring up a “Lake School” of fighters, who shall utterly discard that pedantic jargon, which is the only fault of the present race, and insist on their deeds being recorded as openly and intelligibly as they are acted;—or (still better) who shall take to recording them themselves, and not suffer them to pass through the transmogrifying pen of paid writers, who have no doubt invented this method for the purpose of keeping the most lucrative part of the profession in their own hands. I should be glad to know who is so capable of describing the effects of a blow, as the man who feels them? Or who so worthy of reaping the profits and the honours of such description? It is a lamentable thing to think of, that the only man who has made a fortune by fights, is one who never fought a battle in his life. I should be sorry to impugn the merits, or interfere with the interests, of the illustrious author of Boxiana, “so far from it, quite the reverse,” as Witty Will, the Fulham coachman said, when they asked him if he was related to the man that had just been hanged; but I do hope that, for the future, fighters will seriously think of turning writers too, and thus embrace the enviable opportunity of “fighting their battles o’er again.”

Perhaps, fighting is, to those who do not immediately partake in it, one of the highest among “the Pleasures of Imagination;” and to those who do, it is, no doubt, a rich union of “the Pleasures of Hope” and “the Pleasures of Memory.”—Who, then, shall deny, that it is the most poetical of pursuits? It is, therefore, with particular satisfaction that I direct the attention of the reader to this subject, at this time; because an unlucky cloud has lately passed across the hemisphere of the art, and has left behind it an unsightly streak, which at present a little dims its purity, and shades its lustre. But the Gas (to whose misdeeds I allude) is extinguished, never to burn again. And if his memory is destined to “stink in the nostrils of posterity,” let us at least turn it to good account, by regarding it as a warning to the wavering virtue of others. “De mortis nil nisi verum,” is a maxim that I discontinue altogether.—I would, in fact, substitute in its place one that is too often the direct opposite of it; “De mortis nil nisi verum.” Of whom shall we speak the truth, if not of the dead—supposing that truth to be injurious to their name?—of the living (especially behind their backs), it is an excellent general rule to speak nothing but the good we know. This practice at once proves good nature, and promotes good-fellowship; and those who conscientiously adopt it, may safely indulge themselves in that natural propensity of our kind, which we possess in common with no other animal. Mam (I do not, of course, include woman!) is by nature a back-biting animal; and, in the name of truth, let him enjoy this proud distinction in peace, provided he exercise it only towards those whom it cannot harm.—Gas, then, (I am determined, now that he is dead, to make a scape-goat of him, for he was a black-sheep while he lived)—Gas was a memorable example of the instability of human resolution, and the flexibility of human virtue. Like the next greatest among modern heroes (I mean Buonsaparte), he began well, I dare say; but like him also, he lived to be a tyrant and a boaster, and died as such heroes should die—namely, not in the field of battle.—“This is the hand” (he used to exclaim at the Fives Court).—“This is the hand,” (doubling his deadly dexter), “that shall dig the graves of a few more of ‘em, before I’ve done!” This was not long before his own grave was dug for him.—The stage-coachman by whose side I went down to see his last grand battle, told me what he had heard him say to a brother whip on that road the day before. “Well, Tom, shall you beat him?”—“Beat him!” he replied, with a sneer of ineffable contempt.—“Look here”—pulling a twenty pound note out of his breeches pocket—“if you’re a mind to cover that, I’ll lay I beat him and you too, within a quarter of an hour!”

Never shall I forget that memorable day! Next to Wordsworth’s, it was the most interesting and instructive “excursion” I ever made. And the events of it live in my memory even more vividly than those of the other poem do, because, in reading the one, I always make a point of forgetting as soon as I have read, in order that I may be able to recur to the theme again in all its first freshness; whereas, knowing that I should enjoy the other a second time only through the medium of memory, I took care to impress it there as deeply as the materials would permit. The poetry that I read I suffer to impress itself only on the sands of my memory—but the poetry that I see, I engrave on the rocks.

Perhaps the reader may not object to see a few of these lithographic etchings, relating to the above occasion—especially as the subject of them has quitted the scene of life, and can stand up for a model no more.

I had not shackled myself with any engagements about the manner, &c. of going down, lest the arrangements of others might put me out; and I had not made a single bet on the event, lest my interest might interfere to warp the impartiality of my judgment. Indeed I may here remark, that I discontinue the practice of betting on such occasions, altogether; and hold that no real lover of the art ever indulges in them. Those who love the thing with a due and becoming love, “love it for itself alone,” and would no more bet as a pitched battle, than they would on a game of chess. I started, therefore, a thoroughly free agent, both in body and mind—my actions unshocked by the will of friends, and even my wishes unbent by the influence of bets.—At five o’clock, then, in a December evening, behold me seated on the box of the Bath Heavy, enveloped in an impenetrable covering of coats and capes, and prepared to brave the worst weather that winter could pour upon me. I remember that, for want of something better to do, I counted, as we went along, the coverings that intervened between my person and the piercing night air, and that they amounted to fifteen. Under such circumstances, what were the rains and the winds to me!—Accordingly, I hid them a “hiltie defiance,” which they seemed very readily to accept—for I now, by an effort of memory, can just recollect that it blew a storm, and rained torrents nearly the whole night long, till four o’clock in the morning; at which time I, and a young Castab who sat on the roof, and who had come up from college that morning on the same errand, descended in the dark before the door of a large inn at Hungerford, and in a moment heard the wheels rattle away from us, and leave us to the mercy of the open street.

FUNERAL ORATION OF A FEMALE IROQUOIS
OVER HER DECEASED CHILD.

From Mons. De Chateaubriand.

Hadst thou but lived, my lovely boy,
What strength of arm were thine;
How graceful wouldst thou bend thy bow,
What skill and force combine.
The bear upon the mountain top
Wouldst in his fury seize
The elk so swift, thy swifter foot
Would overtake with ease.
White ermine of the rock! so soon
To seek the land of souls,
Ah what a boundless sea is that
Which now between us rolls.
How wilt thou live without thy sire,
Thee with his game to feed,
No kindly spirit to procure
Thee skins, when thou shalt need—
Thou wilt be cold—O, I must come
And warm thee in my breast
And give thee milk, and sing thee songs,
And lull my babe to rest.

ON PEEVISHNESS OR ILL-HUMOUR.

No disease of the mind can more fatally disabie it from practising that intercourse of benevolence, which is one of the chief duties of social beings, than ill-humour or peevishness: for, though it break not out in paroxysms of outrage, nor bursts of clamour, yet it supplies the deficiency of violence by its frequency, and wears out happiness by slow corrosion, and small injuries, incessantly repeated. It may be considered as the canker of life, that destroys its vigour, and checks its improvement, that creeps on with hourly depredations, and taints and vitiates what it cannot consume.

Peevishness, when it has been so far indulged as to out-run the motions of the will, and discovers itself without premeditation, is a species of depravity in the highest degree offensive and disgusting, because no caution or regularity, no rectitude of intention, nor softness of address can insure a moment's exemption from affront and indignity. Whilst we are courting the favour of a peevish man, and are making the warmest offers of service, or exerting ourselves in the most diligent civility, an unlucky syllable displeases, an unheeded circumstance ruffles and exasperates; and, in the moment when we flatter ourselves that we have gained a friend, we have the mortification of finding all our endeavours frustrated, and all our assiduity forgotten, in the casual tumult of some trifling irritation.

This troublesome impatience is sometimes nothing more than the symptom of some deeper malady. He that is angry without daring to confess his resentment, or sorrowful without the liberty of telling his grief, is too frequently inclined to give vent to the fermentations of his mind at the first passages that are opened, and to let his passions boil over upon those whom accident has thrown in his way. A painful and tedious course of sickness often produces such a quick sensibility, such an alarming apprehension of any increase of uneasiness, as keeps the mind perpetually on the watch to prevent or repel any thing from which inconvenience may be felt; such a restless and incessant solicitude, as no care, no tenderness can appease; and can only be pacified by the cure of the distemper, and the removal of the pain by which it is excited.

Nearly approaching to this weakness is the captiousness of old age: when the strength is diminished, the senses impaired, and the common pleasures of life are become insipid, we are apt to impute the uneasiness of our condition to causes not wholly out of our power, and fancy that we suffer from neglect, unkindness or want of skill, or any evil which admits of remedy, rather than by the decays of nature, which can neither be prevented, nor repaired. We therefore revenge our pains on those upon whom we resolve to charge them; and too often drive our friends away, when we have the greatest need of their kindness and assistance.

But though peevishness may sometimes claim our compassion, as the consequence or concomitant of misery, it is very often found where nothing can justify or excuse its admission. It is frequently one of the attendants upon prosperity, employed by insolence in exacting homage, and by tyranny in harassing subjection. In these cases it is the offspring of pride and idleness: of idleness, anxious about trifles; and pride, unwilling to endure the least obstruction of her wishes. Those who have lived in solitude, indeed, whatever their condition may be, naturally contract this unsocial quality; because, having long had only themselves to please, they do not readily depart from their usual inclinations; their singularities, therefore, are only blameable, when they have imprudently or morosely withdrawn themselves from the world: but there are others, who have, without any necessity, nursed up this habit in their minds, by making implicit submission, the condition of their favour, and suffering none to approach them, but those who watch their eyes, and observe the motions of their heads; who never speak but to applaud, or act but to obey.

He that gives himself up to his own fancy, and converses with none but such as he hires to soothe him with obsequiousness, and regale him with flattery, soon grows too slothful for the labour of contest, too tender for the asperity of contradiction, and too delicate for the energy of truth. A little opposition offends, a little restraint enrages, and a little difficulty perplexes him: for a man who has been accustomed to see every thing give way to his humour and caprice, soon forgets his own littleness, and expects to find the world rolling at his beck, and all mankind employed to accommodate and delight him.

In the worst of cases, the solid comforts of religion will at all times alleviate, if not cure, those obliquities of temper which arise from impatience under affliction; and will induce us calmly to submit to the dispensations of providence, and fully realize the words of our admired Poet:—

"Sweet peace she brings wherever she arrives,
She builds our quiet as she forms our lives;
Lays the rough paths of peevish nature even,
And opens in each breast a little heaven."

BARYTHYMIA;*

A POEM.—BY N. N.

Addressed to all the Sons and Daughters of Adversity.

"When my spirit was in heaviness, Thou knewest my path."
PSALM 143, v. 2.

"The innocent may grieve; but it is guilt alone that can render us truly miserable."
AXON.

For him whose brows with Cypress wreaths are bound,
Who weeping seeks some lone funeral mound;—
For him whose heart with secret anguish bleeds,
On whose pale cheek the worm of sorrow feeds;—
For all who find, as darkling on they go,
This world a weary wilderness of woe;
Thy soothing strain begin, my pensive Muse;
Though critic Taste her cold applause refuse,
Still, if it wipe one tear of grief away,
Pity shall bless, and Heaven approve the lay.

The calmest brows o'erclouded oft appear,
The brightest eyes are dimm'd with many a tear!
Let others tell of joyous days and nights
Sped on the wings of ever-new delights;
Of happy swains who tend their flocks, and sing,
Sip nectared sweets, and find no latent sting,
Pluck the fresh rose, yet still avoid the thorn,
And laugh the miseries of life to scorn.

* The title of this Poem is derived from two well-known Greek words, meaning, simply, anxiety or heaviness of spirit; a feeling under which the writer was himself labouring when he composed the Poem. "You must not," observed the Author of Barythymia, in a letter to a friend, "look for much novelty in the sentiments, much elegance in the language, or many flowers of poetry in the versification. But it does cost me, I trust, some good moral sentiments, and some points of divinity which it becomes every man, and particularly a gowman, to be well acquainted with.—It was written with a view of consoling the afflicted, rather than amusing the indifferent; and as it will be my future study to profit as a swifter more than to please as a poet, it has perhaps more the nature of a didactic discourse than a song."

"The Poem of Barythymia," said a living Author, a native of Ayrshire—"evinces pure taste, and good feeling; and there is one couplet in it which I never can forget; namely,

The world's Redeemer lonely vigils kept,
Himself a man of sorrows,—Jesus wept."

Believe it not,—what many a bosom feels,
No tear, no sigh,—no sorrowing look reveals;
For who can shun the curse of ancient date,—
The thorns and thistles of our lost estate!
Let cold Self-love, unmoved by others' pain,
The feeling heart's soft sympathy disdain;
Let the gay through their round of mirth pursue,
And, if they can, still keep delight in view;
But who shall bless through life his happy lot,
And say to sorrow, "hence! I know thee not."

Nor is it always Heaven's avenging frown
That breaks the heart and weighs the spirit down;—
The good, the wise, the innocent, the just,
Have hid their sorrowing faces in the dust.
The upright man of Us bewailed his birth,
And longed to lay him in the peaceful earth;—
The world's Redeemer lonely Vigils kept,
Himself "a man of sorrows,"—"Jesus wept."
Child of afflictions, then, whose'er thou art,
With Christian hope sustain thy drooping heart;—
Drink with strong fortitude thy cup of gall,
And know, thy lot is but the lot of all.
Awhile, perhaps, will Sorrow claim her due,
Awhile each rising dawn thy tears renew;
But human joys and griefs, what are they? say;—
The clouds and sunshine of an April day.
Soon, of themselves, thy tears shall cease to flow,
And calm regret succeed the storm of woe;
Till, soothed by Friendship, or by Love caressed,
Thy lightened heart shall bound within thy breast.

But who is he, with sad expressive mien,
Who loves to roam, by mortal glance unseen,—
Now hurries on, with wild and headlong pace;
Now stops abrupt, with woe-dejected face?
'Tis he,—I know him by his swimming eye,
And bosom heaved with many a stifled sigh;
Poor Child of feeling! how shall I disclose
The secret sources of thy various woes?
Perchance some loved companion bids adieu;
Some friend proves faithless, or some trust untrue;
Some cruel jealousy disturbs thy rest;
Or hope protracted sickens in thy breast.
Perhaps some waking dream thy fancy fired;
Some scheme of bliss thy secret soul inspired;—
For this each other aim was thrown aside,—
For this each nerve was strained, each effort tried;
But when the plan, to thine enraptured thought,
Seemed near, at length, to full perfection wrought,
Some latent cause has dealt a fatal blow,
And Hope's fair fabric in the dust laid low!
The dream is past;—thy faded joys depart,
And leave substantial sorrow on thy heart.
Nor heaves thy breast with Misery's throbs alone,
Joys, too, are thine, to vulgar souls unknown;
Thine are the transports of the speaking eye,
When language fails thee, and thy heart beats high;
Thine are the raptures of a Poet's mind,
Which soaring leaves each earthly care behind;—
The Muse shall bear thy sadly proffer'd vows,
And smiling, weave a chaplet for thy brows.

YOUNG AND KEMBLE.

The likeness of Young is admirable—not in the least flattering, but severely like. There is a sort of Quixotic look about the character of the head, which is very observable in Young's Hamlet, where the nearly unaroused cheek rises from the suit of sable. He chose rightly (if it was his choice) to be painted in Hamlet—it is by far his best part. Young totally wants passion,—has good sense and taste, and is an excellent declaimer;—hence the contemplative, moping, moralizing Prince is exactly suited to his powers. His coldness—his mannerism—are here little felt;—his gentlemanly deportment—his scholar-like enunciation—his classical taste,—are all of infinite service. Young never offends—generally pleases—but scarcely ever gives rise to strong emotion or vehement applause. He is less praised and less abused than any other actor.

He has no splendid excellencies, and no glaring faults. He has a calm, equable, and ample popularity,—but excites very little exclusive, and no ardent, admiration.

Charles Kemble, in a splendid suit of brass armour, as Faulconbridge. I believe this is an anachronism, by the bye—but, no matter for that;—it is not a striking one, and the habit well becomes his magnificent figure. "Sir Robert never help to make this leg!"—Who can doubt that assertion, when he 'suits the action' to the word, and slaps his stalwart limb in triumph? Most actors appropriate some favourite part, but perhaps it was never done so completely as in Charles Kemble's Faulconbridge. It is, in truth, one of the most admirable and perfect pieces of acting ever exhibited on the stage.—Gay, brilliant, undauntedly bold—with a spice of the bluster and the bully, redeemed by true courage, and good feeling—he is the exact embodying of the Shakspearian idea—and what more can be said for any acting? There is (par parenthèse) one part of this character which has always revolted me, and made me angry with Shakspeare, and Charles Kemble, for interesting me about him afterwards—I mean his conduct towards his mother. Though Sir Robert Faulconbridge was not his father, he ought never to have forgotten that Lady Faulconbridge was his mother.—To return. If I were desired to characterize Charles Kemble's comic acting by one word, I should cite its brilliance. His Charles Surface—his Lovemore—his Benedick (what a piece of acting is there!)—his Don John—are all exemplifications to the very fullest of those most difficult of all qualities, buoyancy and effervescence of spirits, without over-acting—brilliance, without the least tinsel. Don John was one of Garrick's favourite parts, but I can scarcely think it could have been superior in his hands to the way in which I have seen it played by Charles Kemble. It is a most admirable comedy, full of the raciness of the old writers, and brimmed with life and action throughout. The cutting it into an opera in some degree broke and impeded its continuous rapidity—but then it gave us Miss Stephens—and as an actress also—a delightful actress!—There was, I believe, a spark of emulation alive at that moment—at all events, she played Violetta with a vivacity and archness which would have been worthy of its old representative.* The scene between her and Don John was one of the most fascinating comic exhibitions I ever witnessed.

Charles Kemble's Cassio is also a remarkable performance;—he is the only man I ever saw, who can act a drunken gentleman. It is not a character (I thank heaven) often introduced upon the stage; but it is most difficult in representation—in Cassio, especially, where the gradations of getting drunk take place before the audience. Nothing can be finer than the manner in which they are given, unless it be the endeavouring to assume self-guidance, on the appearance of his General—and the sobering occasioned by the shock of his final sentence.

In tragedy, Jaffier and Romeo are his finest parts, (his Hamlet I have never seen,) but his Stranger—his Antony—his Biron—and many others, are excellent. Grief is the passion which he delineates the best, and in that no one excels him;—he is also, certainly, the best lover at present on the stage, to which perhaps his personal beauty in a great degree conduces—and these qualities it is which gives such power and truth to the characters I have named above. He has been accused of degrading Jaffier too much—of making him too mean, too despicable.—I think this impossible:—the man who is alternately a traitor to both parties, half a dozen times over—who is swayed to treble and four-fold treachery by the voice of the last speaker, whether it be in the indignant voice of his friend, or the tears and blandishments of his wife,—cannot be pictured as more contemptible than he really is. In Romeo, the youthfulness and spirit of the lover in the early part of the play, are finely contrasted with the saddened and broken hearted man towards the close. Both the forgetfulness and the sudden remembrance (perhaps especially the latter, as being the more difficult) of his own impending death, on the recovery of Juliet, are perfect touches;—but there is one which has always struck me as peculiarly happy, which I have never seen noticed by the critics.—I mean, when the death of Mercutio has urged him to madness against Tybalt.—He does not attack him like a fencer—he does not stop to put himself into attitudes like a posture-master,—but dashes his sword with fury from his hand, and runs him two or three times through the body, almost before he knows what he is about.

In addition to these two lines of acting, Charles Kemble lately played a part in a style hitherto unattempted by him;—I allude to Friar Tuck, in an opera founded on the pretty Robin Hood story of "Maid Marian."—This effort has made many of opinion, and I incline to it myself, that he is the knight who might achieve the so long unperformed adventure of playing Falstaff!—It is a most hazardous piece of business, certainly—but the glory of success would be proportionate.—Album.

VARIETIES.

THE DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH.—The Duke of Marlborough being indisposed, was pressed by the Duchess to take some medicine; who, with her usual warmth, added, "I'll be banged if it do not prove serviceable." Dr. Garth being present, said, "Do take it then, my Lord, for it must be of service one way or other."

WANSTEAD HOUSE.—Wanstead House was sold by auction on Monday, for 10,000l: one of the conditions of sale binds the purchaser to clear every thing away even to the foundation, by Lady-day, 1825. The biddings commenced at 1,000l. and advanced by thousands till they reached 8,000l. when they dwindled to an advance of 100l. each bidding, till they reached the sum at which the building was sold; the purchasers are Messrs. Stannard and Athow, of Norwich, in conjunction with three others. The auctioneer announced that they intended to sell the whole in lots, large or small, to suit buyers, and they absolutely sold a pair of marble chimney pieces for 300 guineas, before they left the room. Thus is sacrificed a mansion, which cost in its erection more than 360,000l. and which has no equal in Essex.

FONTHILL ABBEY.—The Abbey at Fonthill, and its beautiful domain of 6,000 acres, are now, we understand, undergoing considerable improvements. The present proprietor is going to reduce the tower as low as the observatory, and to perfect the whole of the east wing, agreeably to the plan of the late Mr. Wyatt, of Gothic celebrity. The estimate for perfecting the whole is said to be under 50,000l. but previously, we learn, the marbles, bijoutry, books, and paintings, will either be removed to the pavilion in the park, or be sold. The reduction of the disproportioned tower will be a decided improvement.

HAYDN.—The celebrated Haydn composed, from his 18th to his 73rd year, 163 pieces for the viola di gamba, 20 divertissements for various instruments, 3 marches, 24 trios, 6 violin-solos, 15 concertos for various instruments, 40 services, 13 quartets, 66 sonatas, 42 duets, 5 German puppet operas, (a performance which Maria Therese was much attached to), 5 oratorios, 366 Scotch airs, and 400 minuets and waltzes, amounting in all to the prodigious number of 1228.—He was born, 1730; died in May, 1809.

SWALLOWS.—The following is a copy of memoranda made for the last ten years, as to the first time the swallow and swift have been seen in each year. 'I generally keep a good look out,' says the writer, 'in the spring for their appearance, but I cannot notice their departure. I have only been able to observe, that the black martin, or swift, cannot be seen after the 12th of August, it being the last of the kind that appears, and the first that leaves us.'

In 1813, swallows 12th April, swifts 2nd May.

EPITAPHS.

ON MR. AND MRS. HOGG, OF EVERTON,
By Mr. George Haworth.

John and Mary Hogg lie here,
By Butcher Death o'erthrown;
Have mercy on the faithful pair,
O Lord, and save their bacon.

A monument is erected in the Greyfriars Church-yard, Edinburgh, to the memory of the Scottish poet Allan Ramsay; it is on the south wall of the church, between those erected to the memory of Professor M'Laurin and Dr. Blair. The tablet contains the following inscription:—

In this Cemetery
Was interred the Mortal Part of an Immortal Poet,
ALLAN RAMSAY,
Author of the GENTLE SHEPHERD, and other admirable Poems in the Scottish Dialect.
He was born in 1686, and died in 1758.
No sculptur'd marble here, no pompous lay,
No storied Urn, no animated Bust;
This simple Stone directs pale Scotia's way,
To pour her sorrows o'er her Poet's dust.
Tho' here you're buried, worthy Allan,
We'll ne'er forget you, canty Cullan;
For while your Soul lives in the Sky,
Your Gentle Shepherd ne'er can die.

LINES

On the Monument of Sir Nicholas Pelham, Knight, in St. Michael's Church, Lewes, Sussex, who died 1559.

His valour add his worthy praise,
His brave exploits in great King Henry's days,
Could not be mentioned in a narrow room;
He among worthies has a worthier tomb.
For when the French thought to have sack'd Seaford,
This Pelham did repel 'em back on board.

THE ELEMENTS OF EXPERIMENTAL CHEMISTRY. By William Henry, M. D. F. R. S. Vice-President of the Literary and Philosophical, and Natural History Societies of Manchester; Member of the Royal Medical and Wernerian Societies of Edinburgh, &c. &c. Ninth Edition. London, Baldwin, Cradock and Joy, 2 vols. 8vo.

CHEMISTRY has certainly had a greater number of cultivators, and excited the exercise of a greater portion of talent, than any other science. It has not been confined either to one place or to one class of students; it has attracted the attention of persons of all ages and of both sexes; and in the Royal Institution of London in particular, the patronage of the fair sex, which ever imparts a charm while it confers a benefit, has been productive of such good effects as to call for the repeated acknowledgments of the celebrated professors.

There are few towns in the country in which chemical lectures are not either regularly or, at least, occasionally delivered. In this respect Manchester has excited the surprise and reproach of all strangers; there not having been, to the best of our information, a course of lectures on the subject since that given, in 1804, by the distinguished chemist, whose work forms the subject of this article.

It is a singular circumstance that the merits of the two very eminent chemists whom we have the honour to rank among our townsmen, are comparatively less known in the place of their residence, than in any other part of the kingdom. In what manner the fact is to be accounted for, there is, we think, no difficulty to determine.—We purpose to call the attention of our readers, in some of our future numbers, to those discoveries, many of them of a very important nature, which have originated in Manchester. In this undertaking we shall be glad to receive the assistance of any of our philosophical friends.

We shall, on the present occasion, proceed to notice the last edition, just published, of Dr. Henry's Elements of Chemistry. This excellent work has acquired and maintained a reputation quite unprecedented. It has already reached the ninth edition, having, in its progress, made its appearance in every shape, from that of a small pamphlet, to that of two handsome octavo volumes. From advertisements and reviews few works have received less assistance to promote their circulation. Its success, great as it has been, must, therefore, be ascribed to its own merits; and we have it in our power to cite very high authority in support of the assertion, that it is the best work which has ever been written upon the subject.

The last edition "comprehends all the recent discoveries, and is illustrated with ten plates by Henry, and several engravings on wood." It has been almost completely re-written, in a style which combines, in a very eminent degree, simplicity and elegance.

"Every new edition of a chemical book," the author observes, "must necessarily, if it keep pace with the progress of discovery, differ essentially from the one which preceded it; for while it embraces every thing that is new or important, it must reject whatever recent experience has proved to be erroneous. It is by freely effecting the latter purpose, that I have been enabled to accommodate this work to the state of the science, without materially enlarging the size of the volumes. They will be found, however, by those who may be at the pains of comparing this edition with the last, to comprise a large proportion of new matter. I have been induced also, by mature consideration of those analogies which have of late years been unfolded among chemical substances, to adopt an entirely different arrangement. It is founded, as to its leading outline, on those relations of bodies to electricity, which have been developed by the genius of Sir Humphrey Davy, and, though the classification is far from being unobjectionable, it seems to me the best that can be followed in the present state of the science."

When it is considered how favourably the arrangement of the subject in the former editions was received, the adoption of "an entirely different arrangement" might at first occasion surprize. We think, however, it will be generally admitted, that the alteration has been an improvement; though, it must be allowed, it is exposed to some very plausible objections, which the author has, in his introduction, stated fully and without disguise. It is, at least, the most philosophical arrangement that is to be found in any work on the subject.

Among the great quantity of new matter contained in this work, the reader will be pleased to see a chapter on "the chemical agencies of common and galvanic electricity," which presents a very compressed account of some of the most important facts in this highly interesting branch of science. The electro-magnetic phenomena, which excite at present so much attention in the scientific world, and in which so much has been done by Oersted, Ampere, Barlow, Faraday and others, are illustrated by neat wood engravings. Dr. Henry has thought it worth while to give a statement of the vague and unsatisfactory hypotheses, which have been offered to account for the very singular phenomena to which we refer. We select this passage as no unfavourable specimen of the brevity and clearness of the style in which the work is written.

"The theory of Oersted, which, though it appears to have led him to his principal discoveries, is not stated in a very intelligible manner, rests on the assumption of two different and opposite electricities, positive and negative, the former of which is developed by the more oxidizable, the latter by the less oxidizable metal of galvanic arrangements. Each of these forces has a repulsive activity for itself, and an attractive activity for the opposite force. In the wire connecting the two opposite poles of a galvanic battery, and in the space around it, there are, he supposes, two currents, the one of positive, the other of negative electricity, moving in spiral and opposite directions; and an effect is supposed to take place in the wire and around it, dependant on the union of these electricities, to which he gives the names of the electric conflict. By this conflict, all non-magnetic bodies appear to be penetrable, while magnetic bodies, or rather their magnetic particles, resist its passage, and are therefore, moved by the impetus of the contending powers. All the effects on the north pole of the needle may be understood, by supposing that negative electricity moves in a spiral line bent to the right, propelling the north pole, but not acting on the south pole. To positive electricity a contrary motion is ascribed, and a power of acting on the south pole, but not on the north. This theory requires, therefore, that there be two electric fluids: but in the opinion of Dr. Wollaston, which on every obscure topic of Science is entitled to the greatest deference, the phenomena may be equally well explained by a single electro-magnetic current, passing round the axis of the wire, in a direction determined by the position of the voltaic poles. The assumption of such a current is, it must be confessed, altogether gratuitous; but, without such a supposition, it is not easy to conceive any adequate cause for the motions that are observed in the magnetic needle, when brought within the influence of the uniting wire. Further researches will probably unfold the causes of these interesting phenomena, and class them under general laws, founded on a more extensive induction of facts than we now possess, notwithstanding the zeal and genius that have already been devoted to the enquiry."

We intended to point out, in a short statement of the contents of these volumes, the improvements and additions the work has received; but such a statement, though it would be a great recommendation to the publication, we are constrained to omit, because it would increase the length of this article beyond our limits, and, if we mistake not, could be of little use to the purchaser of the work, and of little interest to any other person.

The work is dedicated to Mr. Dalton: and in mentioning this fact, we cannot refrain from noticing the interesting circumstance of the friendly intercourse which seems to have long subsisted between these two distinguished philosophers. It reminds us of the friendship of Virgil and Horace, of Pliny and Tacitus, of Hume and Robertson. It illustrates a fact, so rarely illustrated, that two philosophers may be engaged successfully in the same pursuits, without any sacrifice of mutual esteem; and it forms a striking contrast with the very opposite behaviour of some eminent scientific characters in other places, where we witness the existence of that petty jealousy, and unworthy wrangling, which reflect discredit upon the very name of philosophy.

THE KING OF THE PEAK, a Romance. By the Author of "The Cavalier."—3 vols. 12mo. Longman, 1823.

We have often been surprised, that, prolific as the High Peak is in traditionary lore, so peculiarly adapted to the purposes of the Novel Writer, no one should hitherto have availed himself of the advantages it presents. The inhabitants of this interesting and romantic country are a singular people, retaining, in a great measure, that open-hearted hospitality, and that primitive simplicity of manners, which we are taught to consider as remnants of the olden time, and which we may in vain look for among the more civilized inhabitants of the town. Secluded, as it were, from the world, by the peculiar situation of their country, and possessing an attachment almost bordering on veneration for the customs and habits which have been handed down to them by their forefathers, they present to the eye of an observer of human nature, a picture, alike interesting and important. The attachment of a mountaineer to his native land is proverbial; and no where is this attachment more strongly exemplified, than in the High Peak of Derbyshire.

A state of society such as this, is undoubtedly the most favourable for the preservation of local traditions, and legendary tales. And to those who are acquainted with this country, it is well known, that there are few families who do not possess stores of this kind of information, which, in the hands of a skilful writer, might form the basis of many an interesting work. The time is at length arrived when we may expect to see this plentiful harvest gathered into the public granary. And if we are to judge of our author's ability for the task by the specimens with which we have been already favoured, we have no hesitation in asserting, that it could not have fallen into better hands. He is evidently a young writer, and there are many faults about him, which time alone can cure: but the intimate acquaintance he displays with the peculiar manners of this interesting people, plainly evinces, that his powers are of the highest order; and that those powers have not been misapplied, the high reputation he has already gained, is a sufficient evidence.

The work before us possesses little interest as a tale:—there is too much appearance of carelessness in the management of the plot, and too many trifling incidents, which have no connection whatever with the developement of the story. But these defects are amply compensated for, by the striking beauty of many of the detached scenes, the admirable management of the dialogue, in many parts highly dramatic, and the correctness and beauty of the descriptions of local scenery. These are the points upon which the author's fame must rest:—and on these points we know of no one by whom he is surpassed, (excepting, of course, the Wizard of the north.)

The tradition upon which this work is founded, is well known to almost every inhabitant of the district to which it refers. In the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the ancient Hall of Haddon, on the banks of the romantic Wye, now part of the possessions of the Duke of Rutland, belonged to the Vernon family, and was the residence of Sir George Vernon, the last of that name, who, from his unbounded hospitality, and the little less than regal splendour in which he lived, had acquired the title of "the King of the Peak." He is a widower, and his family consists of two daughters, the youngest of whom, the Lady Margaret, is the betrothed wife of Sir Thomas Stanley, second son of the renowned Earl of Derby. The elder daughter, Dorothy, is secretly addressed by a son of the noble house of Manners, who, in consequence of a feud subsisting between the families, is obliged to conceal his name and quality, and from this concealment, is known only as the outlaw of Haddon, under which title he is to this day mentioned in the traditions of the country, and his exploits form the theme of many a romantic tale. After a variety of adventures, he at length succeeds in carrying off the fair lady, and from their union, we are told, has sprung the present Duke of Rutland.

Although this is the tradition upon which the work is professedly founded, it forms but a small part of the materials of which it is composed. Sir Edward Stanley, youngest son of the Earl of Derby, is the real hero of the tale;—a most determined villain, and perhaps the only member of that illustrious family, of whom they have reason to be ashamed. This character, distinguished as much by an undaunted bravery, as by an utter recklessness of every thing honourable and praiseworthy, the author has depicted in a style which would not have disgraced the pen of Sir Walter Scott;—and which, had the work possessed no other merit, would have been sufficient to have ranked it amongst the best novels of the age. The following scene will serve to shew the character of this villain, and at the same time exhibit a fair specimen of the author's style.

Edward Stanley is endeavouring to supplant his brother in the affections of Margaret Vernon, more for the purpose of gratifying his own malicious disposition, than for any affection he is capable of entertaining for her. For this purpose he has taken advantage of a morning ride in the Park at Lathom, in the course of which, they are separated from the rest of their company. After prevailing upon her to alight from her horse in order to await the arrival of their friends,—

'They are long in appearing,' said Margaret, 'we had best ride on.'

'Nay, not so, sweetheart,' said the youth, whose confidence began to be more plainly marked, 'you must tarry and listen to me.'

'What mean ye, Sir,' said Margaret Vernon, seriously, 'am I way-laid in your father's park?'

'No, my angel, believe it not,' cried Stanley, 'though my tale is one of love, and no place can be fitter than this solitude for the mysteries of lovers. This place, too, hath ever been propitious to a Stanley's wooing; these oaks, this rock, and this limpid stream, have been obtested in the vows of many a man of my house, made happy by the enjoyment of his love; and if they should witness my shame and rejection, I would curse and renounce the genius of this place as leagued against my happiness.'

'Sir, unclasp my hand, or—'

'Nay, thou wouldst not swear, dear Margaret; but if thou didst, I would not let thee go. Sit down and hear me, for by St. German, and all the saints of the isle, we will not part till thou hast heard me.'

'Nay, then, I will hear thee another time,' said the maiden, who now began to be alarmed at the vehemence of his manner.

'Another time!' replied Stanley, with a lip of scorn; 'thinkest thou that I, like you doting fool, will give credit to every word thou dost utter? No, my beauty, not even from thy sweet mouth; and if thou wouldst hear me some other time, why not now? This place is fittest for the confessions of love; the flaring sun is shadowed by these protecting trees, and the rippling brook would lend additional sweetness to the murmurs of the doves. Come, then, let us revel in pleasures. Be bounteous, my fair one, and save me the trouble of imploring thy love by a voluntary surrender of thy heart.'

'Your style of wooing, Sir, is admirable from its singularity,' said Margaret Vernon, indignant at his impudent proposal.

'Perhaps it may,' answered Stanley; 'but thou wilt find I am no common lover. I am not one of those who will attempt to amuse their mistresses with sighs and groans; but, nevertheless, my passion is as fierce as theirs who can. I like not your seven years' courtships, passed in telling my sweetheart that I love her, whilst my fruition is held aloof by a frigid and insensible daintiness. No, marry, give me heart for heart. I am thine now, and I would have thee mine presently. Life, as the moralist says, is but a span,—let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die.'

'Fie upon thee, for an audacious libertine,' said the damsel; who, notwithstanding her alarm at his wildness of manners, was moved beyond the power of repressing her feelings. 'Take not the words of the Scriptures into thine unholly mouth, or tremble, lest thy blasphemy meet retribution.'

'By St. Bride,' cried Stanley, 'thou art the most lovely enthusiast my eyes were ever blest withal—retribution! ah, let it not lie in thy frown, and there is naught of ill I will not brave undauntedly. Let death by tortures seek me this day, and if he find me revelling in thy bosom, I am content—let him strike.'

'Thou wouldst not dare, Edward Stanley, to insult me thus,' cried the maiden, bursting into tears, 'but thou seest I am lone of protection; thou didst lure me from horse by a mean and subtle falsehood.'

'In love, sweetheart,' replied the heartless deceiver, 'all stratagem is fair. I should not indeed have had the wisdom of the serpent, had I told thee my purpose before thou didst dismount. Nay, I faith, you gentle barb is over-swift to trust a coy maiden withal. Had I given the world a second edition of Apollo losing his Daphne, I should soon have measured the lover's leap from your rock.'

'Not you, Sir, you dare not,' returned the maiden, endeavouring to excite his pride; 'you are courageous in way-laying defenceless women, and offering them insult where they should have protection.'

'Twice, Margaret Vernon,' said Stanley, with an air of stern contempt, 'hast thou uttered that silly word, dare; as if, forsooth, a passion so base and warm-like as fear could tenant the breast of a Stanley; and most of all, of one who has to win his fortune by his sword. Thou mayest believe me, fair one, when I tell thee, that for very sport, with fee or guerdon, have I thrice staked my life against the prize-fighters of Paris, in single combat, naked to the shirt, and without defence, save this slender rapier. Before my cheek was darker than thine, love, I had tasted the air of battle; the odours of blood, and fire, and smoke, were as familiar to me, as to thee and thy taffaty suitors the fragrance of the rose and the lily. Think, then, if I am like to dread chastisement for my temerity? Nay, in sooth, a darkening glance of the eye, were I at all penetrable, would weigh with me more than the protectors drawn up in battle against me.'

'And one of them,' said the maiden averting her head.

'My brother!' cried the ruffian, drawing her closest to him; 'ha! Margaret, build not upon that; thou art on the sand, and it will crumble beneath thee. Thomas Stanley is a gay knight, and a gallant:—he is worthy the blood he springs from, and he may not fall better how to whisper a love tale into a lady's ear than I do; but his soul is not made of the same stuff as mine; he is the minion of honour, whilst he will accept easy service; the ocean he sails on is smooth and placid; but I have lived in the hurricanes of life, and have sought my object, call it, if ye will, a selfish one, through storm and fire: neither heaven nor hell could avert my gaze from the suns that I worshipped, and thou art one: I have thee, and by my soul, we part not as we met.'

'And hast thou no sense of hospitality?' said Margaret Vernon. 'Wilt thou wrong the guest of thy father's house?'

'Would ye talk to the lion of courtesy when he rages with hunger?' answered Stanley. 'If thou urge the ties of hospitality to thwart my passion, I utterly discard the word as a worthless vagabond; nay, I will disclaim all ties of sociality, and revert to a state of nature, rather than lose thy beauty. I would not part with thee, to be esteemed a saint in virtue, or an Alexander in generosity; neither would I forego thy possession, though I be branded with the vices of Caligula.'

'And dost thou think, false traitor,' cried the maiden, 'that thy outrage will go unrevenged? My father, thou knowest him, a man little patient of injuries, will wreck his vengeance on thine head; beware, then, while thou mayest.'

'And if thy father were so formidable, gentle Margaret,' replied Stanley, 'thou wouldst not, I'll be sworn, excite his revenge. Thou wouldst not betray thy love?'

'My love!' ejaculated the damsel, with sovereign scorn.

'Ay, thy love,' returned her persecutor, in the same tone, 'for such I am, and will be. I am not used, fair Margaret, to dally my time. I am for the storm, instead of the blockade. Thou shalt become mine. The hour that has seen the first of my vow, shall see my joy complete. Nay, struggle not, my queen, thou art beyond aid.'

'False villain, thou liest,' cried the indignant maiden; 'I shall have aid when thou hast none. What he! help Sirs! rescue! rescue!'

The damsel, whose voice was as powerful as it was beautifully modulated, made the wood echo with her cries, and forced Stanley to the exertion of all his strength to prevent her escape. But at length, when her voice was become more feeble, and her strength was almost wearied, a man appeared on the rocks above, and bade the villainous ravisher to forbear.

'Curses on thee, villain!' cried Stanley, drawing a pistol from his breast; 'get thee gone speedily, or I will slay thee out of hand.'

'I would thou couldst, proud ruffian,' replied the man, who proved to be the fanatic brought by the Earl from Southport, 'I am doomed to my fate; if thou art my slaughter-bend, I hail my hour.'

'Ha, Ashby!' exclaimed the damsel; 'is it thou that Heaven has sent to my rescue? Good fellow, shout aloud for help; raise thy voice speedily.'

'If thou dost dare to speak above thy breath, thou shalt die, by hell,' cried Stanley.

'My days are not in thy hand,' answered Ashby; and raising his voice to its utmost pitch, he roared aloud for help and rescue with wonderful vociferation.

'Take thy death, villain!' cried Stanley, discharging his pistol at the enthusiast.

'God protect him!' cried the maiden.

But whether Edward Stanley had not in his hurry taken a sufficiently deliberate aim, or the ball had struck upon somewhat in its flight, and either glanced aside, or rebounded, is uncertain, but the stranger escaped wholly unhurt; and so careless did he appear about his own life, that his voice neither ceased nor wavered at the weapon's explosion.

The length of this extract has left us little room for further remark; but we hope that what we have said will excite the curiosity of such of our readers as are not already acquainted with the writings of this gentleman, and induce them speedily to become so. They will thus not only contribute to their own pleasure, but they will increase the author's profits, which, in this age of speculation, is a matter of some importance.

COURTSHIP.

Could fancy paint, or thought suggest,
One time more happy than the rest,
That's spent on earth, 'twould be express'd
As Courtship.

The pleasing tale, and fond embrace,
The smiling look, when face to face,
Are things which long have taken place
At Courtship.

Some have a noble end in view,
But some there are (and not a few),
Who for the sake of gain pursue
This Courtship.

But others, whom the wise commend,
Are striving for a bosom friend;
Knowing that Marriage is the end
Of Courtship.

No matter if for love or gain:
The fair one should they once obtain,
They're riveted in Hymen's chain,
For Ever!

Then seeing it requires care,
In love affairs young man beware,
Lest you like some repent the snare
Of Courtship.

FIGHTING REMINISCENCES.

(BY A LOVER OF THE FINE ARTS.)

(Concluded from our last.)

I was in the ring just before the commencement of the fight on the memorable 11th of December, 1821. To describe the details of that fight at this distant period, and after the manner in which they have been recorded by historians so much better qualified than I can pretend to be, would be no less presumptuous than superfluous. But as I saw the whole under peculiar advantages, (being close to the ropes nearly all the time,) it may not be amiss to mention a few particulars that necessarily escaped general observation; or that have, at all events, remained hitherto unrecorded. In speaking of the battle afterwards to a friend, he compared it to one between a cat and a terrier dog—likening the extraordinary quickness and vivacity of Gas to the one, and the cool and wary determination of Neate to the other. I liked this illustration at the time, as I do all his; but I have since thought, that a bull-dog and a bull would have been more appropriate: for the blows of Neate actually tossed his adversary off the ground—you could see him sprawling up in the air before he fell, and could hear him fall stop down. But, in fact, neither of the comparisons are very appropriate, except in one or two particulars. And no wonder; for it was not a sight to be compared with any other that ever was seen, or will be;—"None but itself can be its parallel."

After the battle was over, I was at Gas's side before he awoke from the stupor into which the last blow had thrown him. On recovering his senses, his first words were—"Hollo!—where am I?"—then recollecting himself, he tried to start up, crying—"Come! Come!"—meaning, "Let me be at him again!"—But it was too late. "No, Tom," was Jackson's reply—"He's beat you, my boy; but you're the bravest fellow alive, for all that." Meantime, the majority had collected round Neate, who was almost unhurt. He was as mild and unassuming after his victory as he had been before it; except that he rather disdainfully declined the offered hands of the crowd of would-be friends who were pressing round him—knowing, perhaps, that if he had lost the battle, the same hands would have been pointed at him in scorn; and once, and once only, he let an exclamation of honest exultation escape him, on catching the eye of a friend at a little distance: "Well, my boy—didn't I tell you I should lick him!"

Luckily the promised fight between Jos. Hudson and the Suffolk Champion (which was to have followed) did not take place. Good as this would, doubtless, have been in its way, it would have seemed like staying to witness a paltry melo-drame after having seen Kean and Kemble act together in a high tragedy!—for Neate's fighting is, in fact, not unlike Kemble's acting, and Gas's was as much like Kean's as fighting can be. The lesser would have disturbed and weakened the impressions left by the greater, without adding to them, or substituting others in their place.

Behold us, then—for I had a friend on the ground, and we had determined to be conjunctive during the journey to town—at three in the afternoon turn our faces towards our home sixty miles in the distance:—I, prepared to assert with the pertinacity of an old believer, and he to prove with the zeal and eloquence of a new one, that fighting is the finest of all possible things, and that the fight we had just witnessed was the finest of all possible fights.

I must not trust myself to tell of our journey home, and of the talk that beguiled it, lest I should be tempted to extend these desultory reminiscences throughout all the rest of the pages of this "pleasant periodical." Not that I doubt the propriety of such a proceeding, for once in a way—at least as it regards the readers of those pages. But readers' inclinations are not the only ones to be consulted on such occasions. If it were not as pleasant to write a good thing as to read it when written, the pages of many an Album might remain blank. Suffice it, then, that the out-door part of our talk, as we paced the pathway in the cold sunshine, changed the winter about us into spring—decking the dry branches of the trees with green, and the hard ground with flowers; and that the in-door part, at our pleasant inn at night and in the morning, brightened the fire better than stirring, and gave a relish to the repast that nothing but conversation could. Of my own share I shall say nothing; because I am a modest man, and moreover pique myself on being the best of listeners;—and one rare quality (as I have hinted above) is enough to look for from one man. But of my friend's, I will venture to say, without the fear even of his contradiction, (though he, too, is a modest man,) that it would not have been better, had it proceeded from the lips of either of the Sams to whom I have before alluded. Finally, it was redolent of The Fight in every feature of it. From that it proceeded as from a spring; round that it revolved and coursed in its eccentric course, like a comet round the sun; and in that it ended and was merged and lost, like the aforesaid comet in the sun.

I have, gentle reader, called up these reminiscences at this time, partly because the principal subject of them has lately quitted the scene for ever; but chiefly because he was suddenly

Sent to his account, unhouseled, unanaged,
With all his imperfections on his head,

in addition to the weight of a broad-wheeled waggon; and has thus been prevented from wiping off that stain upon his name which, perhaps the weakness of his and our nature, perhaps the malice of his enemies, cast upon it; and which has been industriously communicated thence to his profession, with a view to prove that that has a tendency to deteriorate the human character, instead of elevating it, and to weaken the principles in proportion as it strengthens the muscles. I deny the inference with my doubled fists—as every lover of fighting ought. Admitting that Gas did take a bribe—have not his betters (as they would call themselves) done so before him?—and at least he took one on both sides—which few of the said "betters" would dare to do; and he did his duty afterwards—which their spurious honesty would stand in the way of. Admitting that he took five hundred pounds of the "legs," to lose the battle, he at least told his backer what he had done, and took his promise of a thousand pounds to win it. And what was the natural result under these circumstances, but that he would lose it?—Supposing it to be an equal match at setting-to,—(and who shall say that there can be more than an equal match for Neate?)—it is, in fact, mathematically demonstrable that Gas must have lost it. Taking their respective powers, resulting from strength, skill, honour, profit, fame, &c., at 10, there was, doubtless, a drawback of about 1 unconsciously acting upon Gas's innate sense of right in favour of his first bribers, which cast the balance into the scale of his adversary. At all events, there's no denying that he did his duty, whether he deserves the credit of it or not. Nobody who saw that battle can deny that he did what he could to win it, because he had promised to do so for his own benefit and that of his backer; and he did what he could not help in losing it, because he had promised to do so for the benefit of other people! I conceive that, after this, nothing more need be said, either for or against him in this matter.

If I now recur for a moment to the day of Gas's death, it will certainly not be to lament over the particular manner of it; still less to wish that it had not happened. A prize-fighter is mortal, as well as another man—whatever one might be led to think to the contrary during the witnessing of a well-fought battle. As he must die, then, those are but sorry friends to his fame, who would have him breathe his last upon a feather-bed. A hero's death should refer, in some way or other, to his past life. Napoleon's, alas! had no farther reference to his life, than that it took place in the captivity to which that life had led;—but Gas, if for his misdeeds he was not permitted to lie in the lap of glory, was not denied the boon of dying in the open air while on a fighting errand, and on the anniversary of his Waterloo! namely, the battle of Hungerford. This singular coincidence may serve to show, that these seeming accidents are nothing less. "There is a special providence even in the fall of a sparrow."

The ideal of an immaculate hero's death is, doubtless, on the field of battle, and in the arms of victory; and accordingly, Abercrombie and Nelson, who were immaculate heroes, died in that manner. Napoleon and Gas were, alas! not without spots in their fame, and their final fate was correspondent. But they were illustrious persons nevertheless; and will not be forgotten while Fighting is remembered; the less, perhaps, that they mixed up something of the errors of humanity with those qualities which lifted them above it. At all events, there was no hypocritical pretension about either of them, and no cant. They professed to cultivate the arts of war, not of peace, and to be fighters, not fine gentlemen; and they were as good as their words in this respect, whatever they might be in others. If one of them offered bribes, and the other took them; what then?—they at least confessed it—one when he was drunk, and the other when he was sober; and the confession of our sins every one admits to be a virtue! If they both broke treaties, it was doubtless because at the moment of making them they never meant to keep them any longer than they found it convenient. They made them to serve their own views, not those of other people; and if they had kept them any longer than was consistent with those views, they would have broke faith with themselves; and a thief that will rob himself, must be a thief indeed!—But I will run this parallel no further at present, or seek excuses for people who sought none for themselves. In fact, to complain of Buonaparte, because he was not Belisarius; or of Gas, because he was not Sir Charles Grandison, is a mere impertinence. They were all four models in their way; and what would we have more! Finally, they are gone to their long home; and peace be to their manes!—Album.

TO LAURA.

Through those eyes with sorrow streaming,
Where a timid fire is beaming,
In the tongue that dreads to tell—
Ere we part, the sad farewell,
In the cheek so pale with woe,
In the pulse that beats so low,
See a heart that loves thee more
Than the Indian loves his shore,—
Brighter burns for thee, than e'er
Burn'd the Persian's Eastern star!
Thousand cares my thoughts distress,
Thousand fears my soul oppress:
Much it fears, lest time should prove
Foe perfidious to my love;
And lest absence, more severe,
Bid a rival triumph here:
Yet when such attends thy path,
Courts thy smile, and plights his faith,
When his accents sooth thine ear,
And his vows first seem sincere,—
Think that there is one, whose brain,
Were he nigh,—'twould rack with pain:
Think (as well as thou mayst) that he
Perhaps is thinking then of thee;
Think thou seest his hollow eye,
And canst hear his bosom's sigh.
Think, at eve, whene'er thy gaze
Rests upon the moon's bright rays,
That thy lover's eyes recline
On the same pure orb as thine,
And recalling when, by night,
Last with thee he view'd her light,
Strains his gaze, in her to see
Some remembered form of thee.

As for him whose swelling breast,
Trembling, dictates this request,
Trust—where'er his footsteps bend,
That to thee his thoughts still tend,
O'er the bounds of hill and dale,
Stretch'd across the interval.—
Pratt—where'er on earth he goes,
Though his fortune meet with those
Who are set with charms as bright
As the starry gems of night,—
Lips of coral—eyes of fire—
Cheeks of most intense desire,
Yet he turns from these, unmov'd,
To the maid whom first he lov'd.
All the beauties art can twine
Tasteless seem, compar'd with thine;
Tis for thee he keeps his love,
And his hopes—if thou approve.
Canst thou, gentle Laura, wait,
While he runs the course of fate?
Till he wins fair Fortune's smile,
And improves in age the while?
Till the years of trial o'er
Make him worthier than before?
Doubt not them his plighted troth
Chang'd for Hymen's graver oath,
And the vicious, now so gay,
Turn'd to never-fading day;
When so bright an age begins,
Lighted with refulgent scenes,
That our bliss will only prove
An antepast of joys above!

BARYTHMIA;

A POEM.—BY N. N.

Addressed to all the Sons and Daughters of Adversity.

(CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.)

But what are chaplets! what the Poet's lays!
Or what the boast of never-fading bays!
Ah, what is mortal life! search Nature round,
Where shall its strange similitude be found?
'Tis like the bow that decks the humid sky,
Chequered and changed with many a mingled die;
Which glows awhile, with all its colourings gay,
Then, unperceived and sudden, melts away.
Such, and so varied, is the life we lead,
Sorrow to joy, and smiles to tears succeed;
While Time each chance and change, with ceaseless wings,
Wafts to the lumber of forgotten things.

Light are the passing sorrows of a day,
Which Love or Friendship sweetly smiles away;
Short are the pangs where sympathy remains,
Where Hope beguiles, or Pity soothes our pains;
But oh! what consolation shall we find,
When Death has left no comforter behind!
When they who, once, in all our griefs could share,
Or with a smile dispel the clouds of care,
And pour sweet counsels on our listening ear,
In marble silence press the sable bier!
Yon church-yard mound, though wild and few its flowers,
Is sprinkled oft with more than vernal showers;
For there, beneath the yew-tree's awful shade,
The mother's hopes are with her infant laid;
There the lorn husband tells the Grave his pain;
There the fond lover beats his breast in vain;
The orphan there, one well-remembered morn,
Saw his last friend, his widowed mother, borne;
And oft returns to shed a filial tear,
And call on her who never more shall hear.
Ah! what can tears avail to them that sleep!
Though 'tis your mournful privilege to weep;
Yet, oh! be mindful in your bitterest grief,
There is a sacred source of pure relief!
There is a clime, where, wet with heavenly dew,
The flowers that withered here, shall bloom anew;
Removed from summer's heat, from winter's blight,
To one perennial spring, with skies for ever bright.
The Mourner heeds me not;—I hear him say,
"Lost to all hope, bereft of every stay,
"Why should I bear of life this useless load,
"Weary, and faint, and sick of sorrow's goad?
"We travel all to death, be mine the shortest road!"
Christian, forbear! the Virgin's suffering Son
Sighed o'er the bitter cup, "Thy will be done."

Oh happiest he, amid this changeable state,
Whose hopes are fixed above the reach of fate;
Whose views beyond this wilderness extend,
His refuge, Heaven, Omnipotence, his friend;
But hapless man, if guilt alarm thy fears,
If keen remorse be mingled with thy tears,
Ah, seek not thou to put aside thy woe,
But let thine eyes like ceaseless fountains flow;
If haply tears can wash away thy stains,
And sanctify what yet of life remains!
Let not thy soul's deceiver whisper peace,
Or dark despair;—but pray, and never cease!
Pray for thy spirit's everlasting weal,
Till he who bruised thee, shall in mercy heal;
He will not,—wept, implored, besought, in vain,
A broken and a contrite heart disdain.

In that dread hour, when round thy dying bed,
The horrors of that unknown world are spread,
The Voice that bade the winds and tempests cease,
Shall bid thy troubled spirit rest in peace,
Till death's dim shadows shall have past away,
Before the brightness of eternal day.
Thus some worn sea-man, on the foaming tide,
Whose wasted strength the storm has long defied,
While the strong mast beneath the whirlwind groans,
And night broods o'er him, and the tempest moans,
Weary at length of struggling with the deep,
Sinks feebly down in dull and deathlike sleep;
Nor wakes till when, before his raptur'd eyes,
The peaceful splendours of the morning rise.

ON NATURE AND ART IN POETRY.

In the first place I hold, that, though the poetical objects in Nature and in Art heighten and assist each other, yet that Nature has few, if any, unpoetical objects, whereas many of those of Art are so;—and secondly—That the most poetical objects in Nature are more poetical than the most poetical objects in Art.

With regard to the first of these positions—What object in Nature, unspoiled by man, and still existing as it came from the hand of God, is not highly susceptible of poetry?—I know of none.—There are, indeed, few things left with which man has not meddled. But still there are some;—some which he has hitherto left untouched, others on which his touch is powerless. "Cette superbe mer, sur laquelle l'homme n'a jamais pu imprimer ses traces" still bears, and ever will bear, its own unchangeable aspect. The mountains which soar into the sky, and lift their heads far beyond the reach of man and his power, reign in the majesty of Nature,

"On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,
With a diadem of snow."

Many parts of the American forests also are yet untrodden, at least unchanged, by man. And are not they poetical? Those vast woods which cover what in our smaller hemisphere would be the space of kingdoms—with all those sights and sounds which embellish and give a charm to forest scenery—fruits and flowers, and leaves of every shade of green, from the shadowy pine to the brilliant acacia—their birds of every conceivable variety of plumage, and modulation of song—and those beasts which add to all these things the interest and the dignity of danger—are not, I again ask, forests in this primeval state, in the highest degree poetical?—And what does art do here?—the axe resounds and the fire blazes, and the proud trees of the forest become blackened stumps—the beautiful and varied glades are opened into unsightly clearings,—and the picturesque Indian, who pursues his enemy or his game through the almost trackless woods, is replaced by a back-woodsman—the brutal and dissolute savage of civilization, instead of the pure-minded and dignified savage of Nature.

But even the most unpromising things in Nature, such as leafless trees, stagnant pools, and barren heaths, may be adapted with the utmost advantage to the purposes of poetry.

The bleakest rock upon the loneliest heath,
Feels in its barrenness some touch of spring;
And in the April dew or beam of May,
Its moss and lichen freshen and revive.

Is not this poetry?—and what is its subject?—

The bleakest rock upon the loneliest heath.

There are few things in Nature of more wretched appearance than a fen, and yet even this has given rise to writing truly poetical. The passage I allude to is Crabbe's tale of a Lover's Journey—and it is so powerful and extraordinary, that it is well worth quoting:—

On either side
Is level fen, a prospect wild and wide,
With dikes on either hand by Ocean's self supplied:
Far on the right, the distant sea is seen,
And salt the springs that feed the marsh between;
Beneath an ancient bridge, the straiten'd flood
Rolls through its sloping banks of slimy mud;
Near it a sunken boat resists the tide,
That frets and hurries to th' opposing side;
The rushes sharp, that on the borders grow,
Bend their brown flow'rets to the stream below,
Impure in all its course, in all its progress slow.
Here a grave Flora scarcely deigns to bloom,
Nor wears a rosy blush, nor sheds perfume:
The few dull flowers that o'er the place are spread
Partake the nature of their fenny bed;
Here on its wiry stem, in rigid bloom,
Grows the salt lavender that lacks perfume;
Here the dwarf willows creep, the seep-foll herb,
And the soft slimy mallow of the marsh;
Low on the ear the distant billows sound,
And just in view appears their stony band;
No hedge nor tree conceals the glowing sun,
Birds, save a wat'ry tribe, the district shun,
Nor chirp among the reeds where bitter waters run—

—and what is the subject of this powerful poetry?—a marsh!—To this passage is appended a note, which, though of course in prose, is so picturesquely and vigorously written, that I shall copy it,—and claim its evidence in my cause,—for writing need not be in verse to be poetry. "The ditches of a fen so near the ocean are lined with irregular patches of a coarse and stained
